God will giue way vnto his fury, being wonderfully incensed against vs, for the great A D abuses & manifold disorders which are committed as well in the Ministry of the Church as in the administration of Iustice. To pacifie him, and to diuert his wrath and indignation, name men that are learned, and of a holy and vndeified life, to spirituall liuings, who may according to the duty of their charges, and the Kings Edicts, keepe residence at their Benefices, to edifie their flockes: For there is not any thing that doth so much moue the wrath of God, as to see his Churches prophaned, and to fall into the hands of such as are vowed to the temporall seruice of the Prince, and not of the Spirituall. Whensoever it hath bene practised, it is a certaine demonstration of the alteration and change of an Estate, and of their misery and disgrace which abuse it licenciously, whose affaires alwayes decline euen vnto their ends.

"Advance men of knowledge, merit, and discretion, to places of Iustice: who may bee knowne and approued to be vertuous, louers of the publike weale, and not giuen to auar-ice. Doe nothing against iustice: take away the abuses which are committed through fa-uour and surpise in Euocations and Abolitions: cause the Royall ordinances to be obserued in euery point, without any alteration, and leaue suits to their ordinary formes in law, not causing them to be iudged by Commissioner: Breake not the authority of the holy lawes, let not their vertue be in paper, but in effect: for men will iudge of your bounty as they shall find your inclination to the obseruation or breach of the lawes. If you tyre your selfe to maintaine them, you yeeld vnto the people that which you owe them: and contrariwise, if you breake them, you deprime the people of that which you are bound to distribute vnto them, which be the cause of infinit miseries to the King and his subiects. Let Iustice be equally and without partiality distributed.

"As in mans body nature imparts to euery member as much nourishment as is needfull, not suffering one to vspurie any thing of another of the common nutriment: Euen so ought you with the like ballance maintaine the Kings subiects, foreseeing that the substance of one passe not to another, to the end that the whole body bee maintained with equality. Remember that the meanest within the Realme, is the Kings subiect, as well

A as the mightiest: and therefore you owe him, in the place which you hold, the like iustice.
See that the aduancement of one may not be the disgrace of another. And consider that the least haire makes his shadow ouer the Sunne-beames, and that the lustre of your authority which consists in iustice, will decay, when it shall not be vniuersall, to giue vnto every one that which belongs vnto him: For this effect, giue care to all men: for notwithstanding standing that you are raised to this honor, yet must you with the like care recueile the poore and the rich which come to be sutors to your Maiesty, to the end that every one in the time of his affliction may haue recourse vnto your bouny, fauour, and protection, to haue reliefe and succour. Remember, that God is aboue you, and as you shew your selfe in fauourable clemency vnto the people, so will hee bee vnto you: it were better to heare no complaints, then hauing heard them to giue no ease vnto the complainants. And aboue all, Madame, remember, if it please you, that the Courts of Parliament, and other Soueraigne Courts, in their iurisdiccions are the fundamentall parts of the State, by the which our Kings haue happily continued their Realme from father to sonne vnto this day. Wherefore you must haue a principall care to support these companies, and thinke that they are the chiefe armes by the which during the minority of our King, his Maiesty and yours shall be wonderfully preferred against all those, that flatterer themselves with their owne ambition, shall make any attempt: the which I humbly beseech God may not happen.

Next to this, you must provide for the generall and too true complaints of the vexation of the people, by innovations, tributes, creations of offices, parties, and other like mis-chiefs, by the which in promising to re-vnite the reuenues of the Crowne, they doe actually alienate the peoples hearts, which is the Kings chiefe treasure. Wherefore by your wise dome and gouernment, you shall iudge whether it be not needfull to ease them, if not of all, yet at the least of a good part of these new impositions. And especially to abolish altogether that party so preiudiciall, which giues life againe to so many States, the which at the time of their beginning were dead about 60 yeares since, whereof the not vsing them for many ages teacheth vs, that they should by no means be reuiued. When I speake this (Madam) my meaning is, that a Prince should cuterat his subiects, like vnto Bees, and not take from them both honey and wax: but to entertaine them alwayes in a good disposition, and to suffer them to enioy part of the fruits of their labour: it is he that by his pain-full exercise entertaines and makes the rest of the Realm to liue in quiet. From him comes trafficke, riches, gold, and tribute. It is a Spring which flows continually, and is neuer dry: if the people cease from labour, all the body of the State will perish.

If you desire to maintaine the Realme, you must preferre the people, and accommodate them: the which will be easily and speedily done, when as by vnitng one vnto the other, you shall not will any thing but what is pleasing to the people, nor they wish for any thing but with your good liking. There must be a reciprocall communication betwix you and them: they must performe the duty of obedience, and you must shew that which belongs to your wise command in your Regency. If you take vpon you this resolution, you shall make them wonderfully affected to the Kings seruice, and the preservation of the State: for they haue bene accustomed to doe for their King, as the body for the soule:
they bring a mutuall consent to submit themselves to his will that leads them, that makes them breathe and subsist: but if they be too much oppressed, they will doe like vnto those which are tormented with burning feuers, who turne vp and downe continually, and can find no place of rest, which is a certaine foretelling of the ruine of a State. So as it is need-full you should be carefull of their health. Haue only this apprehension, that the Kings greatnesse depends of his subiects ease, and then to maintaine the Kings greatnesse, you will resolue to haue the people rich and at ease: that is to say, such as they shall bee, such will the King be: the heart commonly feelles the infirmities of the body.

F If the people be poore, he will be a poore King, (were his store-houses heaped vp with gold and silver) his quality depending vpon that of his people, for that hee takes his name from the subiect. Will you haue them loue you? doe them good: for hee that entreates them ill, he may well haue the commandement of their bodies, but not of their hearts. Be then (during this great charge which you hold) like vnto a goodly running riuer, which brings profit to every one: the fruit which you shall gather by good vlage of them, will be of wonderfull encrease: for they shall not afterwards breathe but by your Maiesties bounty: by which you shall frustrate the designs of such as would trouble the State, who can 1610 not doe any thing without them : take the people from them, you leaue them naked, and A disarme them of all force. Oppose then a people against them freed from all extraordinarie imposts, experience will teach you, that with hand and heart, they will smother their enterprises in the breeding. It were fearful, experience should let vs see what a discontented people linked to the ambition of great men can do, who neuer incense the subjects against their Prince, but vnder the maske of the Common-weale, whereof in effect they are the first corrupters.

Managing
of the treasure.

After that you have eased the people of all these superfluities which did afflict them, keepe an account of the number of Prouinces within the Realme, and what subsidies, taxes, imposts, customes, aydes, tributes, and other publike reuenues, euery one doth contribute, B that you may certainly know what is raised yearly of the people, and then examine what the pensions, rents, fees of Officers, payments of souldiers, and other expences may amount vnto, to the end that by good husbandry you may so gouerne the Kings treasure, as the gluy hands may not retaine that which should come cleere into his coffers.
The receipt and expences seene and truly knowne, let not all the expences of the Kingdome (if you will haue it durable) exceed the Kings reuenues, otherwise it cannot long subsist.

Auoid warre all you can both at home and abroad, they can yeeld nothing but ruine, death, and confusion. Leauie not peace, vnion, and concord, which you enioy both within and without the Realme, which will bring infinit benefits, to the honour and quiet of C this State. Whosoeuer seekes to engage our King lightly in warre during his minority, shewes, that he seekes to liue in the troubles and confusions of the time, fearing lest his actions should be knowne; or else he desires to satisfie his ambition and couetousnesse with the hazard of the King and Realme: or to speake more plainly, that he desires to giue vent to his secret enterprises, which cannot burst forth but by colour of publike diuisions: and in a word, you must purchase peace at what rate soeuer, rather then to come to armes.
Whosoeuer takes armes in hand during the Kings minority, making shew to defend him, prescribes him oftentimes a law, to the preiudice of his Estate.

Touching ciuill warre, and home-bred confusion, be carefull and respectiue to auoyd it for as inward diseases are more hard to cure then those which are exterior, and bring a D man by degrees vnto the graue; Euen so warre which begins in the bowels of a Realme, is much more dangerous then a foraine warre, for that it drawes it insensibly to ruine. If you desire to ouerthrow this Estate, yndertake a ciuill war, within few dayes it will bring you to the graue.

As for foraine warres, you should much lesse vndertake them, nor wish them: for it opens a gate, and admits a passage to strangers to practise the bad intents which they may haue against the King and his Crowne: shame which restrained them, will turne into suspicion, which will free them a passage to enter into France. Whereas if you keepe your selfe within the bounds of peace, not any one of your neighbours, (although he haue a desire) will in regard of his honour, attempt against the King in his minority.

Points of warre.

What will be the fruits of either of these warres? I will tell you: They will cause new impositions, new Edicts, which will consume the blood and substance, which the people haue yet remaining, and by this means you shall leaue the fields without labour, the poore without bread, the rich without means, and in the end bring this Estate to its last period.
The beginning and continuance of warre, gathers together a great superfluity of bad humors, which by degrees makes the body of a Monarchy fit to receiue an alteration in all the members: For Warre is the mother and nurse of all liberty and impunity, the which doth dispence and exempt euery one from the subiection of lawes, and the commandment of superiors, which is the sole and onely means, by the which the bond and vnity of people is dissolved.

Learn wisdom by our examples, and follow the way which hath bene made vnto you by the deceased King for twelue yeares together. He made triall what danger warre brings with it. Seeke peace both within and without the Realme: you shall thereby preserue the Estate, and you shall haue means to ease the people of a heauy burthen which they haue so long borne. Let your life be a liuely image of the happy condition of a people exempt from the calamities and miseries of warre. Where can you seeke war, to enioy a more absolute peace? war must not be vndertaken, but to keepe the people from affliction
during

A during a peace. True it is, that although you haue peace with the Kings subjects, and all your neighbors, yet must you not keepe it so strictly, as warre may not be vndertaken. And therefore if you finde it conuenient, you may entertaine garisons vpon the frontiers, lest you be suddenly surprisid: All peace without Armes is weak.

Troublers
of the State

I will adde one exception to that which I haue formerly said, that there may bee some one so rash, during the tender age of our King, as to stir vp the subjects to mutinies, either vnder colour of Religion, or of the common-weale, to make his own profit with the pre-iudice of our King. As a light disease increaseth and kils the body, if fit remedies bee not applied in time, so in this first motion of alteration if you doe not employ force and authority to stay the course of such a mischief, it will set the foure corners, and the heart of France on fire. The first medicine should come from the soueraigne Courts, and therein you shall know of what importance and necessity they be, by whose Decrees such an one shall be declared guilty of high treason, whereunto you shall presently adde force to put it in execution with fire and sword, and follow him with such resolution, as he may be presently inuested wherefoeuer he hath shut himselfe, and that he may be taken there without mercy, to the end that by his head the rest of France may be diuerted from once dreaming of such foule offences: and that his ashes may make a remedy for posteritie. God forbid
I should presume any euill by any Nobleman in France, being assured of their general loyalties: yet I may say by the way, that the sufferance of one iniurie drawes on a thousand others: and on the other side one iniury reuenged, suppresseth all bad designs.

Warre of Germany.

Some aduise you to succour the Germanes, others to remaine quiet: the first say, that the deceased King was bound not onely by word, but in effect: that not relieuing them now, the honour of France was engaged, that it was worke worthy of a great King to succour afflicted Princes, when as one more mighty will vsurpe their Estates, by some colour-red title: that not doing it, they might draw them into despair to ioyne with him against this Realme: or for want of succouring them, to prepare the way to haue a great neighbour against vs, who by our negligence hath extended his limits to be a future scourge vnto vs. In which case we should haue nothing left vs but a late repentance. A lesson which is ordinary to the Princes and Potentates of Italy, who will not suffer a new Prince to grow great among them. Others say, that wee must ballance all affaires according to the diuerty of obiects which are presented vnto our eyes: that what was good to a great warriour, cannot bee applied to his sonne in his tender age: that it is a goodly thing to succour afflicted Princes, but it is better not to trouble his owne affaires vnreasonably: that the death of the King his father hath freed him from all promises: that the rules of duty doe not bind him to giue succours, for that in matter of state, honour must be measured by that which is most necessary for the good, quiet and profit of him and his subjects: that in his youth he must feare a confusion, and an Anarchy which Armes may draw into France: and that in seeking to preferue another, we shall lose our selues.

To Conclude, it may happen that by our succours these foraine Princes may bee settled in their countries. And on the other side, it may bee, that both they and our succours may be defeated: and that in this infortunate successe, there will be a port opened for the conqueror to enter into France: the which during the minority of our King, you must auoid by all means possible. A lesson which was well obserued by our great King Lewis the 11.
who dying, aduised them to keepe the Realme in peace, and not to enter into any quartell with the Britton, and the other neighbours: to the end that his sonne Charles the 8. being thirteen years old, his state might be in peace, till he came to age, to dispose of things at his pleasure. And long before him that wife Gonsran King of Orleans, tutor to Cloaire the second his Nephew, being but foure moneths old, thought (that not to expose his Realme to all the miseries wherunto an Estate is subiect) he must breed vp his little Nephew, and preferue his Realme by all milde courses, dispersing with an admirable dexteritie all innouations that might grow in it, how dangerous so euer: And yet he, for his great nesse, with that of his Nephew, might haue made head against any vnder takers. And about all things you must haue a speciall care that Princes and Noblemen, may not be armed vnder any pretext which they shall borrow of the Maiestic of a King, so long as hee shall be in this tender age.

Madame, the reasons of either side are great, the which you must weigh in a iust ballance, to incline vnto that which shall be most profitable for the good and preservation of

1610 " the King and his Realme, and take counsell with God what you haue to doe in this point: A
 " And about all things thinke that at this day, in a full assurance of all things in this Realme,
 " you must feare any thing."

Religion. " Religion may alter: the subjects wils: It pierceth the hearts of men vnto the quicke, and
 " caries them away with a violent and extraordinary motion, the which blinds the eyes to " all consideration of respect, duty and obedience, which they owe vnto their Prince. We " should all wish that there were not any but the ancient religion, wherein wee haue bene
 " baptized and bred vp: But the miseries past which had in a manner brought France to her
 " last period, should teach vs, what calamities doe follow vs, if the same maxime which the " deceased King hath established, be not inuolubly obserued: who by a wife aduice tolera- B
 " ting the exercise of the pretended reformed Religion, hath by the same meanes settled the " Catholike; Apostolike and Romish Religion, in townes whereas it had not bene exerci" sed these forty or fifty yeeres. This subiect concerns the preferuation of the State, where-
 " of Religion makes a part. And therefore you may not alter any thing. Allow vnto them of " the reformed religion, free exercise of their Religion, the Chambers of the Edict, and
 " the townes which haue bene granted them for their assurance: forget not any thing that " the deceased King granted them, as a Prince who knew well how much it did import
 " the State not to touch this string. It will containe them within the vow of obedience:
 " Neither shall it be in the power of any, how great soeuer, to draw them from the duty
 " which they owe naturally to their King. It is a body so composed as it receiues no moti- C " on, but when any thing is attempted against the Edict, the which was made to preserve " them: Make no breach in this Edict, it is immouable, and the chiefe parts without mo" tion. This body is not like vnto a clocke whereas the greater and lesser pieces moue all to" gether, one by another: here the greater haue no force, nor vertue, without the people,
 " what shew soeuer they make, as we haue sometimes seene, when they had an humour to " rise, from the which they were wisely diuerted by the people: And contrariwise, we re" member that the people of Rochel alone endured the extremities of warre without their " support, who haue alwayes maintained themselves in obedience, by the wisdom of the " Edicts of pacification."

" Madame, entertaine these Edicts in euery point, and that which hath bene authorized D
 " by the wisdom of the deceased King; You need not then feare them that hold the chiefe
 " rankes amongst them. But breake them in any part, they be firebrands to inflame the hu-
 " mours of the people, the which would turne to the desolation of the State, I meane of both " religions: the one would draw with it the losse and ruine of the other, whereas the main" taining of both, adding therunto prayers, fasting, modesty, chastitie, preachings, with a " holy life, will be the support of the ancient, and the ouerthrow of the new."

Preachers. " The faculty of eloquence in the mouth of a Preacher, is a goodly gift of nature, the
 " which being augmented by long vse and study, giues light and ornament to the goodly " conceptions of his minde, which concerns the health of our soules. But if hee will abuse
 " the sweetnesse of his tongue, there is no plague so preiudiciall to a Realme, as this well E
 " speaking Preacher. It is a torrent which ouerflows to drowne a multitude, his tongue
 " is a sword, whereon depends the life and death of those, for or against whom hee doth " employ it; he floures, he thunders, and confounds heauen and earth together, when as to " preuaile in his intentions hee vnwisly abuseth passages of the holy Scripture, by the ex" position whereof hee winnes what credit with them hee list: There is not any thing
 " how incredible so euer, but with good words hee will make probable: and nothing so
 " rude and vnpolished, but he will make plausible with his eloquence: his speech in a " multitude is of as great force, as iron in an armie: especially with those who comming
 " to heare him, bring nothing but spirits of deuotion and obedience, whereof the Preacher
 " doth cunningly make his profit: He doth govern their minds at his pleasure, and knowes F
 " how to moue their affections, and to incite their courages in such sort, as they forget all
 " feare of danger, and all bonds of benefits. Hearing of the senses, by means of the way, " brings greatest passions vnto the minde. To prevent the effects of such an instrument, you " must by your absolute command, forbid all inuectiues in their Sermons, which be the fire-
 " brands of sedition; and that they follow their texts, and teach the subiect obedience to " his King, with vniuersity and concord, both of great and small. If hee doe otherwise, intreat
 " him like Anthony Pradin a Franciscane, who was banished out of the Realme by Lewis the " eleuenth,

A eleuenth, for that hee had exceeded the bounds of preaching, and disputed of the state of " the Crowne in his Pulpit."

" Although we cannot force the lawes of Nature, and giue vnto the youth of our King,
 " that great sense, iudgement and conduct which is requisite for the government of his
 " Realme, which only time must produce, yett must you not attend the time of his full age,
 " to haue him crowned. He is our King, old or yong, you must alwayes apply vnto him
 " those holy Characters, whereas all the Princes of the blood, other Princes and Officers of " the Crowne must assit. After this let him make a progresse throughout his whole Realm,
 " to the end his subiects may know him, and yeeld him the oath of allegiance. The Princes
 " B presence at what age soeuer, is of so great merit and recommendation with his subiects, as " it doth wonderfully moue them to loue him. And yet Madame, herein it is necessarie
 " to make warre by the eye, and doe according to the disposition of affaires, not with-drawing
 " your selfe easily from the first, and chiefe City of France, the which you see by their teares
 " is wholly vowed to the seruice of their Prince."

" You must not forbear to assemble the Estates, for the reason which they suggest vnto
 " you, that they will be some blemish to your greatness. It is quite contrary, the Estates
 " hauing confirmed it by publike Authority, will settle it fully. But I will tell you the reason
 " why you should forbear to call this assembly. It would bee an Instrument for them that " would trouble the State to giue a forme vnto their practices, euery one would seeke to
 " C winne the Deputies by courtesie, presents, benefits, goodly promises and other fauours,
 " and all these priuate persons returning into their Prouinces, would serue as Torchets
 " to kindle new fires and combustions. I know well there is not any Prince or Nobleman that " hath this proiect in his head, being all with one deuotion, vowed to the Kings seruice: but " they are men, and therefore you must take away all occasions of doing ill, or thinking ill.
 " Commonly the Estates assemble to provide for the present and future complaints of the " general of this Monarchy, and to reduce things to their ancient course. You know where " the disease lyes, prescribe the like remedy, as you haue done, if it had bene heard. To Pre" lates abate the tenths, these bee they who either by their doctrine or good example hold
 " the hearts of the Nobility and people tied to their Princes seruice. As for the Nobilitie,
 " D gratifie them, honour them, and put publike charges into their hands, they bee the Kings " creatures, who referre all their exploits to the profit and aduancement of the head, from " whom they take their being and nourishment. As for the people, being the foundation
 " whereon this Realme is built, and the which being ruined, it is impossible it should subsist,
 " ease them, take away these new Edicts, Imposts and Subsidies: It is better to gratifie a peo" ple then to entreat them roughly. The force of diseases decline as the naturall vigor of the " sicke body increaseth. But a people how rich, strong and vigorous soeuer it be, de" clines, as Taxes and Imposts increafe, we doe not perceiue it but like vnto the going of the " hand of a Dyall, whose motion is not seene, but when it hath finished the course, nor the " losse and ruine of a people but in their fall. Thereby Madame, you shall both stop the " E moutnes of the three Estates, and of all those that shall make any motion to haue them cal" led, and withall you shall avoid an alteration, which time might breed."

" Doe not disappoint the Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Officers, to whom the deceased
 " King gaue honours and pensions: Remember that hee gaue them not but to men of mer-
 " rit, and who had assisted him to recouer his Realme, and to settle it in peace and good or" der. Lewis the 11, a true pattern of wisdom, a little before his death, desired to see his " son, whom he had not seen in many yeeres, about all things hee aduised him not to alter any " thing in his Court, nor with them whom hee had aduanced to dignities. A comendement
 " grounded, for that after the death of Charles the 7 his father, hee had cut off the pensions
 " of Noblemen and other Officers, who had with the losse of their blood deserved what
 " F they enioyed: the successe of which Council had like to haue bene his ruine, and of the " whole Realme, by so many Malecontentes. Hee would thereby teach his sonne that an in" considerate change is of very dangerous consequence."

" Will you put a wife Councell in practise? call all the Princes, generall Gouvernors, and " one or two Noblemen of euery Prouince, neere vnto the King and you, giue them pen" sions that they may be able to maintaine themselves there, and countenance them indiffe" rently according to their qualities; to auoid iealousie, the mother of diuisions; and to " ons. The benefits and fauours which they shall receiue from the King and you, will attune ment the desire they haue to his and your seruice, and every one in his Prouince will dif. A perfe such practices as may grow preiudiciall to his Maiesties seruice.

To know all things that shall passe in the Prouinces, consider if it shall bee conuenient to depute intendants or suprauiors of Iustice, which shall report vnto you as occasion shall require, what is done, and the complaints of all the people.

Keepe our King in good tearmes with the Pope, the King of Spaine, the King of England, the Archdukes, the Suisses, and all our other allies, renew the League with them. It will bee a great and Soueraigne remedie to maintaine peace in this Realme, when as you shall be assured that your neighbours will not practise any thing against the King nor his State.

The affection and fidelity which the Parisiens had vnto the seruice of their deceased King, is well knowne vnto you, by the last teares which all in generall powred forth to witness vnto the King, and you, their wonderfull griefe for the losse which they haue re-ceiued in the death of him, by whom they liued. As in a clocke one instrument makes all the rest to moue. Euen so this Realme, according to the modell of Paris the other townes do commonly frame their opinions: you are assured of the Parisiens affection to the Kings seruice, the which they haue continued in his person by a continuation from the father to the sonne. Wherefore you must alwayes arme your selfe with their loue, to draw others to doe the like. Establish Captaines, Lieutenants and Ensignes in all the quarters; which shall be knowne to be honest men, and that breathe nothing but the Kings seruice, mix with some Lawyers, Treasurers and Merchants, who shall take the oath of allegiance in your hands. These men will maintaine the Parisiens in their obedience, and if there happen any vnexpected accident, you shall be assured the King hath there so many seruants, who will willingly employ their liues to preferre his person, and maintaine their countrymen vnder that yoke of seruice which they owe naturally vnto their Prince.

Command that in Paris there be not so many strangers that professe armes, and that matters may bee reduced to the same estate they were in the time of the deceased King, every Nobleman being for his owne particular as well assured now as he was then. A policy which it may be will be hard to digest, but yet it should be allowed of by every good subiect: As for all other townes, entertaine them by Letters, making them often know how desirous the King and you are to ease them, and to maintaine them in peace, that they bee carefull not to suffer themselves to be abused with false reports, which some wicked people may giue out for truth, which would but increase their miseries.

If you desire to content the Clergy, the Gentlemen, and the common people, admit any (if it please your Maiesty) that desires to speake with you, to your presence without a Mediator, to the end the whole bond may remaine to you. Appoint certaine dayes to this end, when as every one may haue free access vnto your Maiestie (being assisted by such Noblemen as it shall please you) to make their complaints. There will grow a double profit thereby, the one is, you shall vnderstand matters truly, without any disguising; the other is, that he to whom you giue a fauourable audience will go away content, although hee sometimes bee discontented for that hee hath not obtained all that hee demanded.
To passe at the mercy of such as haue liberty to giue, or refuse the entry, to them that would complaine, is to sell the perfumes of Princes, with a blemish to their reputation and great effe.

About all things beware you follow not your owne opinion alone, in managing the affaires of this Realme. Our wils are most commonly partial, which may diuert our iudge-ment from the right way. First take Councill of God, and let him bee the guide of your actions; let them bring what maximes they please for the preservation of the State, it is a vaine wisdom, if God be not of the party: Then take aduice of men experienced in many things, which may be full of discretion, age and wisdom, and which haue nothing in their soules which age hath not made graue, constant and settled. Yong mens Councill is sometimes good, but that of the aged is most commonly better. And about all things labour carefully to know them from whom you shall take councill, for many times vnder a vale of integrity, there lurkes disloyalty.

Madame, all these discourses giue you power to gouerne this Estate well. I assure my selfe you haue also a will: Every action is contained within power and will, and no man can be deceived of his expectation when hee makes both of them his end. God of his mercy

A mercy grant you both, to guide all things to good, and to gouern them in an equal course, 1610 to the end they may haue a good and a happy end, which may tend to the increase of the greatnesse of the King and State: Most humbly beseeching your Maiesty to take in good part these Remonstrances, which are made by him, Who is,

Your most humble, most faithfull, and most obedient subiect and seruant, N. Paquier Councillor and Master of Requests.

Am bassadors came from all parts to condole the death of the deceased King. Among others the Duke of Feria came from Spaine, with a great traine. The Duke of Montbazon being accompanied with two hundred horse, and foure Caroches, went to meet him a League without Paris, and brought him to his lodging. At his first audience he was ferch by the Duke of Elguillon with twelue Caroches and many Gentlemen, where comming to the King, he told him that hee was sent from the King his Master to visit his Maiestie, and to offer him the like friendship and intelligence, as he had with the deceased King his Father, for whose death he had much grieved. The yong King, hauing heard his interpreter, answered him suddenly. I thanke the King my Brother for his good will, I will remember him and you also: Seeing he desires it, he may expect from me all friendship and good intelligence, such as he had with the deceased King my father. And then he asked him many pretty questions of the King of Spaines health, the Queenes, the Princes and the Infanta, which bred an admiration in the Spaniards, to see the Maiesty of the yong King, which seemed then supernaturall and extraordinary.

The Ambassador being retired, and the King set downe in his chaire, there comes suddenly a Church-man of his traine, thrusting through the presse, and cast himselfe at his Maiesties feet, making great signes of the Crosse, as if hee blest him, and crying out in his language, God blese you my King, God blese you my Prince, God assist you for euer, and make you alwayes prosper. Whereupon they enquired of him what hee was? And hee answered them cheerefully, that he was a Navarrais, his Maiesties most humble and most faithfull subiect.

Some dayes after the Lord of Wotton Ambassador for the King of Great Britaine, arri-ued at Paris, being sent to the same effect to condole, and to make all offers in his Masters name, of the cordiall loue and friendship: his comming was so pleasing as it bred a iealousie in the Chastilian Ambassador. The Marshall of Laurdin met him neere Saint Denis gate with about two hundred horse, and so accompanied him to Luxembourg House, within three dayes after the Prince Donnuille, accompanied with a great troope of Gentlemen, went and fetch him to his audience, where hee gaue and receiued much content: on Tuesday, he with the Ambassador Leager, dined with the King at the Tuilliers, after which hee re-ceiued the oath of the Queene (in the Kings presence) for the obseruation of the League, with great solemnity in the Feuillants Church. Then after some priuate audience of the Queen, he took his leaue of their Maiesties to returne for England.

After all these condolences, it was resolved in requittall of these Ambassages, and to confirm the League which the deceased King had with those Princes, that Monseur de Bellegarde, Master of the Kings Horse, should goe into Spaine, the Marshall of Lauer-din into England, and the Duke of Elpermon to Rome. And then they began to prepare for the Kings Coronation, which was appointed at Rheims on the 17 day of October, with that Pompe and State, that is usuall at such solemne Ceremonie.

CONTINIVATION
OF THE HISTORIE
OF FRANCE:

c From the death of HENRY the Fourth, vntill the Conclusion of the Peace made before Montpellier, in the yeare 1622.

LEWIS THE THIRTEENTH.
THE 64 FRENCH KING.

D After the detestable Murther of that great Monarch, his Sonne being seated in his Fathers Throne, and the Queene Mother chiofen Regent of the Realme, by a generall consent of all the Princes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne; and confirmed by an Edict of the Court of Parliament of Paris: The clouds which seemed to threaten the State with stormes of confusion, were suddenly dissolued by the wisdom of the Regent, and the vigilancy and care of the Councell and Court of Parliament. Having performed the Rites due to the deceased King her Husband, her onely care was to entertaine peace in her Sonnes Estate, and to calme the waues of so great a sea of publike affaires, and different passions, which were then amongst many great men: for the people breathed nothing but obedience; neyther did they thinke of any thing but to bewaile the losse of their well beloued King.

This famous Queene had no sooner reconciled a controuersie for the government of Normandy, betwene the Prince of Conty, and the Earle of Soissons brethren, and heard an Opposition made to the most iust Decree of the Court of Parliament against Mariana's Booke; nor ended the Controuersies which had befallen at the Ceremonies of the Kings Funerall for their places; but new troubles befell her touching the Funerall Sermons which had beene made: some (according to the passions of such as had pronounced them) seemed to be Panegyrics and praises for the Iesuits: and others to bee Satyrs, vttered to their disgrace. The Iesuits hauing complained vnto the Queene of the Abbot of Bois, accused him, that in his Sermons, treating of the Question, Whether it be lawfull to kill a Tyrant; and refusing Mariana's booke and others, he had made an exhortation vnto the Iesuits, That they should hereafter haue a great care that no bookes should be published to the prejudice of France, vnder the name of their Society, nor with the approbation of their Superiours, if they would not willingly expose themselves to those dangers, which all their wisdom, fortified with the authority of their most confident friends, could not auoid. These were the principall points of his accusation, whercupon they informed the Queene Regent that these words had like to have caused a sedition against the Iesuites. The Bishop of Paris had charge to heare the Abbot, who answered in his defence, That neyther passion, nor hatred to the Iesuites, nor any other, had moued him to preach in that manner, but the full horror and vnpeakeable griefe for the strange death of his good Master, and the probable doubt of danger to the King and Queene, whilest those damnable bookes of Marian and others should haue course amongst men: which the Bishop hearing, hee dismissed him with a gentle admonition to liue louingly with all other Preachers, and especially with the Iesuites, and continue to preach obedience due to the King and Queene, and to praise the great merits of the deceased King, nor offending any man. He made the like answer to the Cardinall du Perron, and the Chancellor, who told him, that continuing to doe good service to God and the State, hee should neuer want the Queenes protection, nor the assistance of all her good seruants.

The Queene Regent hauing drawne the Princes of the blood, and many other great personages to Court to attend the Kings person, as you haue heard in the former part, she hauing a speciall care to entertaine them in one intention, and desire to maintaine the State in peace; they grew into factions and ieaiousies, marching vp and downe Paris in great troopes: which bred a feare of some alteration in the City. Whereupon commandement was giuen vnto the Parisians to prouide armes. New Captaines were chosen in their Towne-houfe, who tooke an oath to the Queene, and the people within eight daies were all armed, but they were forbidden to discharge any Peece after fixe of the clocke at night. They still cried out, we acknowledge not any one but the King and Queene. These murmurings proceeded from the great traines which the Princes & Noblemen had, some being followed by 100 horse and more through the freetees. But the Queene hauing discovered the cause of their ieaiousies, hauing distributed honors to those whose merits were well known vnto her, and augmented many of their pensions, all those new gallants which had their dependances vpon the Princes which were in court, retired presently to their houses, and euery man returned to his old course as in the time of the deceased King, the Queen giuing them to vnderstand that they should be no lesse assured now then they were before. The Parisians in like manner who thought they should haue bene forced, to goe to the guard of the Ports, had now leaue to hang vp their new armes.

54 Edicts and commissions reuoked.

The Queene hauing caused these first windes to cease which began to raise waues vpon the calme of peace, without vsing of any force: she resolved to cause iustice to reigne: Hauing recommended it to such as had the charge thereof, she sought to releuee the generall complaints and grieuances of the subiects who had been vexed and oppressed by many Edicts and extraordinary commissions which the deceased King had granted by importunity. Whereupon on the 22 of Iuly, by letters patentes in forme of a declaration, there were 54 Edicts and Commissions reuoked, wherewith the subiects had been oppressed; and diuers others were suspended vntill it should be otherwise decreed. This did to ease and content the people, as all France beganne to conceiue they were entering into a golden age vnder the Regency of the Queene: and the rather, for that she had caused the Salt to be farmed out, and abated a fourth part of that which it had bene sold for, and yet the vnder-takers diminished nothing of the accustomed rent.

The Queene also caused all the buildings begun by the deceased King to be continued, a worthy worke, and charitable in regard of the multitude of men employed therein: And as the deceased King before he had ended one worke still beganne another: so during this Summer she caused the buildings of Bois de Vincennes, and the Colledge royall to be begunne. The latter was a designe of the deceased King, but hee neuer saw the beginning of it. The King laid the first stone on the 28 of August, on the which these words were graven, In the first year of the reigne of Lewis the 13, King of France and Nauarre, being nine years of age, and of the Regency of Queene Mary of Medicis his Mother, 1610. Vnderneath it were the Kings armes, and the Queene Mothers. At the foure corners his Majesty did set foure Medails, two of Gold, and two of silver and guilt, with the like Inscription.

The Court of Parliament in the meane time was busied about the arraignment and condemnation of certaine Conspirators, so as on the fourth of September there were hanged at the Greuze, by a decree thereof, the Srs of Iurige a Poictuain, Chef-babin a Scotchman (who had liued 35 yeares in Poitou) and a sonne of his called Champmartin, convicted to haue made and published a Declaration, thereby to stirre vp the people of Poitou to a reuolt,

1610

A reuolt, and to induce them to take armes with them, to change the Estate into an Oligarchie, as it was said: France being ill gouerned as they conceived. But their pretence was to make a shew of the publike good, and to fish in a troubled water. They had bene prisoners during the life of the deceased King, who would needs speake with them, especially with Iurige, who was a Protestant, and well knowne vnto his Maiestie, hauing caried armes for his seruice. Hee was discovered by some to whom hee had imparted this businesse, who help to take him. His Maiestie hauing laid many things before him, touching the affliction of his family, and commanded him to tell the truth with promise of pardon, so as hee would confesse the Author of the said Declaration: for that it appeared plainly by the style, that it was none of his owne invention. The said Iurige answered, that not any but himselfe had set hand vnto it. You will not then (replied his Maiestie) help to saue your selfe, and free your family from the dishonor which will grow by your punishment. Where haue you seene that disorder in the State, whereof you complaine in your Declaration: seeing you haue not parted from your house for these nine yeares space, nor come vnto my Court; neyther haue you receiued any discommoditie from me or my officers. Hereat hee stood mute. Whereupon the King sent him backe, and commanded they should make him dine, and that hee should sometimes eate with Budart and others who had bene familiar with him, to see if they might free him of that Melancholy humor wherewith he was possessed; and discover if they could, the ground of the enterprise. But his Maiestie being dead, and hee continuing obstinate, they were all three convicted of treason, and troubling of the publike peace; for which they were hanged, being held vnworthy to dye by the sword like Gentlemen.

All things being pacified within the Realme, the Councell assembled to resolve what should be done with the army which the deceased King had drawne together before his death; the which beganne already to march towards Germany: and consulting of the finishing of his designe, it was not held expedient to beginne a new warre in the time of the Kings minority; seeing that the best experienced Princes are many times troubled in the like cases. Whereupon it was resolved that the Marshall La Chastre should haue 10000 Foot, and 1200 Horse, with some Peeces of Ordnance, and lead them to Iuliers to assist the Marquis of Brandenburg and the Duke of Newbourg (two of the pretenders to the Estates of Iuliers and Cleues;) the deceased King hauing promised to assist them with whatsoever they should need to maintaine and defend them in their pretensions; but death would not suffer him to effect his promise. The Queene mother being prest by the Ambassador of Spaine to abandon the succors promised by the deceased King her husband to the Princes pretending the succession of the Estates of Iuliers; shee answered, Neuer speake of it, I will not abandon the Allies of France: the which shee presently put in execution, and the Marshall La Chastre had the charge giuen him to lead those Forces, who at the first excused himselfe by reason of his age and other occasion: yet hauing receiued commandement from the Queene, hee obeyed. In the meane time Iuliers was besieged, and battered by the Forces of our King of Great Britaine, by the Prince of Orange, and the Estates, and by the Prince of Anhalt who led the Forces of the two Pretendants. On the 13 of August the Marshall came vnto the campe before Iuliers, and was lodged in his quarter on the other side of the Riuer of Roer, whereas the Prince of Orange had made all necessary retrenchments for him. They so pressed the towne with their battery and Mines, as on the first of September the Capitulation was made for the yielding thereof by Raischemberg who held it for the Emperour. The Conditions were. 1. That there should be no alteration in the exercise of the Romish religion; and that all Clergy-men should be maintained in their priuileges, and enioy their goods and reuenues. 2. That the Gouvernour, Capitaines, and Souldiers, should deliuer the Towne and Castle vnto the Princes of Brandenburg and Newbourg, with the Artillery, Munition, victual, and instruments of war, vnspoiled after the accord made. 3. That the Gouvernour, Capitaines, Officers, and Souldiers might depart with their full armes, horses and baggage, whether they pleased; and that they should be furnished with 150 wagons to supply their wants. 4. That they might march out of the Towne and Castle of Iuliers, with their drummes beating, Colours flying, matches light, and bullets in their mouthes. 5. That the Archduke *Leopold*s Officers, and all Clergy-men, and others, of what condition soeuer, might depart freely with their baggage. 6. That the Gouvernour should deliuer vnto such as should be deputed by the said Princes, all Charters and Records, and not cary any away. 7, That the Magistrates and Burgesſes ſhould be maintained in their priuiledges: and ſuch as would might depart with their baggage. 8, That the accord being concluded, they ſhould ſuffer ſome one deputed by the ſaid Princes to enter, to receive the Charters, Artillerie, Munition, and other things before mentioned. 9, That the Gouvernor ſhould cauſe the Garriſon of Bredeben to depart vpon the ſame conditions that were concluded for the Towne of Iuliers. 10, That the ſaid Gouvernor ſhould releaſe all the priſoners of the campe, paying their charges, as alſo all the horſes which had bene taken during the ſiege. 11, That the Gouvernor of Iuliers ſhould be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of all his goods, as they were then in being, with all priuiledges and immunities belonging thereunto; and the ſaid Gouverneur ſhould not be moleſted for any thing which had hapned during that war, he taking an oath of fidelity and obedience to the ſaid Princes, as other Gentlemen of the Country had done, which oath he ſhould be bound to take within foure moneths. 12, That it ſhould be lawfull for the Gouvernor, Capitaines & ſouldiers within the towne and Caſtle of Iuliers, to retire themſelues whither they pleaſed, out of the iuriſdiction of the ſaid Princes, & of the generall Eſtates of the vniited Provinces, and that they might remaine there for the ſpace of 40 dayes in all ſafety; ſo as thoſe troopes and others ſeruing the Emperour did not commit any act of hoſtility, nor oppreſſe the ſubiects and Countries of the ſaid generall Eſtates. 13, That they ſhould deliuer two Capitaines who ſhould remaine in hoſtage vntill the returne of the wagons and horſes which ſhould be deliuered them for the conſeque[n]t of their ſicke, wounded and baggage. After the yeelding of which Towne, and ſome other ſmall places, the whole Duchy of Iuliers remained in the poſſeſſion of the Princes of Brandenburg and Newbourg, and the Marſhall La Chafre returned with his troopes into France.

 France was ſo generally afflited for the death of their King, as many dyed with the apprehenſion thereof. The Abbot of Marmonſtier his ſelfe brother (hauing receiued the newes thereof,) tooke his bed and died within few daies after, ſo dearly hee loued him. In the year 1590, being then Biſhop of Leſcours, hee came vnto the Kings Army with 30 men at armes, and paſſing by Tours, the deſeased Cardinal of Bourbon blamed him for that he went armed to the warre with a troope of horſe: to whom hee answered, I D haue not begun ſince, the deſeased Cardinal of Guiſe hath bene a Preſident for me, I haue more reaſon to cary armes for my brother, then hee had for his. Monſieur de Vic Vice Admirall of France, being returned from Calais, whither the Queene had ſent him after the Kings death, to giue order to his Gouvernement, paſſing by the place where hee had by chance ſeene the King dead, and calling it to mind, he was ſeized with ſuch a ſudden apprehenſion as within two dayes after he dyed. He was a braue Cauallier, whom the king made choiſe of at the battell of Iury to be Sergeant-major of the Field, hauing bene but two moneths in his Court; afterwards he gaue him the government of St. Denis: and it may well be ſaid that by his care in the guard of that place, and his pleaſing behauiour, hee reduced the hearts of an infinit number of Pariſians to the royall obedience. His Maieſties pleaſure was, that for a memory to poſterity he ſhould cary a Flower de luce of gold in his armes. After the reduction of Paris, he was Gouverneur of the Baſtile: Amiens being recovered, the King gaue him the government; and Calais being yeilded by the Spaniard, he would not truſt that frontier place but to this truſty ſeruant. But forbearing to make any further mention of ſuch as dyed for very griefe, being many, let vs come to the Kings Coronation.

The Kings Coronation:
 As the Coronation is an Action the moſt important for the State, the moſt aſſured for the perſon of Kings, the moſt neceſſary for the continuance of their Reigne, and the moſt conſiderable for the good of the Realme; ſo for theſe reaſons, the Queene (deſiring to ſhew her loue and affection to the King her Son) appointed a day for his Coronation at Rheims, to adorne his head with a glorious Diadem in the ſpring of his young yeares: to which end the Royall ornaments which are kept in the Abbey of S. Denis for the Coronation of Kings were caryed thither. On the 14. of October, he made his entry into the Towne, where his Maieſty was receiued with great pompe and magnificence, the particularities whereof, as alſo the preparation which was made in the Church for that ſolemnity, I am forced for breuities ſake to omit. The day before the ceremonie, the King went vnto the Cathedrall Church to aſſiſt at Euenſong, and to heare a Sermon made by

A P. Cotton, vpon the Diuine Inſtitution of the Vnction, and Coronation of the Kings of France, and of Confirmation, which his Maieſty receiued by the hands of the Cardinal of Ioyeuſe, to whom hee was preſented by Queene Marguerite and the Prince of Conde. On Sunday the ſeuenteenth day of October, the King ſent foure Barons vnto the Abbey of S. Remy to fetch the holy Oyle: They parted early in the morning with their Equiues and Gentlemen, either of them hauing a banner with his Armes caried before him, cauſing a white Hackney to be led for the Prior of Saint Remy, who was to cary the ſaid holy Oyle.

The Cardinal of Ioyeuſe, who was to repreſent the Archbiſhop of Rheims, and to doe the office at the ceremony, came ſoone after into the Church with eight Biſhops to aſſiſt him: where attending the coming of the Peeres, he ſate him downe in his pontifical robes. As for the Biſhops which aſſiſted, two of them were attired like Deacons with Miters, two like Subdeacons with Miters, and foure with Copes and Miters. Soone after ariued the Eccleſiaſtical Peeres in their pontifical robes; that is to ſay, the Biſhop and Duke of Laon, the Biſhop and Duke of Langres, the Biſhop and Earle of Beauuais, the Biſhop and Earle of Chaulons, and the Biſhop and Earle of Noyon. At the ſame inſtant there came from the Kings lodging, the Princes of Conde, and Conty, the Earle of Soiſſons, with the Dukes of Neuers, Elbenſ, and Eſpernon, who were deputed by the King to hold the places of the Dukes of Bourgundy, Normandy and Aquitaine, and of the Earles of Toulouſe, Flanders, and Champagne, attired in their Robes and Coronets, according to their qualities. Hauing done their deuotions, and ſaluted one another, they ſent the Biſhops of Laon and Beauuais to fetch the King, who departed preſently in their pontifical habits, hauing certaine reliques of Saints hanging about their necks, being conducted by the maſter of the ceremonies, all the Prebends of our Ladies Church marching in proceſſion before them. Being come to the Kings chamber, and finding it ſhut, the Biſhop of Laon knockt three ſeueral times, to either of which the Duke of Elguillon, great Chamberlaine of France, demanded, What would ye? The Biſhop answered, Lewis the thirteenth, ſonne to Henry the great: Whereunto the Lord Chamberlaine replied, He ſleepes. Then knocking againe he had the like anſwer. But at the third time, demanding what they would haue, the Biſhop answered, Lewis the thirteenth, whom God hath giuen vs for King. Then the doore was opened, & the Biſhops entred with the chiefe Chamber of Rheims, and the maſter of the ceremonies: where they found the King laid vpon his bed, hauing his ſhirt ſlit both before and behind, to receiue the holy Vnction, and vpon it a waitcoate of crimſon Sattin, ſlit alſo in like manner, and thereon a long robe of cloth-of-ſiluer. The Biſhops ſeeing his Maieſty, he of Laon hauing finiſhed a prayer, kiſſing their hands, they liſted the King from his bed, with all ſhewes of honour as to their ſoueraigne Prince, and then they led him ſinging to the Church doore.

Before him there marched firſt the great Prouoſt of France with his Archers; then the Clergy which had accompanied the two Prelates; the hundred Swiſſers of his Guard, the Drums; Hautboies, and Heralds; the Nobility; the great maſter of the ceremonies; the Knights of the Holy Ghoſt, with their great order about their neckes, in the miſt of two hundred Gentlemen of the Kings houſe; the Scottiſh Guard. Before his Maieſty went the Marſhall La Chafre repreſenting the Conſtable, carying a naked ſword, and hauing robes like vnto one of the Earles which were Lay Peeres: On either ſide of him went an Vſher of the Kings chamber, attired in white Sattin, carying their Maces: next after came Monſieur de Silery Chancellor of France in his robes; then followed the Marſhall of Louardin, holding the place of Lord Steward: On the Kings right hand went the Duke of Elguillon high Chamberlaine of France, and on his left hand Monſieur de Belgarde, maſter of the horſe, holding his place of chiefe Gentleman of the Kings chamber. Theſe three Noblemen were attired like vnto Lay Peeres Earles.

After ſome ceremonies at the Church doore, the King approaching neere vnto the high Altar, he was preſented by the Biſhops of Laon and Chaulons, vnto the Cardinal of Ioyeuſe, who repreſented the Archbiſhop of Rheims; who receiuing him ſaid many prayers, whilſt the King was at his deuotion. After which his Maieſty was led vnto his ſeat, with his officers and Noblemen about him, according to their degrees. In the mean time, all the religious men of Saint Remy came ſolemnly in proceſſion, being accompanied by the chiefe of the towne, carying Torchés of Virgin Waxe in their hands. Their Prior was mounted vpon the white Hackney, hauing a foot-cloath of cloath-of-siluer, A carying the holy Oyle in a boxe hanging about his necke, being vnder a Canopy of cloath-of-siluer, borne by foure Monkes.

The Cardinall being aduertised of the arriual of the said Oyle, he went presently in his pontificalibus to meet it, with the eight Bishops which assisted him, and all the singing-men and Quiristers. But before they would deliuer it to the Cardinall, they made him (according to the custome) binde himselfe to restore it vnto them, the Ceremony being ended: it which he promised on the word of a prelate. After a prayer said by the Cardinall, hee thewed the holy Oyle vnto the people, and then set it downe vpon the high Altar with all reuerence. Then being assisted by the Bishops of Laon and Beauuais, hee B made this following request.

A request made vnto the King by the Cardinal. The Kings answer.

Wee pray and require you, that you would grant vnto euery one of vs, and the Churches wherof we haue the charge, the Canonically priuiledges, and good Lawes, and iustice: and that you will defend vs as a King ought all his Bishops and their Churches. Whereunto the King answered, I promise to preferre you in your Canonically priuiledges, as also your Churches: and that I will giue you good Lawes, and doe you iustice, and will defend you by the help of God, according to my power: as a King in his Realme ought to doe in right and reason, to his Bishops and their Churches.

After this Answer, the Bishops of Laon and Chaalons lifted his Maiesty vp from his Chaire, demanding of the assistants if they did accept of him for their King: nor that this Acceptation is taken for an Election (the Realme of France hauing benee alwayes hereditary and successiue to the next male:) but for a declaration of the succession, obedience and fidelity which they owe vnto him, as their Soueraigne Lord, by the expresse commandement of God. Hauing benee acknowledged for their lawfull Prince by a generall consent of all the Orders, the Cardinall of Ioyeuse presented vnto him the Oath of the Kingdome (which is the sacred bond of the fundamental lawes of the State) the which he took publicly in these words, with inuocation of the name of God, laying his hand vpon the Gospel, which he kissed with great reuerence.

The Kings oath vnto his Subjects.

I promise in the Name of Iesus Christ, these things to the Christians subiect vnto me. First, I will endeavour that the Christian people shall liue peaceably with the Church of God. Moreover, I will provide, that in all vocations the just and all iniquities shall cease. Besides, I will command, that in all iudgements, equity and mercy shall take place: to the end that God who is gentle and mercifull may haue mercy on you and me. Furthermore, I will seeke by all meanes in good faith to chase out of my Iurisdiction, and the Lands of my subiection, all Heretikes denounced by the Church: promising by oath to obserue all that hath benee said, so help me God and this holy Euangel.

The Kings Ornaments appointed for the Coronation were laid vpon the Altar, that is to say, the Imperiall Crowne, being close, and a middle one, the royall Scepter, the hand of Iustice, the Spurs, the Sword, his royall Roabe, with diuers others. On the left side of the Altar, neere vnto them, stood the Prior of S. Denis, who hath the keeping of them; and on the right side was the Prior of S. Remy looking to the holy Oyle. The Bishops of Laon and Beauuais hauing conducted the King vnto the altar, Monsieur de Belgarde first Gentleman of his Chamber, tooke off his roabe of Cloth-of-siluer. Being in his waistcoat of Sartin, when the Cardinal had made certaine accustomed prayers and blessings, the Duke of Elguillon put on his Buskins, and the Prince of Conde (supplying the place of the Duke of Bourgundy Deane of the Lay-peeres) put on his Spurs, and presently took them off againe.

The King offers the royall sword to the Altar.

After this, the Cardinall blest the royall Sword being in the scabbard: which being ended, hee girt the King therewith, and presently vngirt him againe: then he drew it out of the scabbard, which hee left vpon the altar, & kissing it, said many prayers, whilest that the Quier sung certaine Anthems. The King hauing receiued the Sword, kist it, and offered it to the altar whereto it was laid, in witness of his zeale and affection to the defence of the Church. Hauing offered the Sword vnto the altar, the Cardinall deliuered it into his hand againe, which his Maiesty receiued reuerently vpon his knee, and gaue it to the Marshall la Chastre, who held the place of Constable during the Ceremony: the Cardinall returning to the Altar to prepare the sacred vnction, after this manner; Hee drew out of the forenamed holy Violl with a needle of gold, a small quantity of liquor of the

A the bigneffe of a peeße, and mingled it with his finger with the holy Crefine prepared in the couer of the Chalice.

This Vnction being thus ordered, the tyings of the Kings garments were let loose both before and behinde, by the Cardinall and the Bishops of Laon and Beauuais: after which his Maiesty kneeled downe in his Oratory or Closet, and the Cardinall with him, to craue the assistance of the grace of God for the preservation of France. The Lettany being sung, the Cardinall stood vp to say certaine prayers ouer the King, who was yet kneeling. Which done, the Cardinall set him downe as in the consecration of a Bishop, and holding in his hand the plate whercon the sacred Oyle lay, hee beganne with his right thumb to B anoint the King in diuers places, viz: on the crowne of the head, on the stomacke, betwixt his shoulders, on both shoulders, and on the bendings of his armes. The Consecration and prayers being ended, the Cardinal with the two Bishops closed vp his shirt, waistcoat, and other garments, in reuerence of the sacred vnction. Then the Duke of Elguillon high chamberlaine, presented to the King the three habits accustomed to be worn in the like ceremonies vpon his waistcoat, viz: a long Iacket, representing a Subdeacon, a Surplis for a Deacon, and a royall Cloak: in stead of a Coape, representing a Priest; which ended, the Cardinall anointed the palmes of his hands, and then put him on thin gloves, lest he should touch any thing with his bare hands, for reuerence of the sacred vnction: which gloves hee blest, and sprinkled with holy water, saying diuers prayers. The royall C Ring being also blest by the Cardinall, (a symbole of loue whereby the King was wedded to his Realme) he put it on the fourth finger of his Maiesties right hand, with the accustomed Ceremony. This done, hee tooke the Scepter from the Altar, and put it into his right hand for a marke of soueraigne power. Then hee tooke the hand of Iustice, which he put into his left hand, it being a wand hauing on the top of it a hand of Iuory.

The part where the King was anointed.

All which Ceremonies being ended, the Chancellor of France came vp to the Altar, with his face towards the King, and with a loud voyce called vp the Peeres according to their dignity and order, to assist at the Coronation. First, the Secular Peeres; and then, the Ecclesiasticall. This conuocation being ended, the Cardinall tooke the great Crowne from the Altar, and lifting it with both his hands ouer the Kings head, the Peeres came D presently to support them; and then the Cardinall holding it in his left hand blest it. After this benediction, the Cardinall alone set the Crowne vpon the Kings head: whereunto all the Peeres put their hands. In crowning him, the Cardinall holding it still with his left hand, said many prayers, and blest the King: the which being ended, hee tooke him by the right sleeue, and (in the company of all the Peeres) conducted him from the Altar to his Royall throne, which was built on high at the bottome of the Quier, that he might be seene of all the people, holding still in his hands the royall Scepter, and rod of Iustice.

The Peeres called vp to the Kings Coronation.

The Queene Regent beheld all these Ceremonies from a high Scaffold, hauing by her Queene Marguerite, and the Princesses of Conde, of Countie, of Montpenfier, of Rohan, and diuers other Ladies. She was all this while disquieted for the Kings health, not being E able to endure with patience to see his Maiesty bare headed vnder the Crowne, hauing his cap taken from him: which shewes that Crownes and Greatnes haue their discommodities as well as ordinary things and the poorest cottages.

The King being come to his royall Throne, attended by the Peeres, Princes, and Officers, according to their degrees, the Cardinall of Ioyeuse holding him by the hand, caused him to sit downe, and prayed vnto God to confirme him in his Throne, and to make him inuincible and inexpugnable against all those which should vnjustly seeke to depriue him of the Crowne which was lawfully fallen vnto him. After which the Cardinall hauing said a prayer, being bare headed, he made a low obeysance vnto the King, and kissed him, saying thrice with a loud voyce, God saue the King: and at the last he added, God saue the F King eternally. All the Peeres did the like obeysance vnto him one after another, and kist him with the like acclamation, and then returned to their seats which were prepared for them on either hand of the King. The people which were in the body of the Church, hearing the ioy of the Princes, began to cry out with a loud voyce, God saue the King, being accompanied with all sorts of Musick, Drums and Trumpets. Which done, the Heraulds who were in the bottome of the Quier, began to cast forth many peeces of gold and siluer, which were purposely coyned, hauing on the one side the Kings picture crowned, and on the other side a hand comming out of heauen, holding a Violl with the sacred Oyle, with this inscription, Francis datam munda cali. Thus much I have thought good to write for the Readers better satisfaction touching the substance of the Kings Coronation, for that it hath not bene so particularly set downe in the life of any of the precedent Kings.

As for those things which followed during the Masse, the Kings going to the offering, his receiving of the Communion, and the royall feast made in the Archbishops Palace, I must be forced to passe over with silence, fearing I should be both tedious to the Reader, and wrong the History, being tyed to strict bounds.

Ceremonies observed when the King received the Order of the Holy Ghost.

The King desiring (according to the statutes of the Order of the Holy Ghost) to receive the Coller of the same Order from the Cardinall who had anointed him, hee came the day after his coronation to the same Church to Euen-song, being attended by the officers, Prelates, and Knights of the said Order in their robes, where the ceremonies required by the said Statutes, were exactly observed. The King having his chaire of State in the Quier, came towards the high Altar, being led by the Prince of Conty, and the Earle of Soissons, all the officers of the Order going before them, where hee tooke the oath of the said Order (as head and Soueraigne thereof) in the hands of the Cardinall, laying his hand vpon the Gospell, which the Chancellor of the said Order held vnto him: which done, Antoin de Rhodes Prouost of both Orders, put on his robes, and the Cardinall put the Coller vpon his shoulders: the Seig: of Pisseux sonne to the Chancellor, and Treasurer of the said Order, deliuered vnto the Cardinall a Crosse hanging at a blew ribbon, after which his Maiestie returned to his first place, where he was saluted by all the Knights: but before his coming from the Altar, the Prince of Conde was led vp by the Dukes of Espernon and Montbasen, where he alone was made Knight of the Order by the King.

The King returns to Paris.

These ceremonies being all ended, the King returned to Paris, where he was received by Montf. de Lioncourt Gouverneur of the City, the Prouost of Merchants, the Sherifes, and two hundred Burgeses on horseback, having before them three Companies of horsemen richly appointed, who attended him without Saint Anthonies gate, where the Prouost of Merchants made a speech vnto him, shewing the desires and vowes which his most faithfull subiects of his good City of Paris made vnto God, that hee would fend him all happiness and prosperity during his reign. In the meane time the Duke of Sully, great master of the Artillery, had drawne forth of the Arsenall 93 great peeces of Ordnance, which were planted vpon the Bulwarke at Saint Anthonies gate, with a great number of Chambers, all which saluted the King at his entry. After which the King came into the City with some troopes of horse, and all his guards, being attended by many Princes, Noblemen, and officers, in great state.

In the beginning of this year, Philip the 3 King of Spaine, had by his Edict banished all the new Christians called Morisques, being in number 90000 persons, vpon pretext that they had conspired against his Estate: for the execution whereof, hee published an Edict for which there was no prouention; so as all ships and vessels were stayed in the Ports of Spaine, of what nation soeuer, to transport them whither they would. Many past from Spaine to diuers ports of Barbary. But during the whole year at diuers times, there entered into France about 15000 persons of these Morisques: whereupon King Henry the fourth being full of charity and bounty, embraced this occasion, and made a decree touching their entry and passage in France: the tenor whereof was; That having bene aduertised of a decree lately made by the King of Spaine, carrying an expresse commandement to all Morisques liuing in his Country of Spaine to depart within a short time, vpon great penalties, which he caused to be executed vpon them; and that by reason thereof great numbers of families of the sayd Morisques, were come into his Country, his Maiestie having a good intencion to vse all humanity towards them, for the receiving of them into his kingdome: that such as would make profession of the Catholike and Romish Religion, might remaine there with all safety; and as for the rest which would not, they should have passage vnto his ports of the Levant seas, from thence to be transported into Barbary, or whither they pleased. For the execution of the Kings Edict, a Commission was sent downe to Augier, Prouost generall of Languedoc, to conduct them in their passage vnto the nearest Hauens of the Levant Sea, where hee embarked at diuers times about thirty thousand which landed at Tunis in Barbary in safety.

The

A The Queene Regent being aduertised that there were 50000 Morisques of Arragon marching into France, and that there were already a great many of Grenadains in Prouence: their Maiesties being carefull of the preferuation of the said Morisques, as well to prevent the complaint of their commissaries, as to hasten their passage into Barbary, by reason of the grievances of the inhabitants of Prouence and Languedoc, touching the discommoditie of their stay, and the danger of infection, through the misery whereunto many of them were reduced: Their Maiesties sent a master of Requests with commission to free those Countries of so many Morisques, and to cause them to be transported into Barbary, without any wrong or injury done vnto them; and to have a care that the inhabitants of those Prouinces might liue in peace. The care of these embarkments was again committed to Augier, by a Commission, and Letters of recommendations from the Queene, dated the 19 of August 1610, wherein he discharged himselfe very faithfully, as it seemes by a certificate made by the Commissaries of the said Morisques; yet afterward they made great complaints against him, and others whom he had employed in these embarkments: and one Lopez, Commissary for the Morisques, went soone afterwards to the Court to complaine vnto their Maiesties: and vpon a Petition presented vnto the priuy Councell, against Augier, and some inhabitants of Agde, he obtained a Commission to call them vp.

Augier appeared vpon the summons, giues in his defences in writing, causeth a declaration to be printed of al which had past in the embarking of the Morisques, & protests that he had not medled with the impositions and taxes leauied vpon them, nor with the seizure of their goods, the searching of their Barks, nor the imprisonment of any one of them. He produced certaine certificates, shewing that hee had safely conducted 60000 Morisques through the Country of Languedoc, having caused them to be embarked at Agde with much care and diligence, and transported into Barbary with their goods in all safety. Lopez on the other side continuing his complaints, sayd that Augier, Ioseph Palmier, and Iohn Anthony Iordan, inhabitants of the towne of Agde, vnder colour of searching some vessels, to force the rich Morisques to pay for the charges of the poores embarkment, had caried away a great number of Royals of plate belonging to diuers private men: and that in these proceedings there had bene many thefts and exactions committed contrary to all right and equity. Vpon these complaints, the Councell sent the examination of the cause to the Court of Parliament, for the ease of the parties. Augier seeing this businesse to take another course then he expected, retired into Languedoc, where he lurked, and fought by all meanes to auoid the iustice of this Court: On the other side the procurer of the Morisques, pursued his complaints with all diligence, having obtained a personal adournment against Augier and some others: what succeeded wee may heare hereafter.

This year Cardinall Bellarmino had caused a Booke to be printed at Rome entituling it, A Treatise of the Popes power in Temporal causes: it came no sooner into France, but they observed many things therein against the temporal power of Kings. In this Treatise hee did strive to proue his pretended power of the Pope over Kings in temporal causes: in regard whereof, the Kings learned Councell fought out this Booke and presented it to the Court, with obseruations of such things as they found contrary to the soueraine power of Princes ordained of God, especially in the Realme of France. And on the 26 of November, Montf. de Servin the Kings first Aduocate, in the remonstrance which he made vnto the Court vpon that subiect, sayd; That all new bookes which taught that the Pope was above Kings in temporal things, should not be allowed, and that there were too many which presumed to write against Princes and temporal Estates, whereto not onely the sayd Princes, but all good subiects had reason to be offended: as of late the officers of the King of Spaine had bene against the writings of Cardinall Baronius, concerning Sicily, whereby they haue purchased a great deale of honour throughout the world: And we (sayd he) owe no lesse vnto our most Christian King, for the life, and for the honour of his Maiestie, and for the temporal of his Estates: yea if at any time it be holy, if it be iust, if it be honourable, if it be an argument of courage and loue in the French to their King and Country, to hold the Maximes of truth, and to defend the freedoms and liberties of the Gallicane Church, truly it should now chiefly appeare, during the honage of our King, reigning vnder the happy regency of the Queene his mother, the which God commands vs by the mouth of his Apostles : wherein the Pope shall not be wronged, neither shall he have any cause of discontentment : which point had been formerly contested by many grave and learned men, who have maintained, That the King of France doth not acknowledge any sovereignty on earth in temporall causes. And as for themselves who were bound to speake, being of the Kings Councell, having examined Cardinall Bellarmine Booke, they should hold themselves blame worthy to have failed of their duties, if after the murder of their late Kings Henry the third and fourth by inhumane parricides or execrable monsters, inspired and stirred up by false doctrines, they should not cry out vpon all occasions, Against the Maximes and propositions which import the life, dignity, and maiesty of the King and the Queene Regent his mother : and the Iudges of this great Parliament should be inexcusable, yea worthy of blame, not only now but hereafter, when as the King shall come to age, if in stead of receiuing this complaint as iust, they should suffer such pernicious writings to passe without a fit and seuer censur. Whereupon hee concluded, that all men of what quality or condition soever, should be forbidden to receiue, keepe, print, or cause to be printed, this booke of Bellarmino, vpon paine to be declared guilty of high treason in the first degree : and all men enioyned, which haue, or may haue, know, or may know, where any one is within the Realme, to declare it to the Iudges of the place, or to the substitutes of the Kings proctor generall, to be suppressed exemplarily, as being a doctrine contrary to the dignity, authority, and sovereignty royall, and tending to cause the subject to reuolt against the King, and to attempt against his life and Estate : And that inhibitions might be made vnto all persons vpon the same penalty, to write or teach in Schooles or elsewhere the like doctrine. The great Chamber, the Tunnelle, and the Chamber of the Edit, being assembled vpon this motion, the Court made a decree against *Bellarmino*es booke, according to the conclusion of the Kings Aduocate, whereof the Popes Nuncio made many complaints vnto the Kings Councell, seeking by all means to haue this same decree suspended.

Death of Du Haillant Historiographer of France.

I will end this year with the death and end of a famous Historiographer, who was much honoured by the French : I meane Bernard de Gerrard Seig. of Haillant, who died being 75 years old. Henry the third, to requite the paines hee tooke in the first booke of his French History, rewarded him with a place of a Secretary of the Treasury. Afterwards D having dedicated his History of France vnto him, the which he had collected out of ancient Authors, as the first body of a History attired in a French habit, hee honoured him with the place of a Councillor and Historiographer of France, the which he made a settled office, with a fee of 1200 Crowne a year. Since, he made a Treatise of the successe of the affaires of France, and other booke. He had the office of Genealogist of the Knights of the Order of the Holy Ghost, at the creation of this Order. King Henry the third loued him for that he was well scene in the History of France, for his freedom of speech, and for his quick answers and replies.

The second year of this reigne.
Hatred and iuelousies among the Nobles.

Since the Kings Coronation, which was in October last past, vntill the beginning of this year, hatred, enuy, iuelousies and discontents began to grow amongst the greatest of the Kingdome ; some for preferment of governments, addition of offices and dignities, and for increase of fees and pensions ; others for gratuities giuen to some in secret, which before the end of the year did much disquiet and trouble both the King, Queene, and Councell, how to containe euery one in his dutie, and in good correspondency one with another, for the quiet of the State, and the Kings seruice. And for that many vpon this subject, retired themselves daily from Court, and did not attend their Maiesties as they were bound by their births and callings, but kept the field with troopes of horse, (which bred a iuelousie that there were some designs to the preiudice of the publike peace and tranquillity) the King being assisted by the Queene Regent his mother, with the aduice of many Princes, Dukes, Noblemen and officers of the Crowne, ordained in his Councell of State, F that all Noblemen, Gentlemen, and officers of the Crowne and House of France, bound thereunto by any wages or pensions from his Maiesty, should (within one month after the publication thereof) repaire to Court, there to attend, and to doe their personal seruice ; and in case of disobedience, to lose all their dignities, offices, priuiledges, fees, and pensions. And at the same time commandement was sent from their Maiesties to many towns, not to suffer any to enter so strong as they might prescribe them a law, yet wholly relying on their faith and loyalties, without any other prouision for their safeties.

A This decree being come to the notice of the said Noblemen which were absent, euery man prepared himselfe to obey. In the winter-time all came to Paris, but with such trains as it did somewhat amaze the Citizens ; but the Queene to preuent all attempts which might trouble the peoples quiet, and seeing the daily quarrels and challenges among many great men, marching as well by day as by night, through the Citie and suburbs, followed by many Gentlemen well armed and mounted, shee fought to stay the course, and preuent the execution of many designs, commanding the inhabitants to haue their armes ready, to come forth armed at all seasons, vpon any, which should quarrell vpon any pretext whatsoever : the which did somewhat abate the courage of such as had a will to doe evil ; and yet their hatred growing through enuy and priuate iuelousies, dyed not, vntill the Queene had taken away the cause by another meanes. For, considering that they who during the life of the deceased King, were kept in awe by the only feare they had to lose his fauor, would hardly now yeeld vnto the King her sonne the seruice and obedience due vnto him for the many honors and fauors done them by their Maiesties ; and that he which was formerly content with ten, would not now be satisfied with any hundred ; and in a word, that all this mischief tended onely to make themselves great during the Kings minority : the Queene Regent had recourse to meanes not befitting the dignity of the King, to containe the authors of these crosses in their duties, to auoid a worse inconuenience which the necessity of the time did extort, distributing honors, offices, pensions, and gratuities among the Nobility : so as more Gentlemen of note and quality were gratified then by the deceased King ; and more companies of men of armes were entertained ; by which meanes all things seemed quiet : yet their discontents burst out againe ; for on the third of Ianuary the whole Loure was full of drawne swords vpon a light quarrell betweene the two first Gentlemen of the Kings chamber, Monsi. de Belgarde Master of the Horse, and the Marquis d'Ancre ; the which notwithstanding was presently reconciled by her Maiesties commandement.

The Parisians
commanded to haue their arms
ready.

This was no sooner reconciled, but an accident begot another ; but between other personages, betweene Princes of the blood, and between two brethren, to wit, the Prince of Conty, and the Earle of Soissons, which also engendered another, that without the Queen Regents preuention might haue plunged France into the like troubles it was in during the quarrels of the Houses of Orleans and Bourgoyny. And thus they hapned.

On Monday the 10 of Ianuary about foure or five a clock at night, the Prince of Conty going to the Loure in his Carrosse, with foure or five of his followers on horse-back, met with the Earle of Soissons his brother, in his Carrosse also, being followed by eightene or twenty on horse-backe : and for that the street was encombred, one of the Carrosses must of force stay to let the other passe. The Gentleman of the Earles horse, not knowing the Princes Coach-man, would haue caused him to stay, commanding to goe backe with threats (as commonly they doe which accompany such Princes, and are many times the cause of great quarrels) which being heard by those which were in the Princes Carrosse, he commanded the Coach-man to put forwards his horses, and to passe on at what time they which were with the Earle told him, that it was the Prince ; he presently sent a Gentleman to make his excuse for the error, which had beene committed by the indiscretion of the Gentleman of his horse, beseeching him to beleue that it was without any designe, and that hee was his most humble seruant. Notwithstanding, the Prince in passing cryed out vnto him, To morrow we will try it out in our shirts. The Queene Mother (being instantly aduertised of what had past) sent to the Earle of Soissons, commanding him to keepe his lodging vntill shee had reconciled the businesse : And at the same instant she commanded the prince of Conde, and afterwards the Duke of Guise (who was brother in law to the prince of Conty) to visit the said prince the next day, and dispose him to an accord, F seeing that what had past was not done with any designe : and that the Earle of Soissons should send the party to him who had committed this indiscretion, to craue his pardon.

tweene the Prince of Con-ty and the Earle of Soissons.

Both went according to the Queenes commandement, but not together. The prince of Conde going in his Carrosse, with foure Gentlemen onely on horse-backe, encountered with the Duke of Guise at port Buffy, accompanied with an 150 horse coming from the prince of Conty ; he told him that hee had disposed the prince to refer himselfe vnto his iudgement for his satisfaction ; for the which he gaue him great thanks. The Duke caused his brother the Cheualier du Guise to accompany him to the prince of Conty ; and to put him him in minde of his promise, he himselfe also offering to accompany him, but he refused it. So the Prince of Contry having confirmed to his Nephew the Prince of Conde what he had spoken to the Duke of Guife, that quarrell was ended.

But vpon the report which was at the same instant made vnto the Earle of Soissons, that the Duke of Guife went through the City with 150 horse to braue him: that hee had past by his house to make shew of his troope: that all those which were with him had coats of male, and that he had caused fifty to be bought: that they had heard these words spoken by the Prince of Contry's followers, I am sworn to the King, to the Queene, and to the Duke of Orleans. Finally, that all this was not without some proiect against him, considering what had past for the yong Lady of Montpensier promised to the duke of Orleans, whom they of Bourbon desired as being of their blood and House, seeing the Duchesse dowager of Montpensier her mother was newly married to the Duke of Guife. This report I say bred a quarrell betweene the Earle of Soissons, and the Duke of Guife. The Queene was suddenly aduertised hereof, who sent Monsi. de Vitry Captaine of the Guard to remaine with the duke of Guife & his brethren, and to command them to keep their lodgings vntill he had otherwise determined. About two of the clocke in the afternoon, the Earle of Soissons came to the Loure to the Queene. A Councell was called, where there assisted the Constable, the Dukes of Epernon, Sully & Bouillon, the Chancellor, President lanin, the Marshalls of Brisac and Boisdaphe, with the M. of the horse.

The Constable demanded iustice of the Queene against the Duke of Guife, who had gone out of his lodging with 150 horse to braue the Earle of Soissons. The Duke of Sully took the speech vpon him for Monsi. de Guife, and said vnto the Queene: Madam, the demand which my Lord the Constable maketh vnto you is very reasonable, and you owe iustice to all your subiects, and especially to Princes of the blood: but you must understand whereof they complain. There can nothing be alledged, but that the D. of Guife went out of his lodging with 150 horse to braue the Earle of Soissons. I haue not seene Monsi. de Guife, but as far as I can learne from some of his with whom I spake euen now, he went in the morning from his wifes lodging by your Maiesties commandement, to try if he might dispoile the Prince of Contry his brother in law to a reconciliation with the Earle of Soissons; that without passing before the Earles lodging which was his neerest way, he had gone through S. Honoris street and so ouer the new bridge, with an intent that if he had met with the Earle, to haue saluted him and given him the way, for that he hath no quarrell vnto him but is his seruant. Moreouer, that the Duke of Guife seeing his company greater when he came from the Prince of Contry, then when hee went thither, he would not come directly to your Maiestie to giue an account of what hee had done, but retired himselfe to his owne house. The Dukes of Epernon and Bouillon confirmed the same.

This excuse was presently sent to be propounded to the Earle of Soissons, to see if hee would rest satisfied. He refused foure of them which were in Councell, pretending their strict friendship and neere alliance with the Duke of Guife. In the end it was concluded that the quarrell should be ended by a discourse which the Queene should make, whereunto the Duke of Guife should answer. There were many difficulties on the forme of this discourse, wherein that day and the next were spent. Vpon these alterations the Burgesses were commanded to arme in those quarters which were neerest to the Loure. Whether it were vpon the leaue of an old quarrell (although compounded) betweene the Earle of Soissons and the duke of Sully, or for any other intention, the Marquis of Rhodny his sonne, the duke of Rohan his son in law, and all their friends which were many (for pensioners doe alwaies follow those that gouerne the treasure) went to the D. of Guife, who being assisted by them of his family, and those which were allied vnto him, shewed himselfe with a great troope of Princes and Nobility, going to visit the duke of Maine, to demand his aduice touching the forme of the discourse which they would haue him make vnto the Queene. The Duke of Maine came vnto the Loure and saw the Queene, who in the beginning complained to see that such a received pension from the king her son, did not assist him, but sided with the one or the other party. Her Maiesty knew well that this quarrell (if it were not reconciled) would haue a fatal end, imitating the deceased King her husband, who would not suffer any quarrell in his Court vnderdred: told the Dukes of Maine and Bouillon, that her pleasure was, it should be speedily ended: That the

A the would haue the honor of the Princes of the blood preferred, that whosoever attempted against them did as much as if they had affronted the King her sonne. The Duke of Maine besought her, that the honour of his House might not be committed to the judgement of passionate men: that they and their friends had serued her Maiesty vnto her Regency: that they had no interest but the preferuacion of the State vnder the lawfull authority of their Maiesties, and that he had rather see them all dead, then to see them faile in the respect & obedience which they did owe them. In the end they all thought it good that the duke of Maine should say vnto the Queene for the D. of Guife, that which was contained in a writings which they had caused to be drawne, but in the absence of both the parties. The next day being the 14. of the month, about two of the clocke in the afternoon, the D. of Maine came to effect her Maiesties pleasure; where in the presence of the king, Queene, Princes & Noblemen of the Court, he spake these words for the D. of Guife. Madam, vpon the opinion that my Lord the Earle of Soissons hath had, that that which passed on Tuesday, hath given him some occasion to complaine of mee, I can assure your Maiesty, that I had no thought nor intention to gine him cause, and should be very sorry to haue done it, contrariwise, if I had encountered him, I would haue done him the honour which is due vnto him, desiring to remain his most humble seruant. Whereupon the Queen answered; I am glad of that which you say vnto me, and rest satisfied. Hereupon the Prince of Conde had presently charge to repaire vnto the Earle of Soissons, to acquaint him with what had past, and to command him to conforme himselfe to her Maiesties will: the which he promised to doe. And so this quarrell was ended by the Regents widome: and these Princes did afterwards make shew that they had forgotten it.

Within 3 daies after there grew another quarrell neere vnto the Queenes chamber, but he that had committed the offence (although he were of quality) was glad to submit himselfe vnto the Bastile, from whence the Queene soon after freed him. This example made them more wile and circumspect: And to the end that St. Germaines Faire, should not be an occasion to breed new quarrels, her Maiesty would not suffer it to be kept this year. But being told that many Merchants would breake and become bankrupt if it did faile: she answered, it were better 500 Merchants were ruined (the which will not happen) then France should fall into combustion.

All things being reasonable well quieted and settled in France; In the beginning of this year, the Councell beganne to consult of that which might concerne the discharge and ease of the State, & of the kings subiects. First, there were propounded the complaints and grieuances of the Inhabitants and townes vpon the riuier of Loire, touching the great commodities the Country had suffered during the last troubles, by the Garison of the Towne and Castle of Amboise: wherefore to secure the Country and to free the Inhabitants from future feare, it was concluded in Councell to giue vnto Monsi. du Gast (who was Gouernour of the said Castle) a certaine summe of money in regard of his seruices, and to resigne it into the Kings hands.

for the Castle
of Amboise.

Next, they tooke into their considerations, the Citadell of Bourg in Bresse; their Maiesties being informed what great sums of money were yearly employed for the payement of that Garison; In regard whereof, and for that it had bene built by the Duke of Sauoy, expressly to annoy France, for the losse whereof he was still grieued, and might well haue some intelligences to surprize it: it was ordained (with the consent of the councell) That the Citadell should be razed to assure France on that side, and that the money which should be employed for payment of the garison should be giuen to Monsi. de Baiffe, who was gouernour thereof, both in regard of his disbursements, and recompence of his seruices, the which should no way incommode the King, but rather ease his coffers, by the sparing of so much money as was to be paid yearly to the Garison. This demantelling did free them of Lions, and the neighbour Countries from feare of future alterations.

About the same time, the French Ambassadour residing for the King with the Grisons, had charge to deliuer the reasons which did import France vpon the new pursuure of the Venecians, for the renewing of their League with the Grison Cantons, before he should engage the Kings name and reputation: for calling to minde the accidents which had befallen those Cantons, after their first league with Venice, and had bene allowed by the deceased King, (whereof he afterwards repented himselfe, when as he saw it did preiudice his owne) and had plunged that Nation into great confusions and miseries, ries, the memory whereof was alwaies renewed if they did but cast their eyes vpon the A Fort of Fuentes, built vpon the frontier of their Country, after the first League made with Venice, and vpon that occasion: yet their Maiesties desiring to fauour those commonalties, in imitation of the deceased King, gaue charge to their Ambassadour, that the capitulations of the first league should be perused before it were renewed, to reforme what might be preiudiciall to that of France, and that the Ambassadour of the said Canons residing at Paris, should confer with his Maiesties Councell touching the same.

Soone after the reconciliation of the Earle of Soissons, and the duke of Guise, the duke of Sully resigned his places of superintendant of the Treasure, and Captaine of the Bastille into the Queenes hand.

This bred admiration in many, to see a man of his worth and merit, dismissed without crime, hauing beene so faithfull a seruant to the deceased King his Master, and so good a Husband for the State. Men spake diuersly of this action, some said hee did it voluntarily of his owne free-will, and by the aduice of his friends, considering the hatred this charge had gotten him in seruing his King and Country faithfully: and now finding that by the death of his Prince he had lost all hope hereafter quietly to execute his place, he gaue way to the will of the enemies of his prosperity, and desisted willingly, yea (as they say) by the Queenes aduice: who when as he resigned the keyes of the Bastille, and of the Kings treasure into her hands, made offer vnto him of a recompence in money, the which he refused, beseeching her Maiestie to keepe in memory the seruices which he had done C vnto France vnder the deceased King. After which he wrote this following Letter vnto her, the which I haue set downe verbatim, hoping thereby to giue the Reader much content, in acquainting him in what Estate France stood at the old Kings death.

Madam, among all the honorable conditions of a French gentleman, I haue alwaies most esteemed that, to be employed in the most important affaires of his Country, to gouerne them happily, and to obey the Commandements of his Prince. For many yeares I haue managed the chiefe of this Estate, with an vnexpected successe, I haue caried them from a deepe gulfe of misery, to the height of all glory: And now Madam, I obey your expresse will and desire, I deliuer into your hands, the two goodliest markes of my good Masters fauour and bounty, the Bastille and the Treasure, I held them during his life, I yeeld them vnto you after his death, and will content my selfe, that the effects of my seruice remaine for euer grauen in the hearts of your subiects: Some one lesse faithfull then my selfe would fill all France with his complaints: but my perpetual deuotion to the place of my birth, and to my King, strikes my tongue dumbe, and makes mee rather seeke the cause of so great a change in mine owne incapacity, then in any other consideration. One thing Madam much disquiets my minde: which is, your Maiesties absolute resolution to haue me take money in recompence of my offices, not for that I doe not conceiue how necessary this expedient is for the good of your seruices; but on the other side, it is so contrary to my demands, as notwithstanding all the power I haue ouer my selfe to please you, yet haue I not enough to accept thereof. Nay I am forced to refuse it, and to preferre (contrary to my duty in this subiect,) my owne priuate interest before that of you Maiestie. Of all the meanes propounded vnto mee to leaue my charge, this should be most odious vnto me, and in truth I abhorre it, and hold it to proceede from the malice of mine enemies, not from your Maiesties bounty: For Madame, why doe they not rather lay this pretext, vpon my sower disposition, vnsofiable, without gratification or dissimulation, or vpon the bad order I haue taken in my charges; or that I haue beene a bad husband in managing of the Treasure, and vpon the miseries which haue ensued; vpon the strong intelligences which I haue practised both within and without the Realme; and vpon the great care I haue taken to settle my selfe for the preferation of my fortunes? Why Madame, haue they not rather made choice of these grounds then of another, which hath lesse shew of truth? For to publish that I leuer demanded recompence for my office of the Treasure, other then the place of a Marshall of France, it can neuer bee truly maintained: The malice of mine enemies, nor pleasing of some of my friends, shall neuer be able to iustifie the contrary. And if your Maiestie charge mee, to haue my selfe made offer vnto you of all that I did ioy, I confesse it: I cannot deny but I haue often assured your Maiestie, that whatsoever depended on me was at your deuotion, yea my life it selfe. But truly Madam, I did not then thinke that to make such offers to his Prince, was a crime sufficient

A sufficient to dispossesse him of his dignities. If you conceiue it so now it is a Maxime which seemeth new to me: but this nouelty shall neuer make me repent to haue done my duty. Contrariwise I againe offer vnto your Maiestie, not only my honours and goods, but my life it selfe, and that of my children, the which I doe not with condition, but to dispose of at your pleasure, yea, were it to honor my very enemies, if to take them simply from me may not content you. If my actions past haue serued for the increase of this Crowne, I will that my obedience shall shew the way to preserve it; and whatsoever mine enemies shall publish of my loue to what I hold, or howe neuer other mens humors may perswade beliefe, yet Madam, it is true that I will abandon whatsoever my seruices haue gotten mee, with more resolution and constancy, then another shall enioy them with pleasure: It shall suffice me to heare in my solitarie how your Maiestie shall daily make this Scepter more flourishing, maintaine good order in the affaires; and keepe treasure in your coffers sufficient to maintaine this Estate, which doth chiefly subsist by the support of these two pillars. With this will I quietly entertaine my idle thoughts, and comfort my selfe in the losse of my good King, without being forced (if it please you) to accept any other recompence for my offices then the contentment to receive none, and the honor of your expresse commandement. Yet notwithstanding for your last resolution, and not to shew my selfe disobedient vnto your will, if your Maiestie haue absolutely decreed to the contrary: behold then the greatest fauour which I most humbly beseech you to recompence mee withall, is; that it would please you to command my greatest enemies to goe instantly to the chamber of Accompt to verifie the profit or preiudice of my cares and watches for these 12 yeares; and if they finde not, that during this time vnder the power of my great King, I haue assisted much by my dexterity and labour to roote out the greatest confusion that euer was in the finances of France: That I haue besides the sparing of eight millions of Liuers yearly for the which they are accomplable to his Offices, besides the payment of all the charges, of all the ordinary expences of the State, of all waies for Soueraigne Courts, of all ment of Warre, Garisons, Embassies, the Kings Houle, Voyages, Mariages, Presents, Recompences, and a thousand other charges too long to repeat: Besides all these ordinary great summes without the increase of any taxes or impositions within the Realme, but diminished them. If they find not I say that moreouer for the interrainment of three great Armies, whereof the one tooke Amiens, another reduced Britaine, and the third conquered Breffe and Sauoy. I caused about 12 Millions to be furnished extraordinarily. For the discharge of the debts of France growne by treaties and otherwise about 25 millions: for the payment of the debts in Switzerland, Germany, Italy, and England, about 30 Millions: for the payment of Pensions, within and without the Realme, about 28 Millions: for the succoring of foraigne Prouinces about 8 millions: for the repairing of the Artillery, fortifications, waies and buildings about 6 millions: for the ease and reliefe of the poore, about 6 millions: And to deliuer in treasure into the Coffers at the Bastille, or to leaue in the custodie of the Treasurer, about 12 Millions: To discharge many other expences which may bee easily verified about 10 Millions. If I haue not caused contracts to be past for the redeeming of the Crown lands engaged, whereof the greatest part are daily executed, these redemptions amounting to about 40 millions. Finally Madam, if I haue not by my care and vigilancy practised all these courses of sparing: and if to continue the same duty towards France, I haue not alwaies offered vnto your Maiestie to lose my life, or to maintaine the affaires in the same splendour, yea to represent them in a higher degree: If I haue not done all these things, and more, I then submit my selfe to receiue for a punishment of my presumption, that recompence which you ordaine me in the losse of my honor and Offices. But Madam, if no one of these Articles be found false, but in that they are too sparing, and if my first affection hath receiued no change, but is more fortified, suffer mee to endure the harme which is done me, and not to accept the good you offer me. Take my places without this heauie burden: or if you will of necessity honor me with some fauour, let it bee (if it please you) only with the peremall remembrance of my fidelity, a fauour which I craue your Maiestie, not to be called againe to the painfull toile of affaires, but only to suffer mee to liue in peace, at the memory of one who is the Regent of my Country, the liuing soule of my Master, and the mother of my King. And doubleless Madam, it is an honour, and the last acknowledgement which your Maiestie cannot iustly denie me: for seeing that although ling.

1611 whom I have offended in the execution of my place, labour to see mee deprived; with A greater reason they may well remember my seruices with triumph.

Farewell my house, farewell fort, which I haue had in guard about 12, yeares: farewell Temple of the Goddesse Moneta, which hath bred me so many cares: suffer me now to depart being weary of affaires, and send me to a private life, where I may haue no such troubles: I am he, who strong in spirit and courage haue managed the treasure of the King and Kingdome; to whom the happinesse of this estate augmented in new reuen-ues, and the Coffers of our young Master, filled by iust and lawfull meanes, is bound for the good order which I haue settled. I haue had great honours and received great re-compences for my industrious care: I haue had great power and authority vnder a B great King; but in a moment, in this bloody fall, I haue seene it all fall to ruine, in the same disaster: I haue seene all this ruine quenched which hath made many to threaten me often with ruine, whilst I endeauored the good of the State, and sought onely to get the fauour of my Master, not caring for great men, nor knowing how to seeke an applaus of the people, being still constant in this designe. But now depart from me all troublesome cares, I haue resolved to retire my ship into a safe Port: it may bee the State haui lost me, will finde whereunto I was profitable, and the people will know it: then, but too late, fauour and affection will succeed hatred; but I haue not mine owne interest in such effecme, as I desire to gaine by the miseries of my Country; But O God make the fortunes of this Kingdom alwaies to stand in good estate, that I may neuer see it ouerthrowne C and that it may haue no cause to lament me.

After this the Duke of Sully in the beginning of Februarie, left the Court of France, and retired himselfe of his Towne of Sully vpon the riuier of Loite.

The slanderous accusation of D'Escoman
condemned.

Let vs now turne to some memorable executions of Iustice. In the beginning of this year, there was a most slanderous accusation made by a woman, wife to a poore Gentleman, whose name was Iſaac de Varennes, Seigneur of D'Escoman. This woman was crook't back't and lame, but of an active spirit; a great talker, subtile, cunning and of a great memorie, but of a lewd and vicious life. Being in poverty & want, and newly gotten out of prison, she thought to frame an accusation whereby shee hoped to releue herselfe and to advance her fortune. She had obserued that Queene Marguerit came often for deuotion D to Saint Victors Church, where this D'Escoman tooke occasion to speake vnto her, beseeeching her to heare her, and that shee would discouer some matter which did concerne the life of the King and Queene Regent his mother. Queene Marguerit remembering that shee had seene her, and that shee had refused her seruice for her bad life, would not heare her: whereupon shee cryed out, that if the bad designe, whereon depended their Maie-ties liues should take effect, the blame should be laid vpon her: whereupon the Queene commanded shee should be caried to her lodging, where after dinner shee heard her in pri-uate, where shee accused diuers persons of quality to bee guilty of the murder of the deceased King; which although the Queene held to be calumnious, yet perfectly aduertised the Queene Regent thereof, desiring that some might be sent to heare what shee had said. Shee was afterwards committed to prison and examined by the first President, and vpon her accusation two were committed to prison: shee also charged the Marquis of Vernueil, and a Gentlewoman whose name was Tiller, that they were familiar with Ra- uillaz, and acquainted with the Kings death; but vpon further examination and confrontation of them which were accused, her owne tongue discovered the slander, whereupon the Court declared Godin and Sauvage, (who had continued long in prison) and all others whom shee had accused to be innocent of the most abominable parricide committed on the person of the deceased King: and condemned the said D'Escoman to end her daies mured vp betwixt four wales.

A Magician executed at Aix.

The Court of Parliament of Aix in Prouence, proceeded also criminally against a notable Magician or forcerer, called Lewis Gausfridy a Priest borne in Prouence and benedi-ced at Marfeilles. He was accused of Rape, seducing of Virgins, Impiety, Magicks, Sorcery, and other abominations, all which hee confessed vnder his owne hand, and was therefore arraigned, and condemned to bee deliuered into the hands of the executioner, and to be led through all the streets of Aix and before the Cathedrall Church, to doe penance his head and feet bare, and a halter about his necke, holding a burning Torch in his hand, and there vpon his knees to craue pardon of God, the King, and the Iustice: which

A which done he should beled to the Preachers place in the said City, and there to be burnt vntill his bodie and bones were consumed to ashes and those to bee cast into the winde, and his goods to be confiscate to the King. That before his execution hee should bee put to the Racke, to draw from his owne mouth the truth of his complices; yet before the said execution they were to deliuer him into the hands of the Bishop of Marfeilles his Diocelaine, or in his absence to some other Prelate to bee degraded according to the accusation. All which was duly put in execution according to the decree the last day of Aprill. Whilst the people expected his execution, a very modest Gentleman whose name was Eprade, who was contracted to a Presidents daughter, was stabbed and murdered behind by Montauraux, a Knight of Malta in the fight of three thousand perions, and yet none could stay the murderer. A childe fell from a tree and was slaine:
and a young Gentleman was wounded by the same Knight with his dagger. These were the misfortunes which that wicked forcerer had foretold should happen to them which should come to see him die.

What hapned at the execution of the Priest

The first President de Harlay, hauing serued the most Christian Kings faithfully, & late in the seat of Iustice almost 29 yeares in the first Court of Parliament of France, whereof he was the head, seeing himselfe charged with yeares, his health impayred, and his sight de-cayed, hee craued leave of the Queene Regent to giue ouer this great charge, and entreated her to provide some other for the place. Her Maiesty vpon this request made choice of C Monſi de Verdan, who was first President of Thoulouze, and caused him to be advanced to that place, into the which hee entered at the opening of the pleadings after Easter. I must needs confesse of Achilles de Harlay, that being inimitable in the wonderfull expedition he vsed in doing Iustice, giuing audience rather to meane and poore people then to rich, he hath left the world know, that he hath neuer fought any other recompence for so great travell for the common wealth, then the conscience to haue done well. In like manner the diuers gratifications and praises, which the good wits of Languedoc caused to be printed in the honour of the first President de Verdan, witness how much that prouince was grieved for the departure of such a personage; and that the good Iustice hee had done in the Parliament should be alwaies liuing in their memories. As soone as he came to bee head of the Parliament at Paris, he suppressed the liberties which many officers of iustice and their Clarks had taken, as well in the exercise of their charges, as in their apparel.
In like manner they which kept tabling Houses for Cards and Dice, were presently called in question, and many were committed to prison: whereupon the King made a declaration, by the which hee did expressly forbid all persons of what qualitie and condition soe-uer, to keepe any Tabling houses in any Towne or part of his Realme, nor assemble together to play at Cards and Dice: forbidding all owners of houses and others, to let their houses to any one which shall keepe gaming, vpon paine of an arbitrary fine, and other punishment; and to be answerable in their owne names for all the money which should be lost, and bound to make restitution. Inioyning the ordinary Iudges in euery towne to transport themselves vnto such houses and places where they shall be certified that such Tabling houses are, or other like assemblies; to seize vpon such as they should find, together with their money, jewels, and other things exposed to play, and to distribute the said money to the poore of the Hospitall to whom hee did adiuage it; and in like manner to proceed against those gamesters, and against the landlords and housekeepers by the way of Proceſſe, as breakers of his lawes and ordinances. This in the beginning was very well observed, but soone after, some great personages dispensed themselves, which was not well done; for that their houses could not be searched by any officers with safety: so by little and little this wicked custome is in danger to creep in againe.

This yeare the second of May, the King being at Fontain-leau, assisted by the Queene
Regent his mother, vpon information that Chastelleraut, where his Maiesty had giuen leave for his subjects of the reformed Religion, to make a generall assembly of some deputies of euery Prouince, would be very discommodious for them; for that it was not able to lodge them, and that the Towne of Saumur, which is not farre off, would accommodate them better: his Maiesty, desiring to entreat them fauorably, and for some other private considerations, by the advice of the Queene Regent his mother, ordained that the Assembly which had bene assigned at Chastelleraut, should be transferred to Saumur, and to that end, commandement should be giuen to the deputies generall of them of the

religion remaining in Court, to give speedy advertisement to all those which should be chosen Deputies in the generall assembly, to repaire to Saumur: in testimony whereof the King signed them a Briefe.

Hereupon the Deputies of the reformed Churches came from all parts of France vnto Saumur, where the Assembly began the 27 of May, in the Towne-house. There appeared in this Assembly 70 Deputies, that is to say, 30 Gentlemen, 20 Ministers, 16 Ancients or Deputies for the Commons, and 4 Deputies for the Towne and government of Rochel. There assisted at this Assembly, the Dukes of Tremouille, Bouillon, and Sully, vpon request made vnto them by many provinces and by the Assembly: and the Duke of Rohan with his brother Monsi de Subize, Deputies of Britanny: the Earle of Penias, and Monsi de la Force, entreated by the Province of basse Guyenne: Monsi de Chastillon, for basse Languedoc: The Marquis of Servieres, for high Guienne: the Seigneur of Belugnon sent from the Marshal DeSiquieres: the Seigneurs of Parabel, la Boulay, Pleffis Mornay, & the Seigneurs of Villarnoul and Miranda, generall Deputies for the reformed Churches to remain in Court, with many other Gentlemen of good note.

The holding of this Assembly did minifter matter of talke amongst all the Townes of France, for the like had not bene seene, where there were so many Dukes and great Noblemen of the Religion, especially during the minority of a King: There was also a general brute throughout all France, that they had obtained from the deceased King a generall establishment of their religion: and that now they would of the five articles which were concluded amongst them at the assembly at Millaud, enioy those two which were not yet granted, that is to say, two places of surety in every province where they had not any; and that the tithes which they ought vnto their Curates, they would have them employed in the entertainment of their Ministers: and moreover, that they had a desire to sweate a new vnion, to maintain themselves in the governments, charges, honors, and dignities, which they had received from the deceased King: and that in all the places which they of the religion held, besides those which had bin granted them by the Briefe in the yeare 1595, they would maintaine themselves in the vnion of their Churches.

The Queene Regent vpon these brutes, sent the Duke of Elpernon, into his governments of Xaintonge, Angoumois, and Lymousin, to give order that no firs nor alterations might happen. The Prince of Conde had received commandement to goe into his government of Guienne; and their Majesties sent Letters to the Iurats of Bourdeaux, to receive him with all honour due to such a Prince their Governour, which they performed accordingly, as you shall heare hereafter.

This first act made at the Assembly at Saumur, was a generall vnion of the reformed Churches, which the Deputies did promise and sweare to keepe inuolably vnder his Majesties protection, as it had bene agreed in precedent Assemblies; and to procure the obseruation thereof in all places, and especially in those provinces which had sent them, and in those places where they should remaine. Moreover, to propound and give all aduice in that Assembly, what they should thinke in their consciences to be conformable to reason and equity, and not otherwise; and that laying aside all passion and bad affection, they should asme at nothing but the honour of God, the good, quiet, and advancement of the said Churches, the seruice of his Majesty, and of the Queene Regent, and of all the royall issue, and the preservation of the Estate, with diuers other Articles, which for breuities sake I must omit.

The Assembly, treating of an Article into the body of their grievances, touching the maintaining of them of the religion, in the Estates, offices, honours, and dignities which they enioyed, and restoring of them which have bene dispossest: The Company exhorted the Duke of Sully, entreating of the recompence which had bene promised him for his places, to insist rather to haue it in safety and honour, then commodity and profit. They gave charge to the generall Deputies of the Churches, humbly to beseech the King to give contentment vnto the Duke of Sully: and they requested the Duke of Sully, and the Marquis of Rohan his sonne, not to give ouer those places which they yet enioyed, namely, that of great master of the Artillery: and if in that respect or any other, he should be prest by any indee, vnlawfull and extraordinary meanes: It was decreed to make a demonstration that they held the Duke of Sullyes interest vnited to that of the Generall of the Churches, and to assist him by all due and lawful meanes: whereof the Generall Deputies Noblemen came to the assembly.

Diuers brutes were hung the assembly at Saumur.

The Prince of Conde sent to his government of Guienne.

A generall vnion made by the reformed Churches.

A putes should haue charge in their instructions. Vpon the subiect of this decree, there was a speech made vnto the Assembly by the Duke of Sully, published to the world in these words.

My Masters, seeing it hath pleased this company to be informed by mine owne mouth, how matters haue past touching my admission from my charges of Superintendant of the Treasure, and Capraine of the Bastille, I will endeavour to satisfie their desire, and yet not tire them with any long discourse, both for that my memory hath alwayes ayimed at substantiall things, rather then multitudes of words; as also for that the matter requires I should represent it plainly and simply. I will tell you then my Masters, that I haue bene advertised from diuers Provinces, that many Churches and priuate men my friends were wonderfully scandalized and offended, for that I gaue no advertisement before I desisted from the execution of my places, neither haue since giuen them any accompt of the proceedings which haue bene held to that end: considering that the Queene had so much honoured them, as to write into diuers parts: whereof I humbly beseech you to excuse me, and not to beleuee that I haue committed this error through negligence, contempt, or forgetting the respect which is due vnto you; neither yet vpon any presuming confidence of your loues towards me: But many lawfull causes haue inuited me to take this course, whereof I will offer two vnto you: The first, That they vied such precipitation, as it was impossible for me to demand aduice: And the second: That I could not write but I must wrong the truth, or some persons to whom I will beare respect. They haue also published, that I gaue ouer my places willingly. Whereunto I will answer, That I haue alwayes so inured my selfe to yeeld all respect and seruice to my Kings and Superiors, as I presently submitted my selfe to whatsoever they required of mee, but rather through obedience then election. And as for the recompence of my places, if they had treated amiably with me, I would rather haue chosen a recompence in honour and safety, then in profit & vilitie: but I beleuee in that respect things are yet as they were; for whatsoever any one hath said, I will protest truly that I haue not receiued any kind of recompence, neither would I demand any without the aduice of this Assembly, whom I entreat to giue me counsell vpon foure points. First, if I shall leave matters in the estate they are in without any further instance. Secondly, Whether I shall demand my reestablishment plainly. Thirdly, Whether I shall submit my selfe to the recompence they haue offered me, and demand it. Fourthly, Whether I shall insist to receive a recompence of honour and safety, rather then of profit. Wherein I will absolutely follow what shall be resolved by you. I beseech you my masters examine this business well, and consider whether it be to be held merely priuate, or to be annexed to the interest of the publique; whether it bee depending on the Edict, and may be drawne in consequence, against all such as make profession of the religion, and so be held a breach of the same: For if you iudge that I alone haue the interest, this company then shall not need to trouble themselves any further, the which I referre vnto your wilddomes, not seeking to draw you to one resolution more then to another. Moreover, I will tell you freely, that I impute not any thing which hath past, vnto the Queene; for I know well, that if her owne inclination had bene followed, there had bene no alteration in my offices, or else they would haue giuen me a recompence to mine owne liking. I will not spend tinte to represent vnto you two points not to be contradicted. The first is, The satisfaction the King had: the second, The estate wherein the affaires were when I was called thereunto, and how I left them. I doubt not but the oath of the vnion which I haue taken and signed, and the representation which I now make, will much encrease their spleens against me: I haue therefore iust cause to craue the full assistance of all our Churches, not that I desire they should proceed to any alteration: for euen when I parted from Court, I resolved to lettle my minde to rest, without any complaint, or referring any discontent, rather yet to make any instance to be restored to my places, or to demand any recompence: For had I not bene advertised, that many in this Assembly complained for that I had not acquainted them with these things; and that at Court they did protest to write from me some other of my places, or so to crosse me in the execution thereof, as I should be forced to leaue them; I sweare vnto you that I would neuer haue attempted to speak in this place. And to let you know that I speake the truth, I protest here before God and this Assembly, that I am yet of that minde and fully resolved, if you thinke it good and profitable for the publicke, neuer to make any instance for my reestablishment, nor for any

"any recompence; so as I may be assured to be left in peace, and that I may not be troubled
 "in the free enjoying of these places which remaine to my sonne and me; nor be deprived "of the gratifications which I have obtained from the bounty of my King and for my ser"vices. Preferring all my recompences to the Queenes good discretion and pleasure: My "protestations reiterated to be fully content and satisfied other Maiesty, and to have no "other desire, but the glory of God, the preservation of the Church, the Kings service, "and the quiet of the State.

Advice of the Assembly touching the Duke of Sully.

This was President Lamoignon.

Deputies sent from their Majesties to the Assembly at Saumur.

These matters thus propounded by the Duke, they fell to consultation, how they might give him content which might be profitable to all the reformed Churches. And as for the foure points wherein he desired their advice; to the first, concerning his leaving matters: B as they were, without any further instance; some said, that this proceeding was an action worthy the greatness and generosity of his courage. For the second, Whether he should plainly demand restitution: they answered, That it would be now a vaine attempt, seeing the place was supplied by a great personage, endued with admirable wisdom and iudge-ment to manage his Masters affaires, who knew how to entertaine men more courteously, and that they found a great difference betweene the facility of his access, and the lower countenance of the Duke. Touching the third point, Whether he should accept and demand the recompence which had beene offered him: some were of opinion, that he ought in duty and modesty to submit himselfe to whatsoever it should please their Maiesties to ordaine.
 For the fourth, Whether he should insist upon a recompence of honour and safety, or of profit: C they sayd, It was in himselfe to speake freely to his friends, which of the two he had most need of. This was the opinion of some in the said assembly, but it was concluded by plurality of voices, to vntire the Dukes cause to the generall interest, whereupon they made a decree as you have formerly heard.

In the beginning of this Assembly, the King deputed the Seigneurs of Boissieu and Bullion, Councillors of State, to goe to the Assembly; who vpon the 7 of Iune came into the Synod, and deliuered their Letters from the King and Queene Regent, and then exposed the generall charge they had received from their Maiesties, saying, That they were ready to allow of the iust demands of the Assembly, according to the termes of the particular Articles, Briefes, answers of their Bills, and other expeditions done in their fauour: D to obserue and keepe euery thing contained in the same; and wholly and entirely to per-forme all which remaineth to be put in execution: and where any ambiguity or obscuritie should be found, to cause it fauourably to be interpreted to their aduantage. Requiring them, that according to the termes of the Briefe, by which the Assembly had beene required and granted; they would forthwith proceed vnto the choice and nomination of the fixe Deputies which were to be represented vnto their Maiesties, of which they would retaine two to be resident neere vnto their persons, and which should receive their petitions and demands.

The Seigneur de Pleffis as President, hauing giuen thanks vnto the said Commissioners, with protestation in the name of the whole Assembly, That they would all be, and cuer remaine, most humble and faithfull in the obedience due vnto their Maiesties, they went home to their lodgings.

Many things past here touching their grieuances, whereon I may not insist, but leave them to the Originall. And the Commissioners being returned to Court, the Assembly resolved to send certaine Deputies to their Maiesties, to present their said grieuances vnto them: for which seruice they made choice of the Barons of Caze and Courtonier, the Minister Ferrier, and the Seigneurs of Mirande and Armer. Whilst they prepared for their journey, and that their instructions, memorials, and Letters were adrawing, the Duke of Sully gaue the Assembly to understand, that apprehending that the interest of private men would so increase the Articles of their grieuances, as the conceSSION way proue more difficult, desiring in no manner that what concerned him should any way pre-iudice the publicke, nor stay the obtaining of things necessary: wherefore he thought it fit to increase the Assembly to examine the points and Articles which might concerne his interest strictly, and to iudge whether they were such as they should insist vpon: them, as matters absolutely importing the good of the Churches in generall: or if they were such as might cause any difficulty or refusal in the grant, they should suppress them: as concerning onely his particular, in which case, he held it more conuenient to moderate them or

A or leave them out of their instructions, to the end it might neither preiudice the publicke, nor him in particular: protesting, that as he had vowed to employ his person and life, and that of his children for the glory of God, and the good of their Churches: for he did not make offer of his honor, goods, offices and dignities, to be disposed of as they should think it profitable for the glory of God, and the good of the State: that he was absolutely resolved without any opposition or dislike to follow whatsoever that Assembly should conclude and decree: whereupon the Assembly gaue him great thanks for the affection he seemed to beare to the advancement and preservation of their Churches, and for the example which he gaue to euery one to submit all priuate interests to the good of the general: assuring him that they had resolved to entertaine all the resolutions which they had taken concerning him.

During this Assembly, there was a combustion in Paris on Trinity Sunday, at the enter-ment of a young child in Trinity Church-yard: which infant did belong to one of the Religion. The daies are then long, and a little sooner then ordinary before the evening was shut in, two Archers of the Watch leading the company, a Vinegar-makers boy began to throw stones at them, many others did the like, yea and his Master himselfe: they had no respect to the Archers nor to their words: the tumult grew somewhat great, one of the Archers was hurt, and some others: presently the officers of Iustice passed thither, and the Vinegar-maker and his seruants were committed to prison, and condemned C by the Lieutenant Criminel: the servant to be whipped before the Trinity Church, and his master to stand by him. They appealed from this sentence: but it was confirmed and executed the first of Iuly.

The Deputies of the Assembly at Saumur, arrived at Paris, and presented vnto the King and Queene Regent their Letters and instructions, containing 57 Articles, which you may read at large in the Originall, being too long to insert here, for that I am limited to my bounds.

The long continuance of this Assembly bred a great iealousie in all the Catholike townes of Poitou, Limosin, and beyond the Riuer of Loire, and the rather for that in the beginning of Iuly, the Duke of Sully was come to Chastellerault, whereupon all the D townes of those Prouinces began to guard their gates. On the seventh of Iuly, about 6 of the clocke at night, a horseman passing through Orleans, and seeming to make haste to bait his horse, he spake many things touching the Assembly at Saumur, and amongst the rest, that there were many Huguenots on horsebacke neere to Orleans, to seize vpon the Towne: As soone as he found that some which heard him tooke hold of his words, he suddenly tooke horse and got out of the towne vnkowne: a Burgesse which heard him tooke such an apprehension of this gullery, as he cried to armes in his quarter, reporting what he had heard, which ran like lightning throughout the whole towne, and all the townsmen presently went to armes, and made Barriadoes in diuers places: they remembered their troubles past, and feared to fall into the like disasters: whereupon they searched E the houses of them of the Religion: but they found them so disarmed, dreaming of nothing but peace, as they were afterwards ashamed to haue so lightly fallen into this suspi-tion. This taking of armes at Orleans made them of Chartres and of other townes vpon the Riuer of Loire to keepe strict guard at their gates for feare of surprize. These procedings caused the Assembly at Saumur to giue order to Monsi. de Plusis for the raising of 150 souldiers more: writing vnto their Deputies at Paris, to beseech their Maiesties to make it all, if the Assembly provided for their safety.

On the twentieth of Iuly, the Chancellor in the presence of the Queene, the Priuies and other officers of the Crowne, told the Deputies of the Assembly, that their demands were dispatched, and that among other answers, there was granted a continuation of the F places of suretie for six years, with an increase of 4500 pound sterling for their Ministers;
 but for that the Assembly had bene chiefly granted them to proceed to the nomination on deputies which should remaine neere vnto his Maiesty to sollicite their affaires, the King would not suffer the answers to be deliuered vnto them vntill they had made the said election.

The Assembly at Saumur being aduertised hereof by their Deputies, who feared they by the 25 of the month they should haue commandement to retire themselves, they gaue charge vnto their Deputies, humbly to beseech the Queene in the name of the Assembly,

sembly, notes command them to proceed in the nomination of the two general Deputies, before they had received an answer of their grievances, for that they had no office charge from their Churches, nor to make the said election (which should be the said Act done in Assembly) without that required contentment of their persons. The Deputies having made a supplication unto the Queene, according to the intention of the Assembly, and that she fully charged Letters given them, into the Assembly for an answer, letting them vnderstand that Monf. de Bullion should resume presently to Saumur, and carry them over to their demands.

Their Maiesties Letters did import, That they had willingly heard their Deputies, and taken in good part the testimonies and protestations of the fidelity, devotion, and obedience of them of the Assembly: but in stead of presenting the names of fixe persons to chuse two general Deputies out of them; they had delivered their petitions, remonstrances, and grievances, the which although their Maiesties had good reason to reioice, untill the nomination had beene brought; yet they had caused them to bee viewed, examined, and answered, as fauourably as they could possible: and had acquainted their Deputies with the chief Articles, to represent them to the Assembly; that being enforced of their good and holy intentions, the Assembly might speedily resolve to discharge their duty, which was inticed their layd nomination of fixe persons, whereof their Maiesties were to chuse two, into whose hands they would deliuer the answer of their demands, with all necessary expeditious; and in the end the Assembly might then brake vp, as it was necessary for the Kings seruice, and the good of his subiects, left their long continuance together, should breed some disorder in the State, and ialousie amongst the Kings subiects.

On the 14 of August Monf. de Bullion came to Saumur; the next day he entered into the Assembly; presented their Maiesties Letters and deliuered his charge; which was; That the Queenes pleasure was, they should name the said Deputies, to take away the ialousie, which their Assembly gaue vnto the Catholiques, vnto whom her Maiesty was bound to giue contentment as well as to them. Which done, he had charge to deliuer vnto them their demands fauourably answered. That her Maiesty could not giue them any more, then what was specified in their answers, which had bene resolved by the Princes of the blood, and other Princes, officers of the Crowne, and Lords of the Councell, wherefore they should proceed to the said nomination: ending his discourse with these words, Their glory consists in obedience.

Whereupon Monf. de Plessis, who was President, made answer in the name of the Assembly; that vpon the returne of their Deputies they had bene assured of their Maiesties good inclination towards their most humble and faithfull seruants of the Religion; whereof they had a new testimony, in that they were pleased to send vnto them a personage of such merit, of whose affection they had great confidence: as if they protested before him, that they were ready to employ their means and liues for their Maiesties seruice; but as for the rest, when as the company had conferred thereupon, they would acquaint him with their resolution: whereupon he retired.

After diuers conferences and contentations betwixt Monf. de Bullion, and certaine Gentlemen sent by the Assembly, the one insisting to haue the Deputies named first, and the other to haue the answer to their demands: on the first of September the Assembly being long and intreat him to acquaint them with the answer hee had received from the Queene; he made answer, That the businesse was of such importance, as he would deliuer it in the open Assembly. Whereupon on the third of September, hee presented them a Letter from the Queene, who commanded them to obey, and to make their demands, in the reading whereof, Monf. de Bullion said vnto them, You see the commandment which the Queene makes vnto you in proceeds, in this nomination: although the same things are not bounden vnto an answer of their ordinances, yet her Maiesty should be contentment vpon the example of the deceased King; and vpon that which the wayes bene practised with you formerly, and the Assemblies of Catholique and Gentlemen, as well for the nomination, before the answer of your demands, as for the number of fixe: and as soone as you shall haue made this nomination, I will deliuer vnto you a Briefe for the presentation of places, and your demands fauourably answered. Moreover, I haue charge from her Maiesty to tell you, that to the end you may haue no subject of content, you may say request for some dayes, to present and examine

A examine the answers: yea if there be any remonstrances to be made vpon the answers, or any grace to be required from their Maiesties; I haue commission to tell you, that in charging the two deputies which shall be chosen among the fixe therewith, the Queene will intreat you with as much fauour as possibly hee can. I pray you satisfie her, seeing you haue promised to yeeld no lesse respect and obedience to the Kings minority and the Queenes regency, then you haue done to the deceased Kings.

Monf. de Plessis made answer, that the Company vnderstanding their Maiesties pleasure, he thought he might with their approbation say vnto him, that they were all disposed to obedience, and that to this effect their wils were wholly vnited without any dissension. That their vnion had bene very necessary, and that by meanes thereof, God had preferred the deceased King Henry the Great, and by him the Realme; and that hee himselfe had so well allowed of their vnion, that although hee had changed his religion, yet hee would that the Churches assembled at Nantes in his presence, should confirme and renew the said vnion, the which should alwaies bee for their Maiesties seruice, and the good of the Estate. In the end, after many demands and answers, and protestations made by the Assembly, alwaies to yeeld obedience to their Maiesties command (the which should be their discharge vnto the Churches, for that they pretended they had exceeded their commission) they proceeded to the nomination of fixe Deputies, with a declaration, that it was only to obey their Maiesties, & not to preiudice the rights of their Churches, nor to binde them hereafter to chuse about two: This nomination being written, was presently giuen to Monf. de Bullion, and hee deliuered vnto them their demands answered by their Maiesties, with a Briefe for the continuation of places of suerty. The answers to their greivances and demands being read in the Assembly, they were not found answerable to their desire and intention; whereupon they deputed some to Monf. de Bullion, to let him vnderstand, that they had received the answers to their demands with all honor, respect and humility, as proceeding from the will of their King and Soueraine Prince; but they humbly besought their Maiesties not to take it ill, if they made a declaration that they could not accept of the said answers, being of opinion, that the Prouinces which had deputed them should not receive that contentment which they expected. Whereunto he made answer, that the Queene had sent word to the Marshall of Bouillon that she had power to enlarge some Articles according to the aduice that he should giue her. Vpon the 9 of September, Monf. de Bullion hauing presented vnto the Assembly the election which their Maiesties had made of the Siegneurs of Rouuray and Millitiere for the 2 deputies, hee commanded them to separate themselves: letting them vnderstand, that their Maiesties had giuen him charge to say, that all their iust requests should be fauourably answered, and whatsoever had bene promised, paid. Whereupon the Assembly obeyed, and separated themselves; euery man returning into his Country, some contented, others not.

The Duke of Sauioy had drawne diuers troopes of souldiers together, which put his neighbour Princes in great ialousie, and bred diuers opinions whereunto hee would employ them; some were of opinion hee would besiege Geneva which hee claimes as his owne by inheritance: others thought that hee would enter into the duchy of Milane, as well in regard of his childrens pretention, being Nephewes to the King of Spaine, as for some other occasions: but the Italian Princes were alwaies watchfull that their neighbors should not grow great, seeing also that the Spaniard leauied men in Lombardie, fearing that by reason thereof Italy should fall into new troubles, they wrought so, in the end of the last yeare their controuersies were reconciled and the Country continued in peace. The Duke notwithstanding continued his Forces on foot, which made men thinke that he had an eye to Geneva; for that he had bene aduertised that the townsmen had bene carelesse to maintain their fortifications, and to renew their prouision of come yearly being spoiled; that they had small store of munition for warre within the Towne; and that they had not fiftie peeces of Ordnance well mounted and fit to doe seruice. It was also thought that hee had some secret intelligence within the Towne: so as the brute was he would not be 15 daies in taking it: diuers French Gentlemen came vnto the Duke with many souldiers with an intent to shew their valour and skill at this siege. Gaucher a famous Captaine of Luxemburg repaired vnto him with some troopes, and it was giuen out that Spinola himselfe should be at this siege, and that now the tree of the protestants danger of a

protestants Religion should bee plucked vp by the rootes, to the end it should bring no A more such fruit.

This towne of Geneua had beene long vnder the protection of the Crowne of France: yet some more desirous of innovations, then of the honour and preservation of the State, fought not onely to perswade poore ignorant people, but euen those of better iudgement, that the warre prepared against Geneua, did no way concerne them, nor that they should in any wise meddle or hinder the Duke of Sauoyes proceedings, incited thereunto (besides his particular interest) with the zeale of aduancing the Catholike Religion, and his Holinesse seruice: seeking by such practices to terrifie their consciences which were not well settled, making a case of conscience of a matter of State, as if to succour their Allies, B (although of a contrary Religion) against the inuasion of foraigne Princes, whose designs cannot be restrained by any treaty, (how solemne soeuer) were a capitall crime against God, and worthy to be censured by the Church. They made vse of that false Maxime against such as opposed themselves, that it imported much the honour of this Crowne, to hold their promise so often and so solemnly sworne, That they ought not to keepe faith with Heretikes: and that this exception is alwaies of force. But the Kings of France who haue beene euer Catholikes, did not hold the preservation of Geneua, which they haue alwaies tooke into their protection, and comprehended it in all the treaties of peace which they haue made with neighbour Princes, to be a case of conscience, but a matter of State: hauing found by experience, that this towne maintained in liberty, was sufficient to crosse C the vaine hopes of the Duke of Sauoy, and of all those which should assist him: The which both Francis the first, Henry the third, and Henry the fourth, haue made knowne by diuers Treaties, Declarations, and Letters, how much the preservation of that towne imports the State of France.

The Queene
Regent sends to the Duke of Sauoy.

The Queene Regent vpon these brutes of war desiring to preserve this towne in liberty, as the deceased King had done, sent Monsi: le Grand into Bourgundy, and Monsieur D'Alincourt to Lions, to take order for the frontiers of their governments, and to aduertise her of the Sauoyards designs: he also sent Monsi: de Barrault to the said Duke, to let him vnderstand, that both he and other Soueraigne Princes his neighbours, were ialous D of his Armes, being ignorant of his intent: the which was couered with a second pretext; That the Duke of Sauoy would not trouble the peace, nor breake the treaty of Veruains: but he onely desired to restore the Bishops of Geneua and Lorane, the which put them of Bearne into alarme. In the meane time the Seigneurs of Latoüe, Bethune, Arnault, with many French Gentlemen, Captaines and Souldiers, came to Geneua to defend them of their Religion: Within short time they had 30 peeces of Ordnance mounted, and had made such trenches, halfe-moones, and forts without the towne, as it was thought sufficient to hold out a whole yeare, if the invader did not perish in the attempt.

The Seigneur of Barrault being returned to the Queen without an answer conformable to her desire, she sent Monsieur de la Varenne vnto him: The Bearnois also sent their Ambassadors, who spake big words vnto him, telling him, That if he did not dismissh his troops, he should pay the charges of the warre, if they tooke armes.

The Dukes answer to the gent.

The Duke dis-missh his troopes.

Some write that the Duke assured both the one and the other, that he was not in arms to trouble the peace: and that hee neuer enquired why neighbour Princes had souldiers in a readinesse in their owne Estates, being free for every one to doe what he pleased in his country, not being subiect to yeeld an account to other Soueraignes his neighbors. Afterwards, seeing the French and Swissers discontented with his answer, and also considering his great charge was to little purpose, he dismissed all his troops by a declaration which he caused to be published. The Captaines and Souldiers which came to him from diuers Countries, were forced to depart with losse, bearing their owne charges; and they of the Religion did the like from Geneua. Hereby it doth plainly appeare, that God hath not created any thing in this world that hath not his opposite: and that the wisdom of the Queene Regent, and the speeches of the Bearnois, stayed the Duke of Sauoy from beginning of a warre, which might haue set fire vpon all the Westerne parts of Europe.

A Chapter of
at Paris.

During the Assembly at Saumur, there was a generall Chapter held at Paris, of all the Order of Saint Dominick, or Iacobins, whither all the religious of the said Order were summoned from all parts of the world, by the commandement of their Generall, which was Augustin Galamin of Brexiguella in Lombardy, a Doctor of Diuinity, and at that time

1611

A time Master of the sacred palace at Rome, who came thither in person with the Prouincials of all Countries, as from Peru, Mexico, the Philippines, and other remote parts, whose names I must for breuities sake omit. It beganne the Friday before Whitunday, and continued till the Friday after Trinity. They were in all about 400, who were nourished by the charitie and bounty of the King, Queene, princes, prelates, Noblemen, Ladies, and other charitable persons, which did assist at their preaching and Disputations. During this Chapter Father Michaels, Prouinciall of the Prouince of Occitana, demanded leaue of the Generall to reforme himselfe with some other religious men of his Order, moued with the like zeale: which being granted, they got a house behinde S. Andrew des Arts at B Paris, where they beganne a more regular and reformed life: since, by the assistance and bounty of the Queene and other good people, they haue accommodated the Church and house of the Iacobins, reformed in the suburbs of Saint Honoré, where they now reside.

The Queene Regent, as you haue heard, had giuen commandement to the Iurats of Bourdeaux, to receiue the Prince of Condé their governor with all the honor due to such a Prince: being aduertised of his coming, they employed an infinite number of workemen, to make preparation for his entry, and especially of two goodly Nauall houses, either of which was built vpon two great boats, to receiue him at his coming to the Port of Lormont, with the Princesses his mother and wife. The 24 Companies of the towne did striue who should exceed other in armes and apparel: and all the chiefe townes of Guienne prepared to receiue him according to the Queenes commandement. The Nobilitie of euery prouince did accompany him as he went: and entering into his government, Monsi: de Roquelaur Lieutenant for his Maiesty in Guienne, receiued him with six hundred horse, and conducted him to Liborne, which was the first towne, where as the Inhabitants met him in armes, and the Maior and Iurats caried a Canopy before him. The princesses came to Lormont, a little league from Bourdeaux, where they entered into their Nauall house, being accompanied by many boats, with all sorts of musick, with the Captaines and Burgesses of the Towne, and 800 Harquebussiers. They landed before Castle-Trompet, during the which the ships which lay in the Road, and the Castle saluted them with their Ordnance. Being landed vpon a bridge made for the purpose, they were conducted D with the Ladies and their traine, to the Archbishops palace in thirty Carosses, where they had a stately banquet for their reception. The next day two Iurats with a number of Barques went to conduct the naual house for the Prince to the port of Lormont. After dinner the Prince embarked and landed, where Monsi: de Roquelaur attended and saluted him, both as the Kings Lieutenant and Maior of Bourdeaux, presenting the keyes vnto him, the which the Prince receiued, and deliuered againe vnto him. Then he was conducted to a high scaffold, where hee sate downe to heare their speeches, and to see the order of the entry as it past. First, the Iurats past, which came to salute him in their robes of crimson and white Sartin. The Vniuersity. They of the Presidiall Court, all on horse-back, hauing forty Sergeants before them. Then followed the Court of Parliament: the two E Presidents being in scarlet robes, and the Councillors in blacke; and before them twenty others all on horse-backe. The 24 Companies of the Burgesses of the towne on foot, well armed, and in severall liveryes. There were moreover fourteene or fifteene hundred horse. Then the Prince coming from the scaffold, tooke horse and went towards the Towne, being followed by the Seigneurs of Roquelaur, Themines, Vailiac, and many Noblemen of Guienne. Being come to the port, the Iurats presented him with a white Tannet with rich furniture, wheron he mounted, the Iurats carrying a Canopy before him in this manner: he was conducted to the Cathedra Church, where the Cardial of Sourdis receiued him, and conducted him to the high altar, where hauing done the usual ceremonies, he returned with him to the Church doore, from whence hee was conducted to his lodging. He visited the Court of Parliament, who receiued him with all the honour that could be done him. He was inuited with the Ladies to the Town-house, where the Maior and Iurats attended to doe them seruice. He was desirous to enter into Castle-Trompet, to see what reparations were necessary. This seruice as a Citadell to Bourdeaux, and commanded by Colonnell Ornano with foure Companies entertained. At his coming in, the Captaine who commanded in the Colonnels absence, hauing deliuered the keyes of the Castle into his hands, he presently went forth with all the garison: then the Prince visited the Castle both within and without, and gaue order for the fortifications, which were to be made. After this, desirous to see the chiefe townes of his government. He passed by A Nerac, Agen, Thoulouse, Montauban, Dacs, and in the end to Bayonne, in all which places he was entertained with much honor. Being returned to Bourdeaux, hee received commandement from the Queene to repaire to Court, which he did about the beginning of November.

The deceased King Henry the fourth, had by his Edict forbidden Duels, and happily suppressed the liberty which French Gentlemen took to fight and kill one another, which often hapned vpon slight occasions. But as men alwayes finde some euasion to avoid the Law, they found also the inuention of encountering without challenge : whereupon his Maiefty made this Declaration to preuent these encounters : That if it hapned hereafter, B that any Gentlemen or others, making profession of armes, (who by reason of words or deeds, cyther for themselves, or for their friends, which may giue any occasion of offence, or cause bitterness) doe afterwards meeting by chance, draw their weapons, it shall be reputed done of purpose, and held for a challenge, so as they shall incur the same punishment ordained by the Edicts of Duels against Challengers; and shall not be dispensed withall, notwithstanding any pretext or excuse whatsoever. This Declaration was verified by the Court of Parliament, and executed vpon certaine offenders.

A controversy
in Troys concerning the Jesuits,

About this time the Inhabitants of Troys, were ready to fall into a mutiny and combustion : some desiring to haue the Iesuits, and to giue them the Colledge of the Towne ; and others opposing it. The Bishop, the President, and some few Clergy-men, and some Burgesses (especially such as had borne all the sway during the League) would haue the Iesuits. The Deanes and Chapters of S. Peters, and S. Stephens, the greatest part of the Clergy, the Councillors of the Prefidiall Court, the Towne-house, and such as had assisted to draw the Towne to the obedience of King Henry the fourth, would none of them. This bred a great contention amongst the inhabitants : both parties sent to the Court: the Bishop, the President, and those of that faction, sent to let the Queene vnderstand that the Inhabitants of Troys desired to entertaine the Iesuits, and to beseech her Maiefty to be pleased that they might make a general Assembly to resolve vpon that business by the voyces of all the people assembled by their trades. This Messenger was sent away with all speed, to preuent such as might be sent in the behalfe of the towne ; as it hapned : for Guichard a Councillor of the Court, and one of the Sherifffes (being deputed from the Assembly) coming to Fountain-bleau after Latrecey the Bishops Messenger, hee found the whole Court disposed to haue the Iesuits installed in Troys. Finally, Latrecey was first dispatched; and made all possible speed to returne to Troys, to haue the Trades assembled for the reception of the Iesuits : but yet the matter succeeded not according to his desire.

The whole body and chiefe inhabitants of the Towne, hearing what had past at Fountain-bleau, and that they had giuen the Queene to vnderstand that the Iesuits were desired in Troys; they held a solemne Assembly, where it was concluded, that they should make an Act of Disauow against such as had presumed to demand the Iesuits without warrent of power, and without the pricke of all the orders of the Towne: that this Act should be carryed to Court, and that they should informe her Maiefty of the seditious preachings of P. Bimeta Iesuit, and let her vnderstand that it was to be feared there would some sedition happen.

Troys sent to the Queene.

The Queene
answers.

To this end certaine were deputed for the Clergy, Iustice, and body of the towne, to informe the Queene of the state of the cause. To whom the Queene made this answer, that they had giuen her to vnderstand, that the Inhabitants of Troys demanded the Iesuits; but seeing they would none, shee would not force them ; neyther had they any intent to establish them against the good liking, nor without the consents of the said Inhabitants.

This answer was the cause of new proceedings on cyther side. They which opposed the Iesuits did set downe their principall reasons in writing. And the Iesuits faction did the like; with such animosity, as the towne seemed to be threatened with troubles and sedition : there being some which were willing to take armes, and to be in action : the which caused the Maior and Sherifffs of the towne to haue recourse vnto Mons. de Praslin, Governour of the prouince, who repaired speedily thither; and by his presence and wisdom pacified all these heart-burnings and discontents.

A There was a notable Impostor at Paris, who (from a meane beginning) through his subtle cariage had gathered great wealth together : and after falling to keepe dogs, horses, and entertaine Strumpers, he began to run the high way to destruction; and so at last resolving to play the Bankrupt, he took vp all the money hee could, but his intent being discovered, he was call into prison, and they found that he ought about 30000 pound sterling, yet could not shew any losses hee had sustained, or debts due vnto him, nor ready money to pay his Creditors.

His wife seeing him in prison, and not able to moue him by her prayers to doe right to every man; for very grieve she took her bed. Being without means, she importuned him to ayde her with some reliefe : but hee would not assist her with a penny, nor after her death giue any thing for her buriall, swearing that he had no money; but it was the will of God to haue his perurie and wickednesse knowne to the world, for a servant of his stole from him 150 Crownes in gold; and hee complaining thereof, said, that hee wondered he had not caried away more, for about 600 Crownes in Pearle and Jewels, with a Watch well worth 40 Crownes, lay vnder the gold which he had taken.

The Court finding his falshood, and villany, condemned him to doe penance in the great Chamber, the Court sitting, being bare headed in his shirt, and vpon his knees, with a halter about his necke, holding in his hands a torch burning of two pound waight, and there to declare openly, That he had maliciously plaid the bankrupt, and diuerted his goods C to defraud his creditors, for the which he craved pardon of God, the King, and the Iustice, Lucardo his brother in law, a partner in his villany assisted at the said penance, and the said La Tour to be conducted into the Palace yarde at the exchange time, to doe the like penance, and then to be tyed to a post by the necke, and there to remaine vntill one of the clocke. Moreover La Tour was condemned to serue the King in his Gallies for the space of nine years, and hee and Lucardo banished France for euer, and neuer to returne vpon paine of hanging without other forme of proceesse. Their goods were confiscated, their creditors being first paid, vntill which were satisfied, they were to remaine in prison and to pay all the charges.

The Abbot of Bois, of whom we haue formerly made mention, was committed prisoner at Rome, and as some affirmed had bene hang'd with his face couered : Men spoke diuerfly of the cause, some accusing the Iesuites to haue bene the motives thereof, for that he had first preached against them after the Kings death others said, that it was at the suite of the Generall of the Celestins, for that he had left his order, and had not yielded an account for the managing of the affaires which he had in charge. That he had in former times slaine a man at Auignon (the Popes Territorie) with his fist. Finally, they made many other pretexts. An error which is done by counsell, cannot be otherwise termed then a fault wilfully committed : but this Abbot would neither beleue the aduise of his best friends, who dissuaded him from this voyage to Rome, nor the intreaty of his servant who would not accompany him.

B This year was fatal to some great personages which dyed in hope of a better life. Newes came to Court of the death of Mons. de Vitry, whom the Queene had sent into England for some affaires of State, where he died suddenly, being much lamented of the King and Nobles there. These newes did much grieve the Queene and Court for the losse of so worthy a man : but it was nothing in respect of the sorrow and mourning at them of his house, and of the Inhabitants of Bry in Champagne : His body was brought out of England with a goodly conuoy, as well of his followers, as of many Noblemen and others which went to meet it : His sonne succeeded him in all his places, honours, and dignities.

Death of Mons.
de Vitry.

In the beginning of October, the Duke of Maienne died in the Towne of Soissons of a fever, having for the space of 12 years bene much afflicted with the Gout. This Prince was alwayes held religious and deuout, wife, courageous, master of his passions, very temperate in all his actions, yea and making warre against them of the Religion, they called him a Prince of his word, so careful he was to keepe it. The good and bad fortune which hee had, being Lieutenant Generall to King Henry the third in his Armies, is written at large in diuers Historiops : as also what hee did being head of the League against King Henry the third and fourth, with the commendation which all France hath giuen him, for that in those miserable times, he would neuer consent to haue it diuided.

tion, he performed all duties of obedience and fidelity to the King: and even after his death the Queene made great use of his counsell. He was free in the delivery of his opinion: whereof his speech in open Council to the greatest which demanded increase of their pensions, is a goodly testimonie: We must (said he) serve our King faithfully, without conditions, importunity, or demands; for it will befit us to seek to draw profits from his Majesties Ministry, when as the very duty engraiven by God in the hearts of all good Subjects, binds us to do him service. Of Henriette of Sauoy his wife he had four children: two Sonnes, the Duke of Esquillion (now Duke of Maitenne) and the Earle of Sommerue a goodly yong Prince, and of great hope, who died some few years before in Italy: and two daughters, Katherine married to the Duke of Neuers, and Renee a Virgin.

The first day of this feuer, this Prince said, I finde this will be my last, I must goe to God: the Bishop of Soissons coming to visit him, and hearing him speake aloud, Gow, gow, O Lord my God, he asked him, Whither wilt you goe Sir? And this Prince answered, to Heauen, to Heauen, gow, gow, O Lord my God. Father of mercy conduct me if it be thy good pleasure, the way of our felicity is assured in thee, for thou art the Way, the knowledge of this way cannot be obscure nor vncertaine, for thou art Truth, and the enjoying of this way must needs be immortality, for thou art Life it selfe: Gow, gow then, Let me goe then to Heauen.

Having settled all things touching his Conscience, and protested of his humble service to the King and Queene Regent: hee called for his Sonne the Duke of Aiguillon, who being on his knees by his bed side, hee laid vnto him: Sonne, I give you my blessing, with this condition, and not otherwise; that you shall employ your life and all your meanes for the defence of the Catholike Romish Religion, and for the humble service which you owe vnto the King and Queene Regent, and for the good of the State. Then greeting that hee could not speake with the Queene, hee intreated the Bishop of Soissons to giue his blessing vnto his daughter the Duchesse of Neuers: then calling his other daughter vnto him, hee laid vnto her, Daughter, I give you my blessing, with this condition, that you shall alwayes have the feare of God before your eyes, and honour and obey the commandments of your mother and brother: pray to God for me, and I will pray for you. Soone after, desiring often to be disolued, and to be with Christ, his speech failed him, and hee left this mortall life for an immortal, on the 3 of October. The Duchesse of Mayenne, much afflicted with his sickness, fell also sicke, and after his death consumed away in teares and sorrow, which had no end but with the end of her life, which was within few dayes after, and so ended this great body of friendship diuided into two soules: they both being interred together, having but one funeral pompe. The Duchesse of Neuers their daughter receiving newes of both their deaths, continued for a long time speechlesse: griefe and sighs had so leized on her heart, as she could hardly be comforted by her friends. The Duke of Neuers was no lesse troubled: sorrow had wounded his heart, and the griefe that hee had not performed the last duties at the time of their departures, did much afflict his soule.

In the end of October, their Majesties being at Fontaine-Belleau, the Duchesse of Lorraine, and the Cardinall of Gonzague arrived there, where they had a very honourable reception. The Queene Regent was glad to see them, being the children of her deceased sister the Duchesse of Mantoua. In the beginning of November the Court came to Paris, where after some daies stay, the Queene desiring to shew them the infants of France who were at Saint Germaine, all the Court prepared to goe thither with much ioy; but they came vnto the house of mourning through the death of the Duke of Orleans, who dyed the 17 of November, being 4 yeares old and 6 monthes. A prince in his infancy indued with all perfections. He was carried directly from thence to Saint Denis, and laid neere to his father: for they hold there are no funeral pompes to be celebrated in Paris after the death of the Infants of France, if they haue not liued 7 yeares. The Queen was so afflicted for this death, as she could take no rest for many nights: and all France in generall did much lament it.

Monf. Le Maistre, first Physician to the Infants of France, a learned man and of good repute, was taxed for the death of this yong Prince: his enemies blamed him, for that they say he had suffered an issue (which he had had two yeares in his neck) to be stopped: and some Physicians (who affected his place) furthered this slander by their practices.

A This false brute being come to the Queenes eares, did much afflict her after some who had credit with her having reported, that such as might deliue her from this great Lady presumed to tell her Maiefty, that without doubt it was for the recovery of the Physician which had killed this Prince. Monf. Le Maistre being willing to haue Monf. Le Maistre, hee laid vnto her Maiefty, I most humbly beseech you Maiefty, that I may not lose the honour of your fauour through flanders and false reports: and that I may not be entreated according to the desire of mine enemies, to the rub of mine honor and reputation. For hitherto you haue heard none but mine enemies; who haue beene all ready to speake ill as to doe ill, whose lewd life is so well knowne vnto you Maiefty, that I shal not need to make any further exposition. But the onely cause of this slander is, for that I opposed my selfe to the flanders which they raised against your Maiesties House. For this reason onely they haue imputed vnto me the death of my Maiefty who was deare vnto me: and without respect of your Maiefty, to reuenge themselves on me, they haue told the mother that her child is dead by my error: a fauour fury, and unworthy of reasonable men.

After he had made a long narration of the manner of the Princes Infirmitie, and of the Physicians proceeding in the cure, which I am enforced for breuities sake to omit, at the end hee concluded, Madam, you may hereby iudge of the malice of these flanders, who haue not beene ashamed to lye vnto you, nor to assist you without respect vnto the person vpon whom depends the preservation of so many people. And herewith abundance of teares stopped his speech.

The Queene having heard his speech, told him she would further informe her selfe, and afterwards declare what her pleasure was; which hee did; and since continued the said Monf. Le Maistre in his place, in the service of Monf. D'Anjou, which office hee fulfilled; but the principall authors of this slander hee dismissed.

At the same time there was a great suit determined by the Court of Parliament, betwixt the Iesuits and the Vniuersity of Paris. It was begun in the yeare 1603, when at the deceased King of famous memory of his bounty, granted letters of reuocation to the said Iesuits, in the chiefe towne of his Realme, and of this grace, gaue them (vnto the instance of the Siegneur of Varenne) leaue to build a royall Colledge at La Fleche, by vertue of his letters patents given at Rouen, and verified by the Parliament. And in Iuly 1606, they obtained other Letters, giuing them power to make their residence at Paris in the professed House of S. Lewis, and in their Colledge of Clermont, allowing them Confessions, preachings, and other exercises of their Order, except publicke Lectures, which for many good and iust considerations hee would not graunt that time: the Parliament of Paris did verify these patents, with the clauses and conditions therein contained to be observed.

In the yeare 1609 the King being at Fontainebleau, granted vnto them by other letters patents, the publicke reading in Divinity in their Colledge of Clermont, which Letters being presented to be verified, the Vniuersity and all the Faculty of Divinity in Paris, came and opposed themselves, so as they could not proceede.

In this yeare 1611, they obtained letters from their Maiesty giuing leaue to open their Colledge, and to instruct youth publicly in all the Sciences: which would a great controuersie betwixt the said Iesuits and the Vniuersity: for having presented them to the Court the 21 of August, to be verified in the last time the Vniuersity required communication, and the third of September they presented a request vnto the Court, by which they opposed against the said Letters, and hindered their enrolment. Hereupon the parties had an assignation to compare upon the six following: on which day the body of the Vniuersity appeared; and rather Cousin with one they assisted by their Advocate and Proctor, where it was decreed, that the parties should precisely plead the next day; that all the Chancellors should be assembled for the deciding of the cause; and that they should plead the dayes being (but) but when they appeared, it was put off till the 11 of October. Monf. Le Maistre appointing Monf. Le Maistre to be Advocate for the Vniuersity, and Monf. Le Maistre for the Iesuits. The day being come, the Vniuersity sued for audience; but the Iesuits did vniuersally demand delay, and desired to know, what the parties should appear the 11 of October, at what time the Court should be assembled; Hoping the Court should haue beene heard by the 11 of October, and so the Iesuits should haue suffered till the 11 of October, and the Vniuersity should haue suffered till the 11 of October.

home. During this delay the Iesuits fed themselves in their Colledges, and caused the youth to be instructed by interposed persons: whereof the Vniuersitie being aduertised, seeing the cause yet depending and undecided, they made petition vnto the Court, that they might plead upon their first opposition, the which was granted, and a day appointed on the 17 of December: at what time the chambers being assembled, the Vniuersity came with their Councell, and likewise the Iesuits.

Monsieur
speech, pleading for the Vniuersity.

There appeared at the hearing of this cause, the Prince of Conde, with the Bishops of Beauvais and Noyon, Peeres of France, six Presidents, a Master of Requests, and 26 Councillors. Le Monsieur having made a long relation touching the Vniuersity, in the end he charged the Iesuits, That both in Spaine and Flanders they had sought to plant Seminaries, both of English and Irish, which were fled out of their Countries; that they had become worse than the best wits of these Nations; and that many great Families in France had lowered the life of their children and kinsfolke, which they had drawn vnto them. Then he accused them, That they did wrong to learning, to cut off and diuersifie authors; That they were ignorant of the secrets of tongues; and that they did not read in the Colledges any books but such as were commanded by their Society. Afterwards, having spoken many things touching the faithful obedience which all subjects owe vnto their Princes, he maintained that vpon the doctrine of the absolute power of correction of the temporall by the spiritual, taught by the Iesuits, they have grounded their excommunications against Kings; interdiction of their Realmes, and discharge of the oath and obedience of their subjects, in case of their natural Princes should attempt any thing in their temporall against the Popes will, which he sayd was a schismaticall doctrine, and had bene condemned in France; alleging many examples and diuers Authors to proue that the rebellions, usurpations, and attempts vpon the sacred persons of the Kings of France, proceeded from this wicked doctrine.

The conclusion of his pleading.

After many other crimes wherewith he taxed them, hee concluded in these termes: In the State wherein we live, the Iesuits can haue no greater obstacle, then the bond to oblige strictly the conditions of their re-establishment: to hold them subject to the Magistrate, like vnto other religious orders: not to endure their enterprises: to persecute all Bishops, Prelates, and Curtes in their dignities: not to allow them any instruction of youth, lest they make a Monopolie thereof; and in the end fortifie them in such sort as to become a Iesuite they will leaue to be French: and above all, not to abandon the authority of our doctrine vnto them, the foundation of the love and fidelity of a Royalty, to receive the instructions of a new Diuinity, deuised for the interest of their owne grasie and priuate authority: wherunto they would adde to our Beloeft this 13 Article of the Faith: That all Crownes depend on the Pope, and that he hath power to depose Kings. He concluded for the Vniuersity, that their Letters might not be allowed, and that they might be forbidden to read, teach, or visit any Scholasticall function in the Vniuersity.

Monsieur
pleading for the Iesuits.

The next day Monsieur appeared for the Iesuits, whose pleading was very short. The discourse of the aduersary party (said he) was nothing but a faggot of reproaches bound vp together against the Iesuits, which deserve nothing but the fire. The testimony of so many Popes, Emperors, and Kings, of the great benefit this Order brought vnto the world, as well in religion, as the instruction of youth: among others, that of the deceased King Henry the great, in his answers and Edicts made for the re-establishment of this Order in France, was sufficient to answer all the slanders which were objected against them. In his conclusion, his request was to haue the said Letters allowed, and their Colledge opened.

his Oration to the Court.

After Monsieur conclusion, the Rector of the Vniuersity made an Oration in Latin, not premeditated, as some write, to the great content of the auditors: the which being very long, I am forced to omit; only I will interchase conclusion, which was in these termes: I am here my Lords, your reuerent Deities of this sacred Temple, the inuincible defenders of the French liberty: I conjure you all in the name of God, by the happy and glorious shadowes of great Henry, who was sometimes father of this France, by his last Will, the which to breake were a sinne, a crime, a sacrilege by the blood of our lawes which you haue in guard, by the immortal life of our most wise, most virtuous, and most powerful Queene, to whom you are to giue all assurances by this first Prince of the Royal blood here present, this most illustrious Prince, most worthy head of the French Monarchy

As by the good which you owe vnto France; by the affection and honour you beare it; by your children whom this cause doth principally concerne: I conjure you euen by your selues, if you will be immortal, and engrave your names in the Temple of memorie; Take away once for all, the managing of learning from these profane hands, and restore the command of studies to the Prince of Vniuersities, and the daughters into the hands of their mother: suffer not the blemish of new doctrines to couer the apple of Frenchmen's eyes, and trouble their sight. Is it not better that the Vniuersitie should leape for joy, at the very report of your names, and the remembrance of your praises, that greene bayes to crowne your heads, and to graue your great merits in letters of gold; then that a new order of religious men, newly moulded, and of a new impression, who hold nothing of the French humor, and dispense with Monasticall rules, to vaunt openly, that their Society had allowance amongst vs; that the Vniuersitie with all their learning, had bene ouerthrowne by your decrees; and that your breath hath withered this third bloosome of the sacred Lillies?

If you haue decreed within your selues, to suffer the Iesuits to dispose of the Vniuersitie at their pleasures; at the least (my Lords) open your purple robes, receive into your armes this Vniuersitie which is falling: receive the sighes and last groanes of your mother, which is in an agonie, and grows towards her end: but happen what will, and let future ages wonder, That wee haue not failed the Common-wealth, but the Common-wealth hath failed vs.

The Rector having ended, Monsieur Seruin, first Aduocate generally made his remonstrance, which was very long, and concluded for the Vniuersitie against the Iesuits. In these pleadings they gathered four points, which they taught and held: First, That the Pope was above the Councell; secondly, That the Pope hauing excommunicated a King, he might depriue him of his Realme: thirdly, That attempts and conspiracies against the sacred persons of Kings and their Estates, deliuered to the Priest in confession, they ought not to be revealed to the Magistrate: and fourthly, That Clergy men were not subject to secular Princes. Contrary to which four points, they propounded to haue the Iesuits subscribe to these which follow. First, That the Councell was above the Pope: secondly, That the Pope had no temporall power over Kings, and could not by excommunication depriue them of their Realmes and Estates: thirdly, That Clergy men hauing heard of any attempt or conspiracie against the King or his Realme, or any matter of treason in confession, he was bound to reueale it to the Magistrate: fourthly, That Clergy men were subject to the secular Prince or politique Magistrate.

The first President being in Councell, demanded of the Iesuits (who were eight in number) if they would subscribe vnto the doctrine of the Sorbon, especially in the four points aboue mentioned, and cause their Generall to signe it. One of them (who they said was Provinciall of France) answered, That amongst their statutes there was one which bound them to obferue the rules and orders of the place where they were during their abode, reading the passage in a booke which he held in his hand, and that they could not promise their Generall should signe that which was demanded, but they would write vnto him, and do their best endeavour. Monsieur added, that they would be bound to obferue the doctrine of the Sorbon, and the lawes of the Vniuersity, for which their Heads should answer. And if they of the Sorbon (being their ancients) would signe the said four articles, they would likewise signe them.

Hereupon the Court decreed, That the Provinciall and they of his company plaintiffs, who assisted at the audience, should presently subscribe the submission made by their Provinciall to conform themselves to the doctrine of the Colledge of Sorbon, especially in that which concerns the preservation of the sacred person of Kings, the maintaining of the Royall authority, and the liberties of the French Church; from all times observed in the Realme: and in the meane time they did forbid the Iesuits to inuocate any thing, or to attempt any thing to the prejudice of their Letters of re-establishment, and against the decree of the verification of the same: that they should not meddle either by themselves, or any interposed person, with the instruction of youth in this City of Paris, in any manner whatsoever, or to visit there any exercise of Scholasticall function, vpon paine to lose their re-establishment.

Troubles at Aix.

1611

The Protestants having expelled the Magistrates who were Papists, and seized upon the government of the Towne. Either party fortified themselves by their friends: the Catholikes sent to the Archduke Albert, and to the Elector of Collen, who gave them no great assistance; only they sent Ambassadors to Aix, to labour at reconciliation. The Protestants sent to the Princes possessing Iuliers, that they would be pleased to send them succours and some person of note, to treat friendly of the differences between them and the Catholikes: which they did by the Earle of Solmes. The conditions they required, were; that some Protestants might hereafter be admitted into the Magistracie; That the exercise of the Lutheran and Calvinist religion might be allowed, the Iesuits expelled, and all that had past during the troubles forgotten. Sooneafter, the Archduke Alberts Ambassadors arived; who pretending their Prince was protector of that towne, by vertue of an accord made in the year of our Lord 1600, he vsed some threats, which did not much please the Protestants of Aix, nor the Ambassadors of Iuliers; all which were not able to compound the quarrell.

Ambassadors come from France to Aix.

Their speech to the Burgesses of Aix.

About the end of September there arived the Marquis of Vieuville, with the Seigneurs of Brucil President of Metz and Villars Hofman Ambassadors for the most Christian King and the Queene Regent, left this small difference should be the cause of some great warre, to the prejudice of their Estate. In a full assembly of the Magistrates and Burgeses, they gave them to understand, that the most Christian King hearing with griefe of the late alterations which had happened in their towne and Common-weale: they had sent them to represent vnto them the dangerous inconveniencies which might happen by their divisions, which had filled their towne with confusion, the neighbour Princes with ielousie, and the people with bad example; and to perswade them to lay aside all spleene, and animosities, and to reconcile themselves vnto one another: laying before them the miseries which doe accompany the torrents of warre and ciuill dissention. And therefore my masters (sayd they) contemne not this good counsell, but receive it with the respect and reuerence which is due vnto their Maiesties, and with the same good will which you have shewed at our arriall into this towne. All things are yet in good estate if you will: for by the grace of God your troubles are not yet come to irreconcilable extremities. Leave first your hatred and spleene; lay aside your passions, and with quiet spirits consider of all the circumstances of times, places, and persons. Wee are now in peace almost throughout all Europe, and will you be the first to found the Trumpet, and to beginne the warre? your towne is situated in the midst of many Princes and Townes, who were lately in warre; would you that yours should serve as a Theater to adde a bloody Catastrophe to the Tragedies past? you are all in the same vessell, in the same inclosure, breathing the same ayre, vsing the same tongue, the same lawes and customes. Those whom you now repute for your aduersaries, are your fellow Citizens, your neighbours, your kinsfolke, your brethren and members of the same bodie. And although your opinions bee diuers touching matters of Religion, yet your wills should be united for the good of the Common-weale. Would you disfigure your Country, and tear in pieces the bowels of your mother? If you were bewitched with these impressions (which we cannot beleue) abandon all these pernicious counsels which will plunge you into a gulfe of misery, and embrace vnion and concord, which is the foundation and root of rest, the nurse of peace, the consolation of good Citizens, and a plentiful harvest of all good things. And to the end the businesse may be negotiated with more ease, you may if you please depuie some of either side, peaceable men and not passionate, who may freely conferre with one another with confidence and safety, and we will here their propositions with patience, not as Judges or Arbitrators, but as mediators of peace, and friendly Compositors: and all we will endeavour by all means to end your differences by a common consent, and to all your likings.

made.

The first of this Remonstrance was, that after some conferences, the Catholikes and Protestants of Aix, submitted themselves to the accord, which should be made by the Ambassadors of France and Iuliers, who laboured in this businesse, as certain Articles were drawn and signed by them; which Articles I am enforced for breuitie sake to omit. But the Catholike Magistrate refused to signe them being required: for that the Ambassadors of the Archduke Albert and the Elector of Collen, returned soon after to Aix with an Imperiall Mandate, by which they said they were deputed from the Emperour, to order what they should think good: which the Protestants seeing, they required the Magistrate

Again that the Articles concluded by the Ambassadors of France and Iuliers might be executed according to their tenor, and protested by all the Magistrats that should be done by the Archdukes and Electors Ambassadors. This through Ambassadors seeing that they had prepared the way for the Burgeses and Catholike Magistrates to enter into the temple of peace with the Protestants; and that the Senators made difficulties upon difficult things which they imagined they had founde therein: Hereupon they made a second Remonstrance, whereby they layd before them the dangers which would ensue by refusing of the said treaty, and how much they should offend their most Christian Maiesties, who had sent them to compound their differences in a friendly manner: and the rather for that they had bene aduertised it was with their consents; and should be againe by the as of the declaration which they had given them in writing.

If you ground your exercises (said the Ambassadors) upon the said Mandate, the which (as you said) you dare not disobey: they will answer you, that you should have attended vntill that his Imperiall Maiesty had beene aduertised of the said treaty, whereof the Mandate makes not any mention, or that hee should have made declaration that hee could not allow of it. You shall of a iust cause which you had before made avaisill, the which will bee blamed by all Princes and people which heare of it. The people will bee confirmed in the complaint they make against you: that you will alwaies inuade them with rigour, and that you sicall amiable composition, and desire nothing but security without any misdeed.

On the other side, if you accept of the said treaty, you shall doe nothing but what you have done before: and yet you shall auoid all these inconveniencies, and doe no wrong nor prejudice either to the Emperours authority, the rights and priuiledges of your Towne, or your selues. For the said treaty being but provisionall and by way of Interim, would be no hindrance, but his Imperiall Maiesty may ordaine what he pleaseth: neither will it binde the hands of their highnesses of Collen and Brabant, whom he hath deputed, for that they are not prett to consent vnto the said treaty, nor their commissioners to signe it: and therefore nothing shall hinder them to doe what they please. By the accepting of this treaty, you shall preferre the amity of their most Christian Maiesties; who shall not have employed their meanes and labour in vaine for so good a worke: as also of their Highnesses of Iuliers, and of all your neighbours, who by this means shall be freed from the apparant danger of a most troublesome warre: you shall recover your authoritie which is ouerthrowne, you shall gaine peace vnto your Country; you shall preserve the name and liberty of your Common-wealth, and you shall maintaine the Catholike Religion, which otherwife would be in great danger: and this great good will produce good effects and wholesome examples throughout all Germany and Europe. Embased not then winde and vaine hopes: but take a good and firme resolution; and accepting the treaty whereunto you had consented, witness the respect and honor which you owe vnto his Maiesty, who desireth nothing but your good, quiet, and tranquillity, seeing that you perceiue plainly it can breed you no prejudice, but all profit and commodity.

This second speech, although made in the French Kings name, yet the Catholike Magistrates would not resolve to returne into their places to take againe the reiss of the politique Government: which the Ambassadors of France and Iuliers perceiving, to the end the Towne of Aix should not remaine without any Magistrate, they made choice of the chiefe amongst the Burgeses, to whom, with the consent of the Protestants, the administration of the Common-weale was committed. After which, the Ambassadors of France returned to their Maiesties, to giue an account of their Embassey, and with them there came to Paris Ambassadors from their Highnesses of Iuliers, and the Burgeses of Aix. A little before, certaine deputies had come to the Court of France, who with the Archdukes Ambassador, made instance to their Maiesties, that the accord made by the French Ambassadors at Aix might be dissolved: and that the Prostitution of the Protestants made by the Emperour put in execution, which they laboured to obtaine before the Ambassadors returned: but their Maiesties being informed how all things had past, they told the Ambassadors of Iuliers and the deputies of the Burgeses of Aix, that they should letters, promising all fauour and succour in case the Archdukes should accompany thing to the prejudice of their Highnesses of Iuliers; and the Burgeses of Aix should as much favoured of Fortune, and by Kings and great Princes of Europe, as hee was afterwards afflicted with misery, and reduced to extremity. It may be seen in the booke of his relations, that being Secretary of State vnto Philip the 2. King of Spaine, hee had a great share in the love and secrets of this King: we may see the occasion of his imprisonment in Spaine, and how hee escaped and fled into Arragon: The taking of Armes of the people of Saragossa against the Inquisitors who would haue put him into the Inquisition, his flight from thence (it being besieged by the Spaniard) into Barce, where hee was receiued by the Lady Katherine Sister to King Henry the Great: his passage into England, and the reception hee had from Queene Elizabeth: his coming to Paris, where King Henry the Great caused him to be lodged in the Queene Mothers Palace, giuing him two Swissers for his guard, and a good pension for his entertainment. The execution of a Spaniard and his servant by the hand of Iustice, who had attempted to kill him for 20000 Crowns: and the subtiltie of this murderer making shew to be come into France to acquaint the King with a designe, which the Morisques had to reuolt. Behold hitherto many crosses of Fortune, but yet Perez not reduced to necessity: the Spaniard who (as Monsi. de Monigny said vnto the Marshall of Biron) neuer pardons an offence whilest the party liues, fought by all means to annoy Perez. A Gentleman belonging to the Ambassador of Spaine residing in the French Court, told him that if hee would leave the Pension which the French King gaue him, hee should within 6 months be restored to his goods and honours: the which was promised with much assurance, and confirmed by a Grand of Spaine. Passing from Paris in the yeare 1605, to goe into Flanders; hee resigned his pension. Hee was also aduised to goe out of the Country to treat his peace; whereupon hee went to Calais, and for a Darter, where hee receiued commandement to proceed no further: and the reason was, for that the Spanish Ambassador residing there, said, that if Antonio Perez came vnto that Court hee would depart. Perez thought now that there was no courtesie but in France, and from a King whom hee had in a manner disdained, reiecting the pension which hee had giuen him.

From Calais he came to liue at Saint Denis in France, and although hee knew by experience that the promises of those of his Nation were without hope of any effect: yet the necessity whereunto hee was reduced for his entertainment, made him to seeke all the means hee could to recouer the King of Spaines fauour. After this, hee came to lodge in the suburbs of Saint Victor at Paris, where his sonnes Don Gonzales, and Don Raphael came to see him, but without any means to assist him. Don Gonzales departed presently for Rome, and Don Raphael staid with him some time, during which Don Pedro de Toledo came extraordinary Ambassador into France, whom Perez went often to see, but hee had nothing but promises without effect, which made him to send his son into Spaine with letters and supplications to the Duke of Lermak: from whom hee had no answer but delays. They did write vnto him from Spaine, that he might treat with the Duke of Feria who was coming into France; but being come, he sent him word, that hee had no charge to speake vnto him. Hee was danted with this answer; and said that hee saw well hee must end his daies in France, the which fell out accordingly: for being lodged neere vnto S. Pauls, distressed for want of means, surprised with a great feuer, hee yielded his soule to God in the end of this yeare, and was buried at the Celestins.

The rebellion of the Siegneur
of Vatan.

I will conclude the year with an act of the Lord of Vatan, which as it was rash, so did it cause him to lose his life and honor. Vatan is a little towne in BERRY, betwene Issoudun and the frontiers of Touraine, in which there is a reasonable strong Castle. During the troubles of the league, the two brethren of Vatan had giuen good testimonies of their val-ours in many combats, sieges, and enterprises for the kings partie: the eldest brother died a siege, without children, and the younger brother remained sole heire of the Seignery of Vatan, having none but sisters; who remaining unmarried and coming hither to the Court, liued nobly in his Castle: he was of the Religion, and much giuen to the Marhe-matiques, whereof hee caused a booke to be printed when hee did the Act which caused him to lose both his life, honor and goods. Hee was a brave Gentleman, of a goodly figure, stout heart, and long visage, but humorous and fantastick: and hee was so firme a friend to his friends, as it cost him his life. And this was the cause:

Robin, generall Farmer of the impostes of Salt in France, aduertised that the Seignour of Lamoignon neere to Vatan, had store of false Salt in his house, whereof hee made profit: he Prouost.

A gaue charge to the Prouost Marshall of Tours to search his house for false Salt, and to seize vpon his person, and all those which should succour him. The Prouost hauing entered the house, and hauing found much false Salt, he seized vpon it, and carried away lau- fosse, with his brother, and a cousin of his: whereof Vatan being presently aduertised (for that he was his friend) he sent his steward presently after, to entreat the Prouost not to carie him away, promising to bring them forth whensoever he would: The steward hauing ouertaken the Prouost, whether he spake more boldly then he ought, or that he added some threats, or else for the full execution of his Commission, hee caried him away also prisoner. Vatan being aduertised hereof within few daies after, tooke horse with some of his followers, & by way of reprisall caried away one of Robins children from his house, whereupon he presented a petition to the Lords of the Councell, who decreed, that one of the great Prouosts Lieutenants should goe into Berry to informe of the fact, and the circumstances thereof; commanding all his Maiesties officers and subiects to be assisting vnto the said Lieutenant for the execution of the decree: to which end hee had a Commission from his Maiestie.

A decree of the Councell against Vatan.

The fantastick humor of Vatan made him beleue that they should haue sent a Gentleman to treat with him, being a Seigneur of qualitie, and not any of the Prouosts Lieutenants: who being come to Vatan, he sent him presently word that he should retire. But the Lieutenant hauing made a verbal processe according to his Commission, of all the rebellions of the Seigneur of Vatan, he returned to Paris, where all the proceedings being presented vnto the Councell of State, Robin obtained a decree, by the which his Maiestie ordained, that the former decree should be executed, and Vatan and his complices brought to the prison of Tour le Buesque, and his castle seized on: for the execution hereof, commandement was giuen to the Marshall La Chastre, and the Earle of Chiverny gouernor of Blefois, to see this decree executed with such forces as his Maiestie should send, and if need were to cause the Canon to be conducted thither. The Grand Prouost went presently to see this decree executed, and sent to all the Prouosts of the neighbour provinces to come vnto him: but the Queene hauing aduertisement, that Vatan had written to his friends, and made preparation to defend himselfe, and withall that he had some intelligence with Larrige and Chefobin, who had beene executed for the enterprise of Poitou; their reasons made them to aduance the siege. And the Earle of Chiverny Gouernor of Blefois, hauing receiued commandement againe, assembled foure or five hundred horse:
The Seigneur of La Salle, a Capitaine in the Regiment of the Guard, had the conduct of the foot, which consisted of 1200, with a companie of Swisse also: all which passed the River of Cher with sixe Cannon.

Vatan being aduised by many of his friends to send vnto the Queene, to giue satisfaction vnto their Maiesties, and by the mediation of friends and kinsfolke to obtaine pardon for that which was past; or else to assure himselfe (as a great man wrote vnto him) of a shamefull death (if he were not resolu'd to expose himselfe to a breach, and be slaine by the Cannon) with ignominy, enclined rather to his owne fantastick humor, which was so contrarie to all good aduice, as he staid and kept as prisoner with him a Gentleman his neighbour who came to admonish him to yeeld obedience vnto their Maiesties, and not vnto vndoe himselfe.

The inhabitants of Vatan, seeing that they must of necessity receiue great losse, most of them retired into the neighbour townes. The Lord of Vatan being abandoned by all his friends and most of his vassalles, except fourscore or a hundred souldiers which were in his Castle, fought to defend the towne, but after thirteene volleys of Cannon, seeing them ready to enter, hee abandoned it, retiring with his souldiers into the Castle. The footmen entered the towne and lodged, and presently made barricadoes to defend themselves from the shot of the Castle. They say it is a humane thing to erre; to repent, diuine; but to be obstinate, deuillish. Vatan being blind, thinks that he hath not erred, and being summoned to yeeld, makes no answer. On the 14. of December the bafe Court was taken with 1500 horse, and the next day the Cannon being planted and ready to shoot, two parts of his men abandoned him and found means to escape on the backe side of the Castle: he then desired to parlee, and to yeeld vnto the Earle of Chiverny, entreating him to intercede for him vnto their Maiesties, the which hee promised. Presently after, the bridge being let downe, they entered the Castle, where they apprehended all they found, and deliuered them

them to the grand Prouost. Magny his Lieutenant being hurt with the Cannon, was presently beheaded, and some so hanged. At their coming into the Castle, Fran was in a low Chamber, where Captaine La Salle finding him with his sword by his side, hee demanded it of him: you may take it from me, sayd he, but I will not giue it you: which being done, he was committed to the guard of fixe souldiers. This poore Nobleman thought it a part of great courage not to yeeld vp his weapon, and yet perceiued not that he had committed an act of great baseness accompanied with despair, in yeelding himselfe aliue after to great offence.

The sentence of
of Vatan.

Hence he was soone after conducted to Paris, where his processe was made by the Court of Parliament, and he was condemned to lose his head at the Greue, and his body to be burned to ashes: his head to be caried to Vatan, and there to bee set ouer the gates vpon a Lance: it was ordered, that the Castle should be razed, and neuer to bee built againe: all his goods were confiscate to the King. Hereunto he answered nothing, but, Alas I must serue for an example: And the same day about 3 of the clocke in the afternoon he was executed. This was the end of the Lord of Vatan: his heart confessed his faults, his eyes wept for them, his tongue demanded pardon of God, and his death serued for a reparation of his crime.

Afterwards by the clemency and bounty of the Queene Regent, and at the suite of the Marshall La Chastre, and of the Seigneurs of Chateau-neuf and Villeroi, the sister of the Lord of Vatan (who was to be his heyre) obtained from her Maiesty the gift of the confiscation of her brothers goods, so as the Castle was not razed.

Alliance of France proposed with Sa-uoy by the King.
Don Pedro de Toledo comes into France.

The deceased King some time before had refused to make an alliance with the Duke of Sauoy, betwixt whom by means of their Ambassadors, there had bene some overtures. During this time, in the yeare 1608, Don Pedro de Toledo arrived at Paris, being an extraordinary Ambassador for the Catholike King, whom many thought to come to treat of an alliance: others, that it was to discouer if there were not some intelligence and priuate practice betwixt the King and the Duke of Sauoy, for that he made shew as if he would breake with the Catholike King his brother in law, for that he had not satisfied the said King in the articles of the contract past betwixt his Highnesse and the sister of the said King of Spaine. But every man knew that the affaires of the Low-countries, and the parleys of peace held that yeare betwixt the King his master, the Archduke, and the generall Estates of the vnited Prouinces, was the subiect of his Embassie.

The King expected to heare something from him touching this present alliance, but he spake nothing vnto him but of peace betwixt Flanders and Holland, saying that his Maiesty could doe much therein: And it is held for certaine, that if Don Pedro de Toledo had at that time made any ouerture, his Maiesty was ready to giue care vnto it.

The beginning of the alliance with Spaine.

But to come to the beginning of these treaties, we must seeke the occasion further off, wherefore you must vnderstand that in the yeare 1609, Ferdinand de Medich, great Duke of Tuscane, vnto the Queen Regent, being dead, Cosmo his son succeeded in his Estates. And as it is the custome of Florence vpon the death of the duke of Tuscane, to send extraordinary Ambassadors in the name of the new duke his successor, to all the soveraign Princes & great potentates of Christendome: & particularly to the King of Spaine, by reason of the homage and oath of fealty which the new Dukes of Tuscane are accustomed to renew to his Maiesty, at their coming to the Principality, by reason of the estate of Sienna annexed to the great Dukes Estates: he made choice of the Seigneur of Botry, Marquis of Campille, a Knight of the Order of Saint Stephen, and high Steward of the great Dukes house: who hauing bene much employed to foraigne Princes about affaires of importance, he sent him his extraordinary Ambassador to the King of Spaine, to doe the said homage and fealty; who hauing performed the due of his charge to the Catholike King, finding a good opportunity, of his owne motion, without any commission from the Duke

his master, he made an ouerture of the alliances betwixt France and Spaine, first to the chiefe Councillors of State, by whom he was aduised to speake vnto his Maiesty, which he did with such efficacy, grace and good successe, as he then beganne to hope of a happy event of the said treaty: And considering that this businesse was of great consequence and waight, he would proceed no further before he had aduertised the great Duke: sending a Poste expresse to Florence, who being well satisfied with the care and wisdom of the Marquis had shewed in that businesse, allowed whatsoeuer he had done, or should doe

A concerning the said treaties: and residing yet in Spaine, he sent him for his Ambassador extraordinary into France, to continue the said treaties of mariage with the most Christian King: where being arrived at Shroue-tide 1610, he was honourably receiued on their Maiesties behalfe into Paris, who for the respect of the great Duke, and the merit of his quality, caused him to be lodged in Gondies house in the Suburbs of S. Germaine.

Soone after his arrival, he went to the Louure with a goodly traine, to salute their Maiesties, who hauing giuen him audience, he deliuered the subiect of his embassage, which was to let them vnderstand what reception the King of Spaine had giuen vnto him (speaking to him of the alliance betwixt France & Spaine, as also how much the great Duke of Tuscane, the Pope, and all the Princes of Italy desired it. The deceased King (who had forgotten the desire he had to satisfie Don Pedro de Toledo if he had made any ouerture) thanked the great Duke for his good affection, telling the Marquis that he should haue time to consider of the businesse with his Councell, to giue him all contentment. After this first audience he retired to his lodging, whither the King went often to visit him, giuing him hope to satisfie the Dukes desire touching that which he had propounded.

But when as all things began to goe on in a desired course, death enuying our felicity, pulled from vs that great King, which was a let that things well begunne could not now take effect during the great alteration, and generall mourning of all good Frenchmen for the losse of their Prince.

the alliance.

C All things being restored to their former estate, and France beyond expectation, enjoying the sweet calme of a happy tranquillity, many difflaters being nipt in the first budding, the said Marquis continued his designe begun with the deceased King, and propounded the same to the Queene Regent, who thought good to take counsell thereon, with the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Lords, and Officers of the Crowne, where it was approved by them all, and it was then held good to take a good resolution by a firme and full consultation: wherewith they acquainted the said Marquis in the beginning of the yeare 1611: who seeing the King and Queene to affect the beginning of this businesse, hee presently sent a Poste to the great Duke his master, to informe him of what he had done; and then into Spaine to the King, to assure him that their Maiesties in France were well pleased with the ouerture which he had made vnto them of the said treaties, and that the consent of his Catholike Maiesty was requisite, to giue some solid beginning to the said proposed alliances.

The Marquis continues his designe with
the Queene.

The deceased King had made the Duke of Rohan Gouvernor of S. Iohn D'Angely, giuing him for his Lieutenant a Gentleman of the Religion called Roch Beaucourt, who enjoyed his charge without any molestation, vntill the vnhappy death of the deceased King: but after the generall Assembly at Saumur of them of the Religion, in the which there was some diuision, Roch Beaucourt was on their side, who sought to maintaine themselves within the tearme of the Edict according to the verification made in Parliaments: And of this opinion were the Marshall of Bouillon, and many of the Nobility, with all those whom they call diuicious, who conforming themselves to their Maiesties will, said that a ciuill warre was worse then all the miseries they could endure by an indifferent peace. These were contrary to the Duke of Rohan and the greatest number of the Deputies: who demanded the enioying of the Edict of Nantes, as it had bene drawne and set downe, but not as it had bene verified.

The proce-
dings of the Duke of Rohan
at S. Iohn D'Angely.

But to returne vnto this adion: the Duke of Rohan, seeing Roch Beaucourt of a contrary opinion vnto him touching the Edict of Nantes, he practised means to put him out of S. Iohn D'Angely. Either of them desirous to maintaine his authority, Roch Beaucourt had recourse vnto their Maiesties, and the Duke of Rohan sought support from the reformed Churches, who maintained his opinion.

F The Queene had alwayes witnessed vnto the Duke of Rohan the fauour wherewith she had honoured him, as well in augmenting his pensions after the death of the deceased King, as in the Commission she gaue him for the leading of the Army of Iuliers, in case any accident should happen to the Marshall of la Chastre: and in the commandement he had for leauying of Swisses when as there was shew of a siege at Geneva. But the Queene seeing that from Britany (whither the Duke had gone to the Estates of that Prouince) he was returned to S. Iohn D'Angely, where he vied diuers practices for the election of a new Maior: being also aduertised that the said Duke would, contrary to the privilege of Maiors, take away the keyes: make himselfe master of the Towne, and thrust A out Roch Beaucourt and such as fauoured him; he sent vnto the Duke to come to Court: which he presently did, and presented himselfe vnto their Maiesties: who gaue him good reception: but they let him vnderstand their intention particularly, with charge to conformance himselfe. The Duke could not refuse. He had left a seruant of his called Haultfontaine to crosse Roch Beaucourt and the Maior: and finding his party stronger then theirs, sent word vnto the Duke, That all good men attended him with impatience.

He repaired late in an evening to the Queene, and told her that Monseur de Senblize his brother was very sicke, and shewed his Letters. Some write that it was but a pretext: but howsoeuer, he posted into Poitou, where he continued eight dayes with his brother, B during the which many of their friends came to see them, and they went together to S. John D'Angely. Others on the contrary side say, that the Maior who had protested to be well pleased with his arrival and stay, had notwithstanding conspired with the partisans of Roch Beaucourt to thrust him out of S. John D'Angely, and that to this effect hee had caused them to arme vnder colour of a watch: but the Maior finding himselfe too weake stayed in the midst of his designe.

But omitting whatsoever was written in defence of either party, I will onely set down the particularities as they past. Their Maiesties being informed, that the Duke of Rohan was become master of S. John D'Angely, and had caused some alteration; they sent Monseur de Themines thither, to give them certaine aduice how all things had past during these factions; and to take order that if the Estate of the Towne could not be reduced to a firme peace, yet at least by his wisdom to pacifie their quarrels, and to do whatsoever he should thinke necessary for the Kings seruice. But vpon the doubt they had of some greater enterprizes, they stayed the mother, wife, and sister, of the said Duke at Paris: and his Secretary being come from S. John D'Angely to informe their Maiesties of all these factions, and to acquaint them with many things concerning the Maiors behaviour whom he had depozed; they found them of as little force as his excuses, so as he was committed to the Bastile as the Seigneur of Themis had bene, being sent a little before by the Duke of Rohan to excuse the affront which had bene doneto Capitaine Fauscalt. Monseur de Themines came to S. Johns, and seeing the affaires of the Town in the absolute disposition of the Duke of Rohan, he onely caused the old Maior to be restored for some few daies, after which all was in the power of the said Duke.

The Queene Regent (during the absence of the Prince of Conde, who went the last year into Guienne to take possession of his government) had treated long with the Earle of Soissons concerning the alliances by marriage betwixt France and Spaine: who had for his part liked of the first proposition which had bene made vnto the deceased King by the Marquis of Botry: the Prince of Conde did the like, being made acquainted therewith after his returne from Guienne, and all others who had knowledge thereof: holding it both profitable and proportionable for the Kings age and greatnesse. And although there were some remonstiances published, that the deceased King was resolved to make an alliance with the Duke of Sauoy, yet the Queene (a iudicious Princesse) made it known, that she did not preferre this alliance for want of good will and affection to the Duke of Sauoy and his House, nor for any other ends, but for the consideration of the merit of such an alliance, and the settling of peace betwixt these two Kings, profitable for Christendome, and more necessary for the present estate of the Kingdome, then at any other season: whereof the Duke of Bouillon had charge to satisfie his Maiestic of Great Britaine, whether they sent him expresse to performe that office: The like was done at the same instant to other Princes and allies to this Crowne: all which did witness their contents and approbation.

All things being consented vnto, betwixt their Maiesties and the Catholike King, and the consents exhibited on either part: the King of Spaine commanded his Ambassador, resident at Paris, to conclude the said treaties of marriage, the which hee did in the Kings chamber, in the presence of the King, the Queen Regent his mother, the Marquis of Botry Ambassador for the great Duke of Tuscane, and some officers of the Crowne.

Within few dayes after, the Ambassador of Spaine, in the name of the Prince of Spaine sonne to the Catholike King, was made sure to his mistris the Lady Elizabeth of Bourbon, the daughter of France: and the French King did the like for his part by the Ambassador

The Prince of Conde and the Earle of Soissons allow of the alliance with Spaine.

The Duke of Bouillon sent into England.

The second of the marriage confirmed.

A Ambassador residing at Madrid for the Infanta of Spaine. This begot a thousand braue designs amongst the Nobility of France, Spaine & Naples, to celebrate these assurances: to the end they might testifie vnto the world how much they ioyed at these alliances. But this ioy continued not long, but was suddenly crossed by the Princes of the blood. For when the question was to enter into Council touching the contract of marriage; being requisite that these Princes especially should confirme al the Articles & conuenitions mentioned in the said contract. The Prince of Conde and the Earle of Soissons made some demaill, and for that they were not willing to signe it, the Prince withdrew himselfe from Court, and went to visit his Houses; & Count Soissons went to his Gouvernement in Normandy: retreats which held al things in suspense, and much grieved their Maiesties, seeing the said Princes had so willingly yielded to the first propositions: they went from Court in October 1611, and were absent 7 or 8 moneths.

The Princes retire from Court.

Notwithstanding the retreat of these Princes, they did not giue ouer their resolutions to celebrate these great Nuptials with running at the Ring, compleat in Armes, at the Quintaine, Fire-workes, and all sorts of Triumphs in Paris, among the other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and other Noblemen which were then in Court, all inflamed with a desire to publish to the world the glory of this alliance.

The day appointed for these triumphs was on the 14. of March in the Place Royall, a stately building made by King Henry the 4. being 72 fathome square, and enuironed with many goodly pavillions. It was formerly called the Castle and Parke of the Tournells, before the which the Kings of France were wont to make their Tournies, Combats, and running at Tile in Saint Anthones street neere vnto the Bastile: But King Henry the second, being there vnfortunatly slaine with the splinter of a Lance, this Castle and Parke were afterwards vnfrequented and ruined, and in the end became a Market for horses. In this place Royall there were scaffolds erected for the King, Queene, Princes, Ladies and Noblemen, and a Citadell built with all manner of defences like to the Palladium of Troy: but all these triumphs were stayed for a time by reason of the death of the Duke of Mantoua, who was neerely allied to their Maiesties, for the which the Queene was much afflicted, retrying herselfe some dayes into her Chamber to mourne for his death. The Cardinal of Mantoua, who had bene the year before at Paris, succeeded him. Soone after, a new day was appointed (through their Maiesties permission) for these triumphs on the 5 of April: the Defendants having formerly published throughout all Paris their Cartell of defiance, to the end that no man should pretend ignorance.

I must craue pardon if I make not a particular relation of euery circumstance; being tryed to strait bounds in the continuation of this History: but it shall suffice to vnderstand that the defendants were the Dukes of Guise, Neuers, and Cheureux, with the Lords of Bassompierre & Chastaigneray called the Knights of Glory, vnder borrowed names, who entered the Theater with a rich and stately equipage, having before them two triumphant Chariots, the one drawne by sixe Lions, the other by sixe Unicomes.

The Defiance.

The Assailants were in number 53, whereof the chiefe were, the Prince of Conty, the Dukes of Vendosme, Longueville, Rohannois, and Rhets; the rest were, Marquisses, Earles, and Barons for the most part: they made their entries in ten severall troopes, but not equally diuided, being wonderfully rich in their furnitures and traines, euery troope hauing his severall Deuice, all which were very exquisite and rare. These sports continued three daies; at the end of euery daies triumph there were rare ignitions for fire-workes, and shooting off of Ordnance; and to shew their generall applause, there were bonfires throughout all the streets of Paris, and in most good Townes of France.

After all their ioy, feasts and triumphs at Paris, the Queene Regent was advertised that the King of Spaine was somewhat amazed to heare of the difficulty made in France for the signing of the Contract: whereupon the sought by al faire & gentle means to cal back the Prince of Conde and Earle of Soissons Princes of the blood to Court, who after some refusal, in the end came to Paris; where being ariued, they presently satisfie the Queenes desire, and confirmed the contract of the said marriages vnder their hande, the which gaue great cause of ioy and content vnto all France.

There remained nothing to bee done, but to signe the Articles which had bene formerly concluded: for the effecting whereof, their Maiesties sent the Duke of Mayen extraordinary Ambassador into Spaine, to confirme the contract of marriage betwixt the moſt Chriſtian King and the Infant of Spaine : and on the other ſide the Duke of A Paltrana was ſent into France to doe the like betwene the Prince of Spaine, and the Kings ſiſter. The Duke hauing ſent his traine before by ſmall iournyes in Bayonne, (which was the Rendezvous for all thoſe which ſhould accompany him into Spaine,) he went from Paris to Fontaine-Belleau to take leaue of their Maieſties, from whence he parted in poſt on the 5 of Iune, and came to Bayonne on the 17, where he was attended by very many Noblemen and Gentlemen which did accompany him, beſides thoſe of his owne traine. To relate the ſeueral intertainments in all places as he paſt would bee very tedious : I will onely touch at his reception at Lerma, which ſeemes according to my author, to be very extraordinary. He came to lodge there on the 4 of Iuly, where the Duke had giuen order to receiue him with all the ſtate that might be : for being deſcended from his horſe in the baſe Court of the Caſtle, and going vp the ſtaires, the Hall doore opened, at what time the Duke de Mayen, and thoſe which did accompany him, ſmelt ſuch a ſweet ſcent of perſumes, as they all proteſted they had neuer done the like : and opening the chamber doores they had the like perſume. The Hall and fixe chambers in the Caſtle were hanged with tapeſtrie of cloath of gold and ſiluer, whoſe borders were embroyded with gold and enriched with rubies and emeraulds. If the Duke of Lerma had cauſed his Caſtle to be richly furniſhed with hangings, ſtately beds, and mouebles : he had alſo giuen order there ſhould be no want of viſuals, for as they write, there had not bene in 50 yeares ſcene the like to that which was preſented to the duke of Maïen, C and in the name of the inhabitants of the Towne of Lerma, (although euery man might ſee, it was the duke of Lermas care and prouiſion.) This was preſented at the Dukes entry into the Caſtle : two Moores ſounding their trumpets went before, then came a number of perſons attired like clownes, euery two carrying a long pole with all kinde of wilde fowle, and amongst the reſt great ſtore of cunnies : After them followed 20 moyles with coverings of Turkie worke, the which were laden, ſome with Boraches of wine, others with veales, muttrons, Turkie-cockes, Capons, Gammons of Bacon, comfitures and fruits, Being at Arande vpon Duero, Monſi de Vaſcelas ordinary Ambaſſador for France, came vnto him, who aſſured him that the Duke of Paltrana was paſſed from Madrid : whoſe long ſtay waſte the cauſe the Duke went on more ſlowly then he had reſolued.

During the dukes ſtay at Almeda and Barraias, his Catholike Maieſty ſent the Marquis of Eſte to viſit him, who accompanied him ſtill vntill the day of his entry. The Ambaſſadors and all the Grandes of Spaine ſent to viſit him by their chiefe Gentlemen, with all kinds of complements and offers of ſeruiſe, vntill the day hee made his entry, which was on the 17 of Iuly in this manner :

Fiſt, there went before 65 moyles laden with trunckes and coſſers belonging to the Noblemen and Gentlemen of his traine, hauing all blacke coverings. Then followed 134 moyles with the dukes baggage with coverings of blacke cloath, & his Armes in the middeſt, and at either corner a croſſe of Loraine, conducted three and three in a ranke by their Muletiere cloathed in blacke. Ten men mounted vpon Moyles, and ten Swiſſers on foot attired alſo in blacke had the conducting of them. After theſe came his Steward betwene two Controllors, hauing their chaines of gold in their blacke ſcarſes, and followed by 123 Officers and other Waiters all in black likewiſe. Then came 52 pages attired in mourning, conducted by the dukes Queery, and followed by their Gouvernour : then 217 Gentlemen in mourning after : 17 Barons, 7 Earles or Viſcounts, 4 Marqueſſes, and the Prince of Tingri. The duke of Mayen alone vpon a horſe which his Catholike Maieſty had ſent him : and Monſi de Vaſcelas ordinary Ambaſſador in Spaine, neer vnto him. Three Caroches covered with blacke, and another of Monſi de Vaſcelas made vp his French Embaſſie.

The duke of Mayen, being arriued with all his traine at Saint Barbas neere vnto Madrid, he met there with the duke of Alua, accompanied with many Grandes of Spaine and all the Nobility of the Court on horſe-backe, which came to meet and receiue him on his Catholike Maieſties part. In this troope were almoſt 500 horſe, all richly furniſhed and in very good order. The principall which accompanied the duke D'Alua were, the dukes de L Infantado, D'Albuquerque, De Maqueda, of Feria, of Montalco, of Peneder, of Blea, and of Villermonta, the Admirall, and the Adelantado of Caſtile, Don Pedro de Toledo, Don Chriſtopher de Mora, the Earle of Laras, and of Aluſiſta. As ſoone as the duke of Mayen had ſpied them, he made a ſtand, and then the Marquis of Eſte which was by

A by him told him all their names, which when hee had related, they fell to complement and ſalutations, without deſcending from horſe-backe : which laſted ſo long, as it was almoſt ſuen a clocke before they beganne to make towards the towne. Then the Caualliers of Spain mingled themſelues with the French Gentlemen, each one ranging himſelfe with them of his owne qualitie, and the Duke of Maïen coming behind in the laſt rancke, had the Duke of Alua on his left hand. This entry was made at the port of Fuencaſall. All the ſtreets of Madrid, the windowes, and the houſe-tops were full of people of all ſorts.

The Duke of Mayen was conducted to the houſe of Marquis Spinola, and the Spaniards retired. From Wedneſday vntill Saturday he was viſited by the Ambaſſadors of all Princes and States : by the Duke of Lerma, and the Cardinal of Toledo (who is not accuſtomed to doe that honor vnto any but the King,) and by all the Grandes and chiefe Lords of Spaine, accompanied with their kinſfolke and friends, euery one ſtriving to ſhew the greatnes of his Houſe.

On Saturday Iuly 21, the Duke of Vſeda came by the Kings commandement to accompany him to Court to his fiſt Audience, he with all his Nobility and Gentry being mounted on horſes from the Kings ſtable. Being come to the Caſtle, the Earles of Caſtel, Ruſio and Salazare, Stewards of the Kings houſe, met him at the entry of the Hall, and conducted him vnto the King, who was attired in a long iacket of black bayes, and a long cloake of the ſame; on his left hand ſtood the Prince his eldeſt ſonne; and one the other, the Duke of Lerma, behinde was the Marquis of Velado Lord Steward, with all the Grandes of Spaine bare-headed : The Duke hauing done his obeſſance, the King embraced him, commanding him to be covered. After which he preſented the King and Queens Letters, thanking him for the voyage the Duke of Feria had made into France to condole the death of the deſeased King, and withall he did condole in their Maieſties name, the death of the Queene his wiſe : and hauing ſaluted the Prince (ſitting by his Father) who embraced him, from thence he went to the Infanta's chamber, who was ſet vnder a cloath of Eſtate of cloath-of-gold, accompanied by the Counteſſe of Altamira her Gouverneſſe and the Ladies of the Court. He had cauſed Madams de Vaſcelas to demand of the Infanta how he would command him to treat with her; and vnderſtanding her pleaſure, he went D to kiſſ her hand as his Queene, and thence treated with him as her ſubiect. Three daies after hee preſented a Letter on the Kings behalfe, which ſhee receiued with much content, and hauing read it, ſhe ſaid, Sir, if the King your Maſter doe not loue me for my beauty, yet at leaſt he will loue me for my obedience. The reſt of the time vntill the coming of Monſi de Piſcaux, he ſpent in viſiting of Noblemen, and the like.

Monſi de Piſcaux being arriued at Madrid Auguſt 12, the Duke of Mayen preſented him to his Maieſty, and to the Infanta. Auguſt 21 the Articles of the ſaid Mariage were concluded betwixt the Duke of Lerma, in the name of the King of Spaine, on the one ſide; & the Duke of Mayen, the Viſcount of Piſcaux, and the Baron of Vaſcelas, in the name of the moſt Chriſtian King on the other. In preſence of the Popes Nuncio, and many Dukes, E Noblemen and Councillors of Spaine. The Articles were theſe.

I. That with the grace of God, and a Diſpenſation from the Pope, by reaſon of the con-
I ſanguinity & neerneſſe of blood betwene the moſt Chriſtian King and the Infanta, as ſoone as the ſhall come to the age of twelve years compleat, they ſhall cauſe their Mariage to be ſolemnized according to the Order preſcribed by the Canons of the Catholike Apoſtolike and Romane Church, in the Court, Palace and houſe of his Catholike Maieſtie, where the noble Infanta the Lady Anna makes her reſidence; and that by vertue of a Commiſſion from the moſt Chriſtian King; which, being done, the ſaid King ſhall ratifie and accompliſh in perſon, when the ſaid Infanta Lady Anna ſhall come into France; his Maieſty ioyning to her Highnes : and the ſaid ſolemnitie of Mariage ſhall be performed eyther by ſpecial Commiſſion, or in perſon, when as the time ſhall be ſet downe betwixt their Maieſties.

II. That his Catholike Maieſty doth promiſe and ſtand bound to giue to the ſaid Infanta Lady Anna in dowry, and in regard of her Mariage with the moſt Chriſtian King of France, and ſhall pay vnto his Maieſty, or to any other that hath authority from him, the ſumme of 500000 Crownes of gold, after the rate of eight ſhillings ſtirling the peece, in the Citie of Paris, a day before the Celebration of the ſaid mariage.

III. That

The Arri-cles of the

1612

III. That their most Christian Maiesties shall binde themselves to assure the Dowry A of the said Infanta Lady Anna vpon good rents, and assured assignations, to the content of his Catholike Maiesty, or of such as he shall name to that effect: and in case the marriage be dissolved, and the Dowry in Law to be restored, then it shall be deliuered backe againe to the said noble Infanta, or to him that shall haue commision from his Highnesse: and during the time the said Dowry shall remaine vsatisfied, her Highnesse, or her heires, or successors shall enioy the reuennue wherunto the interest of the said 50000 Crownes shall amount, which shall be payed by vertue of the said assignations.

III. That the said Noble Infanta Lady Anna shall hold her selfe content with the said Dowry, and shall neuer hereafter make any other pretence or claime vpon any colour B whatsoeuer, and that she shall renounce all actions and demands in good and due forme, and with all assurances and solemnities that shall be required and necessary; which renouciation she shall make before she is married, by present words.

V. That presently after the Celebration of the marriage, she shall approue and ratifie ioyntly with the most Christian King, and with the same forme and solemnity, as she did the first, and with such clauses as they shall finde to bee convenient and necessary for the effect thereof: to which renouciation their Maiesties shall remaine bound as at this present. And in case they shall not make the said renouciation and ratification by ver- C tue of this present contract by capitulation, the said treaties, renouciation, and ratification are held to bee well and duly made, past and granted at this present, as if they were then done: The which shall be made in the most authentike and effectuall manner that can be, to be good and of force, withall clauses derogatory of any Lawes, Iurisdiccions, Customes, Rites and Constitutions to the contrary; or that may hinder in all, or in part, the said renouciation, and ratification, the which for the effect aforesaid, their Catholike and most Christian Maiesties shall derogate, and doe at this present wholly derogate: And for the approbation and ratification which they shall make of this present contract and capitulation, they doe at this present as then meane to haue derogated to all exceptions aboue mentioned.

VI. That forasmuch as their Maiesties make these marriages, the better to continue and assure (by this strong bond) the publicke peace of Christendome, and the brotherly love D which all men hope for betwixt their Maiesties, and in contemplation of the iust and lawfull causes, which the equality and conueniences of the said marriages doe perswade; by means whereof, and by the fauour and grace of God, all men may hope for a most happy successe, to the great good and increase of the faith and Christian religion, to the common good of the Kingdomes and subiects of the two Crowns; as also for that which concerns the good of the Common-weale and the prestruation thereof: wherfore considering the quality aforesaid, and other iust reasons which may be alleged, their Maiesties conclude by contract, which shall stand in force as a Law for ever, in regard of their Realme, or any thing that shall concerne the publicke.

VII. That the Lady Anna Infanta of Spaine, nor the children borne of her, bee they E males or females, or their descendants, for euer hereafter in what degree soeuer they bee, shall not succede in the Realmes, Estates, Siegneuries, and Dominions which belong vnto his Catholike Maiesty, and which are comprehended vnder the titles & qualities mentioned in this present capitulation: nor in any of his greatest Realmes, Estates, Siegneuries, Prouinces, Ilands adiacent, Fiefs, Governments; nor in the frontiers which he now holdeth, or that belong or may belong vnto him, within and without the Realme of Spaine, which heretofore their Catholike Maiesties and their Predecessors haue held and enjoyed: nor into any part depending thereon, or that shall be hereafter gotten and added vnto his said Realmes, Estates and Dominions, or that may fall vnto him by any title or right whatsoever, be it during the life of the said Infanta Lady Anna, or after her de- F cease during the liues of any of her descendants, in what degree soeuer: And in case they shall haue any pretensions by the lawes and customes of the said Realmes, Estates & Dominions to succede in the same, in all the said cases the said Lady Anna doth at this present declare to be well and duly excluded, with all her children and descendants males and females, notwithstanding any pretence. To all which considerations in generall, vnto every one in particular, their Maiesties doe derogate, for that they doe contradict and hinder the execution of this Article. And for the approbation and ratification of this present

A present Capitulation, they shall and do derogate, meaning that the Infanta and her descen- dants shall remaine for euer hereafter excluded from all succession in any of the States of the Country of Flanders, County of Bourgundy and of Charolois, with their dependan- ces; which Countries and Estates were given by his Catholike Maiesty to the Infanta Isabella, and must returne to his Catholike Maiesty and his successors. And further, they declare expressly, that in case the said Infanta remaine a widow (which God forbid) with- out any children of this marriage, that then she shall be free from the said exclusion, and be declared capable to succede in all that may belong or fall vnto her in two cases only: the one, if remaining a widow of this marriage she come into Spaine: the other, If by reason B of state for the publicke good, and for iust considerations, shee marry againe with the good liking of the Catholike King her father, or the Prince of Spaine her brother, in which two cases she shall remaine capable to succede and inherit.

VIII. That as soone as the Infanta Lady Anna shall come to the full age of 12 yeares, and before the celebration of the marriage, she shall promise vnder her hand-writing, by the which she shall binde her selfe and her descendants to the obseruation of her exclusion and of her descendants, approuing all as it is contained in this present contract, with all ne- cessary clauses and oaths, and in swearing this present Capitulation, and the foresaid bond and ratification, which her Highnesse hath giuen and made, shee shall also make another like vnto it with the most Christian King, as soone as she shall be married, the which shall C be enrolled in the Court of Parliament of Paris according vnto forme; as also his Catholike Maiesty shall cause the said renouciation and ratification to be enrolled in his Councell of State: and in case the said renouciations and ratifications bee made or not made, from this present by vertue of this contract, and the marriage which shall follow, they shall be held as duly made and granted.

IX. That his most Christian Maiesty should giue vnto the Infanta Lady Anna for her Iewels to the value of fifty thousand Crownes of the Sun, the which with all others that she shall bring with her, she shall freely enioy without any difficulty, as the goods of her patrimony, the which shall belong to her Highnesse, and to her heyes and successors, or to such as shall haue right.

X. That their most Christian Maiesties, according to the ancient and commendable D custome of the royall House of France, shall assigne to the Infanta Lady Anna for her dowry twentie thousand Crownes of the Sun yearly, out of such lands and reuennues as shall haue execution of iustice, whereof the chiefe place shall haue the title of a Duchy or more; which lands and places so giuen and assigned, the said Infanta shall enioy by her selfe, or by her Commissioners and Officers, with the execution of iustice: and moreover, that the prouision of all offices being void, shall belong vnto her, as all Queenes of France haue vsually had: Provided alwaies, that the said offices shall not be giuen but to naturall Frenchmen, as also the government and forming of the said lands, according to lawes and E customes of the Realme of France: of which assignation the said Infanta Lady Anna shall enter into possession, and enioy during her life as soone as she shall be a widow, whether she theremain in France, or retire her selfe to any other place.

XI. That his most Christian Maiesty shall giue to the Infanta Lady Anna for the ex- pences of her Chamber and the entertainment of her estate and house, a conuenient sum, such as belongs to the daughter and wife of so great Kings, assigning it vnto her after the accustomed manner of France, in giuing assignations for such entertainments and charges.

XII. That the Infanta hauing attained to twelve yeares of age, they shall marrie by the Proctors which the most Christian King shall send, and the Infanta by words present- ly: the which being done, his Catholike Maiesty shall cause her to bee conducted at his F own cost and charges vnto the frontiers of France, with such attendance and traine as shall be fitting for the wife and daughter of so great Kings, where she shall be received by the most Christian King with the like traine and attendance.

XIII. That if the marriage should happen to be dissolved and broken off betwixt the most Christian King and the Infanta Lady Anna, and that her Highnesse shall summe the King, it shall then be lawfull for her to retire without any hindrance into Spaine, or else- where at her pleasure, carrying away her dowry, Jewels, apparell, plate, and all other mouables whatsoeuer, with her officers and seruants, without any stay, lett, or hindrance, directly directly or indirectly, enjoying the dowry and assignations which haue beene giuen her: A and to this end, the most Christian King shall giue to the Catholike King and the Infanta Lady Anna his daughter, such Letters of assurance as shall be necessary, signed with his owne hand, and by the Queene Regent, and sealed with his seale: the which they shall assure and promise for them and their successors in the word of a King.

XIV. That seeing this present treaty of marriage had beene desired and advanced by our holy Father, and by his meanes brought to this estate, it shall be fit to entreat his Holinesse (as their Maiesties doe at this present) to be inserted in his Bulls, together with his approbations which their Maiesties and her Highnesse haue made, and the writings and oaths which they haue giuen and taken.

XV. That both Kings shall approue and ratifie this present capitulation, and shall promise vpon the word and faith of a King to keepe it inuolably: for the effecting whereof they shall declare their Letters of ratification, after the accustomed manner one vnto another, within two moneths after the date of these presents, by their ordinary Ambassadors residing in the Courts of both Kings.

All which the sayd Commissioners did conclude and promise in their names, as is contained in this present capitulation, hauing bound their Maiesties and Highnesse to obserue and keepe it without any contrauention, directly or indirectly: for so the said Commissioners haue promised by vertue of the authority they haue from their Maiesties, and to that end they haue set to their names, &c.

Mayens second and once.*

These Articles being past, the 22 of the said Moneth was chosen for the publication of D the marriage, and for the second audience of the Duke of Mayen; the which for that it was very lately, even in the opinion of the Spaniards, who commend that which concerns strangers but coldly. I will briefly runne it ouer.

On the 22 of August, about fise of the clocke in the euening, the Duke of Lerma came to the Duke of Mayens lodging, being accompanied by all the great men in Court, who were brauely mounted, and richly apparelled. Going to the palace, there marched 150 French Gentlemen, two and two, their apparell glistring with embroydery and rich stones. Their Pages went on either side bare-headed, their lueries being of veluet of diuers colours, with short cloakes, round hose, and long stockings, hauing their cloathes layed on with gold and siluer lace.

On either side of the Duke of Mayen were twenty of his footmen clad in crimson veluet, hauing their ierkins, short cloakes, and panned hose embroydred with gold and siluer, the lining of their cloakes and hose were of satin of the same colour. Then came twentie Pages bare-headed, and in the same livery. After this followed the Duke himselfe in a sute all embroydred with gold and siluer, his ierkin and the panes of his hose were cut vpon cloth of gold and siluer, long white stockings, a short blacke cloake, with the same embroydery, white pumpe with two great iewels of diamonds in stead of roses, blacke veluet pantofoles embroydred with gold and diamonds; his cap was of blacke veluet, with a very rich Iewell, and a band answerable vnto it; his girdle, hangers, rapier and dagger were all set with diamonds, and his cloake and garments had many iewels and chaines of F precious stones.

His horse was in a manner couered with a foot-cloath of blacke Veluet, embroydred like vnto his apparell, all the rest of the furniture was of blacke Veluet, couered with buttons and roses of Diamonds; for boffes he had two great iewels, and for his reins hee had two scarfes of Cloth of siluer cut and embroydred with Gold. Then followed his Caroch of the same livery, drawne by six pyed horses, their harness being of Crimson Veluet embroydred with Gold. This was followed by two others of the same veluet, the

A the one hauing fixe gray horses, and the other fixe bay, and all the Coach-men were in Crimfon Veluet embroydred with gold and siluer. After these followed 8 Caroches of the Kings full of French Gentlemen, very richly apparelled. In this pompe they came vnto the Palace, and stayed in a great Hall, whereas the Duke of Mayen being set betwixt the Popes Nuncio, and the Duke of Lerma; the rest of the Nobility being of either side, one of the Kings Secretaries of State read the conditions of marriage, which hee brought to the Dukes to signe.

From thence they went vnto the King, whom they found in his mourning habite vnder a Cloath of State, betwixt our Queene, attired in white Sattin embroydred with B Pearle and Diamonds, and the Prince his son, clad also in white, with a short cloake & long stockings. The Duke being entred, hauing done his obeysance to the King, he adressed himselfe first to the Queene, to whom he did his complements for al France. After which, he spake vnto the King, and hauing saluted the Prince, hee went vnto all the Ladies, who came vpon their knees to salute the new Queene; after which he retired to his lodging, the freetes being full of Torches and bonfires, with many Drummes, Trumpets and Haultboyes.

The Saturday following, the duke of Mayen being with the Queene, the King sent for him to haue him walke with him, which is a rare fauour; and it was the greater, for that the King caryed him through the City, discoursing with him of many things in French C with great familiarity, which bred admiration in the Spaniards. At this time he caused all the Frenchmen that were in prison, or in the gallies in Spaine, to be set at liberty. But omitting for breuity sake all other things that were remarkable during his abode in Madrid, we will now set him on his way homeward, hauing taken leaue of the King & yong Queene; but before his departure the Queene presented him with a chaine and a band valued at 15000 Crownes, and with foure Ienners of Spaine. The Duke of Macheradid giue him foure more with their caparasons of Satin cut in flowers, and the Duke of Alua presented him with two. He on the other side presented vnto the Infanta in the name of the King his Master a booke of precious stones all couered with Diamonds; after which, he went out of Madrid in the same order they entred, but the mules had their go- D uernings of Scarlet embroydred with blacke and white, and his pages and other seruants were in lueries of the same colours. At the same time the Duke of Pastrana was sent into France by the King of Spaine for the same subiect: he parted from Madrid in Iuly, and hauing receiued all the honors and shewes of publike ioyes as hee past through France, they could deuise; he came in August to Paris making his entry on the 13 day, being met with all by the Duke of Neuers with 500 French Gentlemen; his entry was rich and statly: the King, the Queene Regent, Queene Marguerit, with all the Princesses and Ladies being in euerrall houses on our Ladyes bridge to see the Shew.

The Duke of Guise was sent to bring him to his first audience, being followed by a great troope of the French Nobility, who were very rich both in their owne apparell and E the furniture of their horses. The Duke of Pastrana was all in blacke, but his cloake was intrich with diamonds & pearles. He had many Noblemen & Dons of Spaine with him, they were all in blacke, but their Cappes and cloakes were garnished with stones; they had horses from the Kings stable, with foot cloathes of blacke Veluet. Euery Spaniard of note, to the number of thirty, marche betwixt two French Noblemen. After this traime came two Groomes of the dukes livery, leading two Mules with their cloathes of Crimfon Veluet, embroydred with gold & siluer; they were laden with Presents which the Prince of Spaine and the Infanta sent vnto their Maiesties: he had his audience in the great Gallerie, when hauing performed what he had in charge to the King, Queene and Madam, hee deliuered his Presents, and so retired to his lodging at 9 of the clocke at night, there being 120 Torches to attend him.

Hauing spent almost 15 daies in being visited by the Princesses, Cardinals, and all the great men in Court, and in visiting them and the great Ladies againe, after some balls and a great dancing at Queen Marguerits, he had his last audience in September, and took his leaue. The King sent him a Iewell of 20000 Crownes, and the Queene a pointed Diamonds of 4000 Crownes: She also sent a hat-band of stones to Don Francisco de Sylua the dukes brother of 2500 Crownes value, in requital of a Bezar stone which hee had presented her with, being almost as big a kids head.

A false brute of the Kings death.Death of the Earle of Soifsons.Richers booke deposited called in question.

In the beginning of October, Paris was put into a wonderfull feare vpon a false brute A which went through the City that the King was slaine. This hapned about 3 of the clock in the afternoon, vpon this occasion: Some souldiers of the regiment which were then in guard fel to quarrell neere vnto the Corps de Garde, so after words of reproach & threats they fell to blowes and drew their swords, in which one whose name was Le Roy was wounded, the rest crying out that he was dead; this cry Le Roy est mort, the King is dead, past into the cares of many like vnto lightning, who understanding not the businesse presently, gaue it out that the King was dead, and that he had been slaine: The Parisians were all so amazed as they thought themselves to be ruined, beginning to shut vp their shops, and to take Armes for their preservation. The souldiers of the regiment ran from all parts B to their quarters, to take armes, and to receive directions from their Leaders, where hearing that it was but a false brute, they were no further moued, but the people were still in feare: his Maiesty was then gone to hunt at Bois de Vincennes, and returned late to the Louure, where the Queene being aduertised of what past, she tooke Councell to send the King on horse-backe about the freets of Paris, with 3 trumpets, and his company of light hories: whereat the Parisians were much satisfied, and in the meane time they were apprehended that were the cause of this tumult, and committed to prison. As this yeare began with ioy & triumphs, so it ended with mourning & affliction: Their Maiesties being at Fontaine-bleau: Charles of Bourbon Earle of Soissons, a Prince of the blood, and Lord Steward of France, being retired (after the first solemnities of the Kings marriage) C to his Castell of Blandy, he was surprisid with agreat sicknesse the 17 of October, and dyed the first day of Nouember in the presence of the Countesse his wife, and his seruants: she had married Anna of Montai Lady of Lucé and Bonnesable, by whom he left one sonne and 4 daughters. The gouernments of Dauphin, Picardy and Normandy had been committed vnto him, he liued 46 yeares, & 27 daies: his body was interred in the ancient monument of the Bourbons at the Carthusiens of Gallion. The Court was very heauy for his death, and their Maiesties much grieved: all France lamented his losse, but especially the Prince of Conde his nephew, his son now Earle of Soissons succeeded him, and is at this day the second Prince of the blood, and the fourth person of the House of France.

This yeare there had been a great controuersie among the Doctors of Diuinity of the D Colledge of Sorbon, touching a booke composed by M. Edmund Richer Sindique or controller of that facultie, the which was entituled Depositate Ecclesiastica & Politica: and printed without any name either of Author or Printer: which booke was allowed of some, as profitable to the rights & liberties of the French Church: others thought it pernicious, as contradicting directly the Popes authority: wherupon the Colledge of Sorbon resolved to assemble the first of March (being their custome so to do the first day of euery moneth) to consult about the censuring of Richers booke. But the Court of Parliament being informed thereof, by the kings Attorney General, they sent to forbid the Doctors of the said facultie, to censure the said booke, vntill they had proceeded legally according to the conclusion of the Kings Attorney General: forbidding them by a decree E not to assemble or proceed any farther, but to appeare the next day in Court: where they were heard and examined touching that and all other such bookes: whereupon, after the conclusions of the Kings Attorney General, a decree was made that all the Copies of that booke should be brought to the Register of the Court and that Richer the Author thereof should call in all the copies which he had disperised within three daies, vntill the Court should be satisfied in that which concerned the Kings seruice touching that subject. In the meane time the Bishops which were Suffragans vnto the Archbishop of Sens, examined the same booke and found it worthy of censure, and censured it for many erroneous propositions therein contained, without meddling with the Kings rights, or the liberties of the French Church: and they forbid all Christians which were vnder F their iurisdiction to reade the said booke vpon paine of Ecclesiasticall censure: which censure was published throughout all Paris: wherunto the said Richer opposed himselfe and appealed from the said censure as abusive, presenting a petition vnto the Court that his appeale might bee allowed, the which hee obtained; and it was decreed that his letters should bee received: and so the said censure was to bee suspended, and the Bishops enioyned not to inuocate any thing against the said Richer touching that subject.

A Proposition
in the Sorbon
to depose Richer from his place of Sindique.

On the first of Iune following, there was a solemne assembly of all the Doctors of Diuinity, in the great Hall of the Colledge of Sorbon, in which there appeared 70 Doctors with the Sindique Richer. The Abbot of S. Victor, a Doctor of the said facultie, propounding in this assemble, that Doctor Richer had bene now very long Comptroller of the faculty, that they must giue him thanks and choosé another; being necessary the faculty should haue many men acquainted with their affaires; and that if Richer should dye they had not any. And to the end they might haue their voices free, he required that Doctor Richer might retire himselfe out of the assembly. Vpon this proposition D. Reguenans Deane of the said facultie, said, that he had neuer seene in any ordinary assembly so many B Doctors of Diuinity; that he should not be able to cause the order and dignity thereof to be obserued, if all the Doctors were not in mutuall concord: that hee had neuer seene any Sindique dismiss from his charge, if he himselfe did not desire it, or had giuen some lawfull cause of diffinition: that Doctor Richer had not done any thing vnworthy of his charge; but contrariwise, that the whole Vniuersity of Paris, and especially the faculty of Diuinity were much bound vnto him; and that they should rather studie how to commend him for his paines, then to dismisse him from his place: and therefore he could not propound vnto the assembly to proceed vnto the election of another Sindique.

After this, Richer began to speake for himselfe, alleaging many things touching his preferment to that place, and how he had caried himselfe therein, opposing himselfe to the C proposition which had bene made. Hereupon the Assembly was diuided. There were 43 Doctors which did adhere to the proposition of the Abbot of S. Victor, and 25 maintained the Sindiques opposition. This bred a great diuision among them, and of a private action became a matter of State: for being assembled in Iuly, the Court of Parliament sent vnto the Doctors to forbid them to make any proposition, and the Queene in like manner had by her Letters made the like iunction; the which was onely done to suppress the differences and diuisions which might grow among them.

Notwithstanding these prohibitions, the Abbot of S. Victor with his adherents, desired to proceed to a new election, hoping to effect it on the first of August; but the day before, the Lord Chancellor sent an Vher of the Councell vnto the Deane, commanding D him in the Kings name not to treat in the Assembly, (which should be the next day) of the proposition made touching the election of a new Sindique of the faculty, for that his Maiesty would take order for it. But after so many pursuits, the Abbot prevailed, so as notice was giuen vnto Richer, that hee should no more oppose himselfe to the election of a new Sindique, for many considerations; and that it were better to be done with his owne consent then otherwise: wherunto Richer refusing to yeeld, two Vhers were sent on the first of September to the Assembly, bringing the Kings Letters Patents vnto the Deane & Doctors, enioyning them to proceed to a new election; which being read, Richer still opposed himselfe, protesting of nullity of all which had bin done against him, & persisted in his appeale: yet notwithstanding they proceeded to a new election; and by a general E consent, D. Filesc Curate of S. Iohn in Greue, was choosen Sindique: After which the Deane and many Doctors went presently to the Vhers, who attended to certifie their Maiesties and the Chancellor of their obedience to the said Letters.

After this it was concluded, that hereafter the Sindique of the faculty should not hold the place above two yeares, and that vpon the end of the first yeare, he should demand of the facultie if they were pleased hee should continue the next. And vpon a proposition made by Doctor Filesc, their new Sindique, it was decreed, that hereafter the Sindique should not write the Conclusions alone, but that euery yeare foure Doctors should be chozen to assist him.

You haue formerly heard of the factions at S. Iohn D'Angely, their Maiesties imputing F the fault to the Duke of Rohan, whom onely they blamed in particular, as they had declared vnto the general Deputies of their subjects making profession of the Religion, to aduertise them thereof throughout all the Prouinces: and therefore they assured themselves to be equally assisted by all their subjects both of the one and the other Religion; they hauing the like interest for the reformation of this act, which regards the general good of the State, and in no sort any question of Religion, nor the obseruation of the Edicts, which their Maiesties would in that which concerns the towne of Saint Iohn D'Angely, and in all other things fully entertaine and obserue: wherof desiring their sub- ics iccts should be well enformed, to the end that (as commonly men when they cannot hide A their faults seeke to colour them, and that there is no action but may finde some pretext if he will vse disguisings, although it be hard in a matter so plaine and manifest) no man may suffer himselfe to be deceived to his owne priuate losse, and that of the publicke. After this, there were some Letters of abolition granted touching the particular Assemblies which they of the Religion had made in many Prouinces without the Kings permission; whereupon their Nationall Synode which they had held at Prius, caused this following Declaration to be published.

A Declaration
of the reformed Churches assembled at Prius.

The reformed Churches of this Realme assembled in a Prouinciall Synode at Prius, after an oath taken, according to their custome, of their fidelities and most humble obedience to the commandments and seruice of their Maiesties: hearing by the report of many Deputies of Prouinces, that the Kings Letters Patents had bene directed to the Parliaments and Chambers of the Edict, containing an abolition and remission of pretended faults committed in the conuocation of the priuate Assemblies of the said Prouinces: as also of that which hath past in regard thereof.

They declared, that the said Letters of abolition were neuer required, demanded, or sued for by them: being neither in deed, word, nor thought, culpable of the faults supposed therein; and that they are ready in generall and particular, to answer for their actions, submitting themselves rather to all kinds of punishments, then to suffer themselves and their posterity to be taxed with so shamefull an infamy, the which might hereafter C deprime them of the honour which they have alwayes had to be held by all good Frenchmen and strangers, most faithfull subiects to the King, incorruptible and most affectionate to the good of the State.

Moreouer, they declare, that they will not in any sort make vse of the said Letters, and that they disauow all consents and pursuits, if there were any; and such as haue demanded or approued them, contrary and preiudiciall to the sincerety of their intentions and their approued fidelity: protesting moreover to witnesse it by their voluntary expoling of their goods, liues, and honours, in the execution of the duties, seruice, and obedience which their Maiesties may expect of them, as from their most humble, faithfull, and obedient subiects and seruants.

A tumult at Rochel.

In September this yeare, there fell out a great mutiny and alteration in Rochel, begun by a multitude of the baser sort, who trooped together to the number of a thousand or twelue hundred, with their armes: The Maior and chiefe of the towne, sought by all means possible to pacifie them, fearing lest some sinister euent should follow this great tumult: for they found the streets full of armed men, the corners of them barricadoed, and the chaires drawne: their chiefeft quarrell was against the Seigneur of Coudray who was a Councillor in the Court of Parliament at Paris, and one of the Sherifffes of Rochel: He was descended of a good Family; his father had bene Maior, and hee was allied to the best Houses. The peoples fury was such against him, and his danger so great, as seeing the signes they had against his person, hee entreated the Maior to cause him to be conducted safely out of the gates, the which he did, but with very great difficulty, by reason of the incensed rage of this multitude, where the Maior had some affront done vnto his person.

The imaginary causes of the tumult.

The causes of this disorder were held but imaginary. Firft, They demanded reason of an outrage done vnto some of them the day before by Iames Vacher elected Maior, who had threatened them being armed in their Court de guard, to cause them to be carried to Paris with halters about their neckes: they would haue the towne purged from traitors and wicked men, who sought to perfwade the Queene, that they were no good subiects to the King. The Seigneur of Coudray was not pleasing vnto them, as well for that which happened the yeare before, where they conceived he sought to make some innovations in their customes: as also for that his last coming was ill taken, being before the cessation of the Parliament, all things being quiet; as also for diuers aduertisements which they had received, that he had certaine Commissions, & among others, that of Intendants of the iustice, and some added of the government: but he gaue them full satisfaction therein, both in generall and particular before these troubles; so as men imagined they had no more thought off it. But it seemed that the causes of this tumult proceeded from that which followeth: for it was bruted amongst the people, that Monsieur de Coudray and others employed by him,

A him, had practised the voices of many of the body of the towne, to draw it from the vnion and correspondency which they had with the Churches of this Realme, a point which was so tickle, as that alone was sufficient to draw the people to any extraordinary action.

By a verball proceffe made concerning this tumult, they found that the onely cause proceeded from the Councillor de Coudray, who had charge from their Maiesties, to hinder the calling of an Assembly, which some of the said Religion, (especially those which were not satisfied with the Edict of pacification, as it was verified in the court of Parliament) had resolved to hold on at Rochel without their Maiesties permission: and to haue any to B any alterations which might happen: and to aduertise them of what was necessary for the maintaining of their subiects of both religions in peace in those Countries. But he being thrust out of the towne by this popular tumult, they held an Assembly by their owne authority, and drew many demands, as appears by their Declaration.

of those of the religion at Rochel.

But the King being in Councell, declared, that he would haue no regard to any instructions or articles that should be presented vnto him on the behalfe of that pretended Assembly, or of any priuate man which went thither to that effect, the Conuocation being vnlawfull and made contrary vnto the Edict, and without permission: But touching that whereof his Maiesty gaue good hope vnto Monsieur de Rouuray before his voyage to Rochel, concerning them of the Religion in generall, most of which had bene granted by C his answer to the articles formerly presented, hee would cause it to bee put in execution. And as for the articles contained in their instructions which concerne particular men, his Maiesty had resolved and decreed, that if those his subiects of the reformed religion, whom it may concerne, returning to their duties, and those which are come to Rochel to assist at the said pretended Assembly, shall retire themselves into their Prouinces, they shall haue all Letters granted, and necessary dispatches made, to enjoy the effect of that whereof his Maiesty gaue hope vnto the Seigneur of Rouuray before his departure. And concerning the other demands added to the instructions since his voyage; his Maiesty declares, that hee cannot change any thing of the Edict of Nantes, secret articles, Briefes, Answers, and Declarations made by the deceased King; the which he will cause D to be inuolubly obserued and kept, and make his subiects of the said religion, to enjoy all the graces, grants, and aduantages which haue bene granted vnto them thereby, and in the like manner as they haue done during the life of the deceased King, without any change or alteration: As also he would cause them to enjoy all such graces and concessions as had bene granted vnto them since his coming to the Crowne: And to that end there should be a generall declaration made presently by his Maiesty, for a further confirmation of the said Edicts, Articles, Briefes, and Letters, with Injunctions to all Officers, to suffer his said subiects to enjoy them fully and quietly. Which Declaration contained a forgetfulness of that which had been done and past in preiudice of the said Edicts and Declarations, disanulling all pursuits and proceedings which had bene made. And to the intent this his intention and will should be more exactly obserued, he commanded the Marshalls of France of either religion to go their circuits throughout the Prouinces which should be assigned vnto them, as had bene anciently obserued, and according to the duty of their places; whom hee would cause to bee accompanied by Iudges and such forces as should be necessary to countenance his good and faithfull subiects, and to punish such as should contradict the Edicts, and trouble the publicke peace, This Declaration was signed and published the 15 of December.

The Kings Declaration touching the Assembly.

A Declaration touching the confirmation of the Edict.

Towards the end of the yeare, the Court of Parliament, Guardian of the rights and priuiledges of the Crowne of France, seized vpon a certaine pernicious Booke tending to the rebellion of subiects against soueraigne power, written in Latine by Gaspar Strippius, E printed in Germany, and brought into France from Francfort Mart. The Court, finding that this booke (entituled Ecclesiasticus) contained an infinite number of execrable blasphemies and scandalous assertions against the glorious memorie of the deceased King Henry the Great, with other propositions tending to trouble the quiet of Christendome; against the safety, life, and estate of Soueraigne Princes: made a decree (the Chambers being all three assembled) that the said booke should be burnt by the Hangman publicly in the Palace yard, and inhibitions to all Printers and Booke-sellers, to print, sell, receiue, or publish it, forbidding all men of what condition, or quality, to seepe, or conceale ceale any of the sayd bookes : enioyning them that had any, that within foure and twenty houres after publication of the said Decree, as well within the City of Paris by sound of Trumpet, as within all the Bayliwicks of that iurisdiction, to bring or send them to the Criminnall Register of the said Court, and in other townes to the Registers there, to bee burnt : and they which should oppose against this Decree, to bee punished as Traitors.

Death of the
master.

Among many great and learned personages whom God called this yeare to a better life, Nicholas le Febvre the Kings Schoole-master was one. He had beene chosen by the deceased King Henry to instruct the Prince of Conde, and the Queene Regent held him worthy for the King her sonne, whereof he was most capable : hauing spent a yeare and a halfe in this instruction, being in the Kings chamber to attend his charge, he was suddenly taken with a shaking and trembling of the heart, so as he was forced to goe presently to his lodging, and to betake him to his bed : but finding at that instant that his life grew towards an end, he made a worthy preparation to death, before which he commanded his funerals should bee simple and meane, making choice of his graue in Saint Innocents Church-yard : His pietie appears in his Testament, and by this Epitaph, which he himselfe made.

confured.*

In the end of the last yeare, the Colledge of Sorbon (jealous of the greatnesse, life, and safety of their Kings) had seized vpon a certaine Booke written by Becanus, entituled : The Controuersie of England, touching the Kings power and the Popes. In the beginning of the last yeare, this Booke had beene reuiued, corrected, and augmented at Meitz in Germany, being allowed by Henry Scherennus, Prouinciall of the Iesuits, by the authority of Claudian Aquavina, Generall of that Society : which Author said, That the Pope is vniuersall Pastor of the Church, to whom Christ said, Feed my sheepe : And that by the dogges are vnderstood Kings and Emperours. Wherefore these Dogs whilist they are faithfull and vigilant, must obey their Shepheard : but if they be loathfull and idle, the Shepheard must presently depose them and driue them away.

It was therefore held necessary, to condemne these bad interpretations, and to provide for the safety of the Kings life, the quiet of his subiects, and the preservation of the Realm, and to prevent such parricides as had beene committed vnder colour of Religion : seeing that vpon such bad interpretations, a wicked wretch called Scoppius the Encomiastes of Parricides had grounded himselfe, to the end he might draw on others, saying in his booke called Ecclesiasticus, That none but Turkes and Heretikes had lamented the death of King Henry the Great, or condemned the fact of Rauillac. Wherefore on the 7 of Ianuary, the Sorbon deputed certaine Doctors of the faculty to goe vnto the Queene and Chancellor, to whom they represented summarily what had beene done in their Assembly, touching the pernicious propositions of Becanus booke, and that they had beene aduersified by their Sindique Filesc, that the Cardinall of Bonfy by commandement from the Queene had giuen him charge not to censure the same booke, for that her Maiesty was resolved to take another course. But for that this matter was of very great importance, the company thought good to let her Maiesty vnderstand, that they had surceased from all conclusions to witnes their humble obedience, vntill her pleasure were further knowne. Yet the said Faculty so much feare that their silence and delay might be so taken by posterity, as

A if the Diuines of Paris had allowed of this seditious doctrine, and had condemned the decrees of their predecessors, by the which the life & soueraine authority of Kings is maintained; wherein they referred themselves to the Chancellors great wisdom, but the whole body of the Diuines of Paris, desired that their belief vpon his point might be manifested to the world. To whom the Chancellor said, that he commended the care of the said Faculty : that hauing read Becanus booke, he held it most pernicious : and that it was necessary that the doctrine of the Sorbon should be knowne to the world, to be directly against it, and that there should be some remedy provided lest this doctrine of Becanus should creepe in with more violence among the people wherefore hee was resolved to bring them vnto the Queene, and to recommend the care of the said Faculty vnto her Maiesty, as he did; she promising to take aduice in Councell, and to resolve them by the Chancellor. To whom the Doctors repaired the 12 of Ianuary, to vnderstand the Queens pleasure, who told them that her Maiesty thinking that Becanus booke had not been common, & that there had been but one copy or two in France, would iudiciously haue rather suppressed it by silence then otherwise, wherewith shee had acquainted the Cardinall of Bonfy, but being informed that it was in the hands of many, she thought it fit to referre it vnto the fidelity and conscience of the said Faculty, to do as they thought it good; and that their Decree should be inserted in the Register of the said Faculty, whereunto posterity in the like controuersie might haue recourse.

C Yet afterwards Filesc the Sindique, hauing red a certaine copy of a decree made by the Pope, containing the censure of the said booke, made at Rome in an assembly of the Cardinals, the 3 of Ianuary this present yeare, for that there were found in this booke many things which were false, rash, scandalous, and seditious respectively, and forbidden to be printed in any language vntill it were corrected : and for the better assurance thereof, hauing read some letters of Testimony from the Bishop of Monte-pulciano the Popes Nuncio in France, he stayed the making of any Decree touching the said pernicious propositions, assuring them that the Chancellor had forbidden it. Thus the controuersie touching Becanus booke ended, whereupon some were of opinion, that the word *respectu*ly in the Popes censure was put in of purpose as a terme of euasion, to shew that the Iesuites doe not absolutely condemne Becanus doctrine, but onely in regard of the French, who were most offended therewith.

The incensed fury and rage of the Nobility and Gentry of France running daily to Duels and Combats, sometimes at the place Royall by Moone-light like madmen; some time without Saint Honories gate or Saint Anthones : did in the beginning of this yeare much afflict the King, Queene, and the whole Court. The Earle of Breteigne and the Marquis of Nefle, hauing made many assignations to fight, were still prevented, and in the end reconciled by the Princes and Marshalls of France. Among many men of note which had beene slaine by these combats, that which did most afflict the Queene was the counter of the Cheualier de Guise, with the Baron of Luz Lieutenant General for the King in the Duchy of Bourgandy : they meet in Saint Honories street, where the Cheualier perceiving the Baron (whom he fought for) to be in his Caroch accompanied by some Gentlemen, he advanced willing him to come forth, and withall drew his sword, gaue his cloak to one of his followers, left his horse, and offered him the combat : which the Baron de Luz seeing, he presently leapt out of his Caroch and put himselfe in defence. But at the second thrust the Baron fell downe dead vpon the place : which the Gentlemen of his traine perceiving, they made offer to defend him, but being hindered by the Cheualiers followers, they gaue way, and all they could doe was to put the Barons body into his Caroch, and to cary it speedily to his lodging. The street was suddenly full of Noblemen and Gentlemen, which made men thinke there had beene some tumult and sedition. The Cheualier retired himselfe to the house of Guise, where the dukes the Prince of Ioinville, and the Archbishop of Rheims did much blame him in the Queens behalfe, for that he had slaine so worthy a Gentleman, and so good a seruant to the King. Monseigneur le Grand being then in Bourgundy, hearing these things, was much grieved. But I cannot expresse the wonderful sorrow of the young Baron of Luz his onely sonne, a goodly Gentleman : who resolved to be reuenged, though with the hazard of his owne life. To effect the which, about a moneth after, hee sent a Gentleman called du Riol to the Cheualier with this following Challenge.

Of Duels and beginning of this yeare.

A Challenge
from the young Baron of Luz
to the Cheuallier de Guise.The Cheuallier kills the young Baron of Luz.

My Lord. None can be a more faithfull witness of the iust subiect of my griefe then your A selfe: and therefore I pray you most humbly to pardon my sensible feeling thereof. I iurue you by this note to doe me the honour that I may see my selfe with my sword in my hand against you, to revenge the death of my father. The effectme I haue of your valour, makes me to hope that you will not abate your quality, to avoid that wherunto your honour binds you. This Gentleman will bring you to the place where I am with a good horse and two swords, whereof you shall haue the choice. If this doe not please you, I will see whither I can get you shall command me.

The Cheuallier de Guise was in bed when du Riol brought him this Challenge, having read it, he arose presently, and du Riol holpe to dresse him: then sending for Mont-de Grignan, a Knight of Malta, he entreated him to accompany him; and so they parted without the priuity of any one. They went out of Saint Anthonies gate, and du Riol brought him to the place where the Baron of Luz was. The Cheuallier & Baron being visited by their seconds, and their doubtles off, all foure being on horse-backe, having taken the field, they began to aduance with their swords in their hands. At the first passado the Baron wounded the Cheuallier in the arme; but at the third the Cheuallier ran the Baron through the body, who falling from his horse had no other need but to care for his soules health. The Cheuallier ranne speedily to the two seconds, for Grignan had re-ceiued two wounds from du Riol who was not hurt, who seeing himselfe ready to be charged by two, the Baron lying along and neere his death, hee bethought himselfe of his retreat, recouering Charenton, and afterwards Bourgundy. On a sudden the field was full of Noblemen and Cheualliers, but they found no man but the Baron lying in the dust, whom his friends rooke presently vp: a losse which afflicted the rest of his friends, and troubled the whole Court: But the Duke of Guise and his brethren were wonderfully perplexed, having heard that the Cheuallier was wounded to death but seeing him returne but lightly hurt, they were much comforted, and gaue God thanks for his escape. Hee kept his chamber for a time, as well by reason of his wounds, as for the displeasure the Queene had conceiued against him for the death of these two Noblemen, the father and sonne.

Belongeth (saie
by Montigny-Hall).

In the same moneth Montigny-Hall a young Gentleman being in Paris, sent a challenge D to the Seigneur of Bethunes, Campe-maister to one of the French Regiments in Holland.
The place was appointed, they met, and Bethunes lost his life. He was much lamented for that he was a braue and valiant Gentleman. His friends made this Epitaph for him.

*Passenger, stay thy steps, beare reuerence to this tombe, Cyrus of Bethunes is here enclosed:
He had many for his exercise, a Caesar for his master, and Offender for a Schoole: glory was his ambition, vertue his loue, and one onely God his feare. He cherished armes, respected the Lawes, and honoured his Nation: yet armes haue taken him out of the world, the Lawes haue abandoned him, and his Nation hath suffered him to bee lost. Goe weepe for the dead, complaine of the liuing, and content thy selfe.*

O God, what miseries (as a great Prelate said) doe these duels bring. Wee see Families made desolate, fathers lament the losse of their children, wiuers their husbands, France her Captaines and choice souldiers, the King his Nobility (the ornament of his Crowne) and God his soules, whom Satan doth snatch from him. So many Edicts and Defences made by Saint Lewis, Henry the second, Charles the ninth, Henry the Great, and the King now reigning, against the inuention of encounters without challenge, could neuer suppress this deuillish course of combats and duels, which is to be reproued as a most fawne thing, and neuer in vse among the Ancients, except it were in warre, that is to say, a subiect against the enemy by his Generals permission, or one General against another, to spare the subiects blood, whereof there are many examples in Histories.

The Kings Edict against duels.

The King seeking to prevent these mischiefs whereby his subiects might receiue the benefit, with the aduise of the Queene Regent, the Princes of the blood, and officers of the Crowne, he confirmed all the former Edicts by his Declaration. And to take away al hope to obtain hereafter any thing from his Majesty that might contradict it, he declared with a firme and irreuoicable resolution, that he would maintain the said Edicts in their full force, without any respect of persons: which his resolution he would haue made knowne

A vnto all the Princes of the blood, and other Princes and officers of the Crowne, and to all his Courts of Parliaments, subiects and seruants; and that he had no intent hereafter to grant any pardons or remissions for the breach of the said Edicts and Declaration: forbidding them expressly, not to sue, entreat or mediate in those cafes to his Majesty, nor vnto the Queene Regent his mother, vpon paine of their indignation: forbidding them also to retire or conceale any such offenders in their houses, or other places, or to giue them any support or assistance, but to discouer and deliuer them into the hands of iustice, if they were required by the officers, giuing them all ayd and assistance to doe it if they may. And this was the effect of the Kings Declaration: wherunto the Court added, that if any Letters of abolition were directed to the Prouost of the Kings house, and iudgement giuen by him, notwithstanding the said Letters, the proceeding should be void, and they should proceed against the offenders according to the Edicts and the Kings Declaration: neither should they which stood in contempt bee admitted to purge themselves, vntill they paid the third part of the fines adiudged against them, to the vse of the poore that were in that vp.

The Kings Declaration touching the maintenance of the Edict of pacification, being read in the Towne-house of Rochel, in the presence of the chiefe inhabitants, it was concluded by a general consent, that they would obey his Majesties will: And that they should forbid the continuance of the Assembly of those of the Religion come from diuers Prouinces into their towne. Vpon this resolution, there were some (which since the assembly at Saumur, were possessed with ieaousie) made diuers conuenticles and secret as-semblies, where they propounded many things, and made diuers enterprises, whereof the Maior was aduertised, assuring him that the tenth day of the moneth was appointed for the execution of many pernicious designs; and that many gentlemen were coming from
S. Iohn D'Angely towards Rochel, to support the vnderakers. The Maior knowing the time when these Gentlemen should arriue, and that their partisans should take armes, he prevented them foure houres, and hindered their designs.

By the aduise of the chiefe Burgeses (to prevent all accidents) hee caused an alarme to be suddenly giuen, and seized vpon all the quarters of the towne by men able to stay such as had any will to mutine: then he caused all the Corps de Guards to sweare that they should not acknowledge any command but his, and made the townsmen to be all night in armes.

The next day being the 11 of January, hee caused an assembly of the townsmen to bee made, where those of the Court of Iustice and men of all qualities assisted. There he propounded, to haue a prohibition published vpon paine of death for any man to make any assemblies. This was not onely commended by a general consent, but they did all swear to employ their liues and goods to haue it obserued, and to discouer such as should infringe it. Vpon this resolution, he caused this Declaration to bee published by sound of Trumpet.

BY the Maior and Captaine of this Towne. WHEREAS some (desirous to breed diuisions and dangerous factions among the inhabitants of this Towne) make Conuenticles and as-semblies both by night and day: vsing seditious speeches among the people, assailing many men of qualitie with inuurious and slanderous reproaches: Wee doe expressly forbid all persons of what qualitie and condition soeuer, dwelling within this Towne, to make any Assemblies or Conuenticles either by night or day, vpon paine of death. Enioyning all those which shall haue knowledge thereof, to discouer it speedily, vpon paine to be punished as fauourers of the said Conuenticles: Wee also strictly forbid all the said inhabitants to quarrell or wrong one another either in word or deed: or to carie any Pecee either by night or day, vpon paine of corporall punishment.

The Maior of Rochel's Declaration.

The day after this Proclamation, the assembly of the Deputies sent two vnto the Maior being in the Towne-house, and protested vnto him that they would obey the Kings Declaration, and retire into their Prouinces, beseeching him to suffer some of them to continue in the Towne for their safety, vntill the Kings declaration were verified in their Prouinces: also that all those which were constrained to abandon the towne for that which happened therein on the fift of September 1612, might returne againe into their houses to liue in peace and quiet. So the Maiors care and vigilancy made them yield obedience to his Maiesties will, and procured concord among the Citizens, being much diuided: as A also in the said tumult his wisedome did preuent the accidents of a popular fury.
his

The King continuing his care to prouide for the disorders of his Estate, and seeing the excessive liberty in wearing of gold and silver vpon their garments, the dissolution so common, and the charges so great, as many times they had more vpon their backs then in their purses, he made an Edict this year, in March: Inioyning first of all the Clergie to weare decent habits, besitting their profession; and all his other subiects to abstaine from all superfluities: forbidding expressly all persons in generall vnder his obedience, what quality, sex, or condition foueuer, to weare any gold or silver of in their apparell, either good or counterfeit, in any sort or manner whatsoeuer, vpon the penalty of B 150 pound sterling; excepting the embroydery of saddles and furnitures for horses already made, the which should be tolerated for fixe moneths. He did also forbid all embroyderies vpon garments, in what fort foueuer, were it in gold, silver, or silke, and the vse of Milan laces, vpon a penalty of a hundred pound sterling. Yet by this Edict hee did not forbid the vse of gold, silver, and embroyderies in girdles, hangers, hat-bands, garters, roses, buckles, and supporters of womens ruffes, nor yet the gilding of rapier hilts, armes, spurs, bits for horses, and stirrups. He did also forbid the gilding of all Caroches or houes, were it vpon lead, iron, wood, stone, or plaster, or any other sort whatsoeuer, vpon paine of 100 pound sterling. He did also forbid all Noblemen and Gentlemen, to giue any Liueries of silke to their Pages or Footmen, but onely of cloath, and one lace about. C In like manner all Taylors and Embroiderers were forbidden to make any such garments, vpon paine of thirty pound sterling for the first time, and double for the next offence. The King himselfe, and the Princes, to giue example vnto others to obserue the Edict; forbore to weare any gold or silver in their apparell, wherein they were imitated by all the French Nobility, who shewed themselves very modest and obedient.

War betwixt
the Dukes of Sauoy and Mantua.

All things being in peace both in France and abroad, there began a warre betwixt the Dukes of Sauoy and Mantua; for Francis Duke of Mantua and Marquis of Montferat, being lately dead without any issue male, leauing onely one daughter by the Duke of Sauoyes daughter, his brother Cardinal Ferdinand succeeded him in the said Duchy and Marquisate: The Duke of Sauoy impatient to see his daughter and grandchild, to haue no better D share in those Estates, pretending also a title to the Marquisate; hee resolved to retire his daughter and child from Mantua; and to that end he sent the Earles of Martinegue and Lucerne, and after them the Prince his sonne, to demand her of the Duke: who sent the Bishop of Diocesaria to the Duke of Sauoy, to acquaint him with his intention, which was, not to suffer his Niece of Mantua to depart for reasons of State.

In the meane time the Duke of Sauoy hauing leauied some forces, vpon a colour that it was for the preseruation of his Estates of Sauoy, Piedmont, and Aste, and put them in garison in all his townes, he resolved to surprize the Marquisate of Montferat, (being destitute of sufficient forces to defend it) before that the Duke of Mantua should bee able to send any succours: yea he had drawne many of the Nobility of Montferat to his party, E who promised to serue him in his enterprife.

On the 22 of Aprill, the Duke of Sauoy being at Verfel, he told the Bishop of Diocesaria, that he went forth that night to see some of his companies mustered; and that the next day he would resolve to accommodate the businesse for which he was come, but he did the contrary, for he went to the rendezuous which he had giuen to all his troops, and himselfe in person led them into Montferat, where he tooke Tiino by Pestard, and Albe by Scallado: After which they propounded to besiege Casal, and to force the Cittadell, the which being taken, there was not any other place able to make resistance in the whole Marquisate, which is a little Country, a dayes journey from the Alpes, lying betwene Piedmont, the Seigneury of Genua, and the State of Milan subiect to the King of Spain. F So as the Duke of Mantua, to send succours to Montferat, must passe them through the Country which the Spaniard holds in Lombardy, so that it was to be feared, the Duke of Sauoy would soone preuaile in his enterprife: but God disposed otherwise.

About the same time the Queene Regent had concluded a mariage for the Lady Renee of Loraine, daughter to the deceased Duke of Mayen, with Mario Earle of Sando Fiore, eldest sonne to Duke Alexander Spue, and issued from the House of Vrsini, which had bene alwayes much affectionate vnto the Crowne of France. The Duke of Neuers her brother

Neuers goes to succour Montferat, and inuades Calcul.

A brother in law, tooke vpon him the charge to conduct her to Florence, where the mariage should be consummated: Embarking at Marcellles, and landing at Sauone (a port be- longing to the Seigneury of Genua) the Duke of Neuers vnderstood that the Duke of Sa- uoy had secretly with his army entred into Montferat, and that Casal was in danger to be lost, there being no commander nor sufficient forces to resist the Duke.

This Duke of Neuers who is of the House of Mantua, and nearest kinsman to the Duke, next vnto his brother Don Vincent, resolved to preuent this apparent danger with the hazard of his life; and hauing sent to recommend his sister in law to the State of Genua; (being afterwards conducted to Florence, and the mariage consummated) he tooke with him twenty men of his traine, and thre score Mariners, whom he caused to be armed, and with this company within two dayes he entred Casal.

The Duke of Sauoy aduertised of his arriall, imagined that his enterprife would not succeed according to his designe; so as in stead of besieging Casal, he sent his Army before Nice de la Paile. And for that he saw all the neighbour Princes were in a wonderfull jealousy for his taking of armes in a full peace, he sent them a long Declaration of the causes: which were, the defence of his grandchild, and his old pretensions to the Marquisate of Montferat, entreating the Pope, Emperor, King of Spaine, and all other Princes to allow of this action. The Duke of Mantua on the other side made a full answer to this Declaration, the which I cannot insert at large.

C The Duke of Sauoy sent copies of his Declaration to all Kings and neighbour Estates, accompanied with his priuate Letters, writing also to the Seigneurs of Bearne, and the Sindiques of Genuea; he entreated them not to be zealous of his taking of armes, promising that it was not his intent to offend them: but some doe write, that this promise of the Duke of Sauoyes, was like vnto that which Poliphenus made to Ulysses, to eat him the last of all his companions. For if he tooke Casal as he had done Albe, hee would reuine his old pretensions vpon his neighbours one after another. Seeing hee is armed (they say) we must stand vpon our guard.

The newes of these armes in Montferat, being come to the French Court at Fountain-bleau, they held the duke of Sauoyes quarrell vniuist. Many Noblemen friends to the duke of Neuers, went to him to Casal, some by Marcellles, to Sauone and Genua by sea, and others by Swisserland & Lombardy, & so came into Montferat. The Baron of La Roche of Dauphin a partizan, and (as they say) a pensioner to the Duke of Sauoy, and who liued much in his Court, had priuate intelligence with a Dauphinois of the towne of Romans, called Magnac, who followed the Councell of France, and solicited affaires, and had good access into the houses of the greatest in Court, making profession of the reformed religion, but in effect he was a spyce, and pensioner to this Baron, as he was to the Duke. But the packets of Letters which Magnac had written to the Baron of La Roche, being taken at the Poste, and found full of intelligences concerning the State and matters of importance, he was apprehended and condemned as guilty of high treason, for the which hee E was broken on the wheele the last of May.

A Traytor exc-

The Baron of La Roche made no better end then Magnac, for being taken in the beginning of the next year, and brought to the Bastille, and afterwards to the Conciergery, he was attainted and convicted for murthering a Church-man who came out of Italy with a packet for the King, for the which hee was iudged guilty of treason, and beheaded at the Greue.

But let vs returne to Montferat. All the Potentates of Italy went to armes, but none for the Duke of Sauoy. The King of Spaine commanded the Governor of Milan to leauy an army vnder the command of the prince of Ascoli, and to driue the Sauoyards out of Montferat with the hazard of a battell. The Duke of Mantua leauied souldiers in his Duchy, and the Venetians and the great Duke of Tuscane did the like for his succour. In the meane time the Duke of Sauoy had sent an army of fixe or seuen thousand foot of diuers nations, and a thousand horse to besiege Nice as you haue heard, thinking to find it as ill provided of defence, as the rest which he had taken; but he found that the Duke of Neuers his arriall had assured the Gouvernors, Captaines, and inhabitants of the townes of Montferat: and Don Vincent the Duke of Mantuas brother, and Generall of his Forces, came also to Casal with certaine Caualliers Mantuans. The Duke of Neuers conceiuing that if the Sauoyard should seize vpon Aui and Poulson, they would hinder the succour which which should come from France and Florence, he took 30 Cavaliers Mantuan, twenty A two Noblemen and Gentlemen French, and went and assured those places and others thereabouts, and furnished them with men and munition.

The Sauoyards in the mean time made their approaches before Nice with all speed, and had so shut it up as Capitaine Via being gone forth with his company of 70 Carabins, to bring munition into the Towne, could not enter, but was forced to go to Aquil, being 7 miles distant from Nice, which the duke of Nevers resolved to succour, and to put halfe his troops into the towne, consisting of 250 Cavaliers, 60 musquetiers, 60 Harquebussiers, and 60 Pikes: but he was intreated by Don Vincent letters not to attempt it, for that the Spanish Army would come that night to Alexandria de la Paile vpon the Frontiers of Montferat, and that the duke of Mantua's Forces should ioyne with them, entreating him also to come, that being together they might relieue Nice without hazard. All these forces being ioyned on the 22 of May, they came within 2 miles of Nice, where they camped: these three Princes consulting which way they should charge the Sauoyards, Cont Guy of Saint George General of the Army of Sauoy seeing these Princes so neere, and ready to force him, hee sent word to the Prince of Acoly in behalfe of the duke of Sauoy; That his Highnesse vnder taking this war did not thinke that the King of Spaine would haue assisted the Duke of Mantua against him, who had the honor to be his brother in law: but seeing it was so, his only respect, and not any feare of the Armes of Mantua should make him retire: with protestation neuer to employ his Armes without the good will of the King of Spain. Whereunto the Prince of Acoly made answer; That he had commandement from his Catholike Maiesty to succour Nice, and put the Sauoyard out of Montferat: But if their Generall caused them to retire, hee would not follow them, otherwise hee would bee the next morning in their Trenches.

Nice raised.

Notwithstanding this offer of the Sauoyards Generall, they continued their battery all night, whereupon the Princes resolved to charge them the next morning in their trenches, and to force them to raise their siege: but hauing put their Army in battell and approaching neere vnto Nice, they saw the Sauoyards leave their trenches and begin to retire, being aduertised of their coming: hereupon the duke of Nevers advanced and entered first into the Towne, where hee took 200 foot of the Garison with which he followed them, and foysted them by skirmishes, as within 2 miles of Nice hee forced them to put themselves in battell as well to defend themselves being thus prest, as to attend their Cannon which was myred. Hereupon the duke presently aduertised the Prince of Acoly and Don Vincent, entreating them to aduance with their troops, the which they did, and put their Army in battell right against that of Sauoy within Musket shot. The duke of Nevers was very desirous to fight, and had drawn the Prince of Acoly to be of his mind: but a Millanois being one of the Councell of warre to the King of Spaine said, that seeing he had giuen his word to the General of Sauoy not to follow them if they retired, he must now keepe it. The duke of Nevers replied, that the Prince of Acoly was no more engaged seeing they had failed of theirs, hauing fought to force Nice the last night: and moreover, they had now put themselves in battell in their preference, and therefore they ought to fight with them: but the Spaniards were of another opinion. And it was resolved that the Prince should send word to the Generall of Sauoy; that according to his promise he had giuen them time to retire, which they did not, but presented themselves before the Duke of Nevers, and Don Vincent, who were so incensed as he could no longer stay them from giuing battell: that if hee retired not speedily, hee should consent vnto them (as hee was bound) to cut the Army of Sauoy in peeces, the which they would vndoubtedly doe if he retired not. Vpon the deliuey of this message, the Generall caused his Army to retire to Castellano a little Towne in Piedmont, foure myles from Nice, whither the three Princes went to resolve on the siege of Albe.

The Prince of Acoly sends a message to the Generall of Sauoy.

The Governour
of Milan grows ialous
of the duke of Nevers, and the French.

But the Governour of Milan loone changed the face of this designe, and the affection of those which were come to this warre to succour an afflicted Prince. He grew ialous of the French Gentlemen which were come to the duke of Nevers: and that the Seigneur of Bourg with a regiment of 2000 foot should come out of France into Italy to succour the duke of Mantua. Finally, this Governour said, that he would not suffer any French troops in Italy, and that none should passe by the State of Milan; and that hee would ill intreat the first which came: that if the Siegneur of Bourg should passe into Italy,

1613

Italy, he would cause him and his Regiment to be cut in peeces. He sent to all the Spanish Gallies which were at Naples, Sicily and Genoa, to come and lye vpon those coastes, and to hinder the descent of all vessels which should bring any French to goe into Montferat. Yea some write, that it was bruted ouer all Italy, that the duke of Nevers drew the French into Montferat to seize on it for himselfe. The Duke of Nevers being advertised of the Governours speeches, he sent him word; that if hee took him for no other but to be of his quality, the troope of French gentlemen which were with him, would be indeed held extraordinary: But when he should consider of what quality hee was, as duke of Nevers, and of the House of Mantua, that of 20 gentlemen which were come vnto him, all of them (except foure or five of the principall which were come as friends to accompany him in this warre) were alwaies wont to bee of his traine: and that hee should be well aduised not to ill entreat any, which should come vnto him: for the least affront hee should doe vnto any one hee would reuenge it on his person or lose his life: for that in this action there was nothing concerning the interest of the King of Spaine his Master, but of one particular to another. As for his threats to cut the regiment of Don Bourg in peeces if it came into Italy, the Duke sent him word, that hee did not thinke hee had any such commission from Spaine, which were to doe the King his Master bad seruice in speaking so freely. And that it was not possible for any man to hinder the most Christian King his Master to send succours vnto the Duke of Mantua his Cousin Germaine, and nephew vnto the Queene Regent his Mother, to hinder the Duke of Sauoy from the innading of Montferat. As for the ialousie which he would put into the duke of Mantua's head, touching Montferat, it was more then hee could effect with all his endeuours, their interests were too closely vntied.

The Duke of Nevers inclinate to the Go-uernour of Milan.

Notwithstanding all these speeches, the Duke of Sauoy and the Governour of Milan concluded a Peace in haste, for as they prepared to besiege Trino and Verfel, the two Ambassadors of Spaine and Mantua being come to the Rendezvous, the Prince of Acoly told the Duke of Nevers and Don Vincent, that a peace was concluded betwix the Duke of Sauoy and the Governour of Milan, the which he shewed them a writing to this effect: That as the Pope Summons, and in obey the commandments of their Imperial and Catholike Maiesties, the Duke of Sauoy should within sixe dayes restore the Castell which he held in Montferat into the hands of such Commissaries as should be deputed by their Maiesties: that it so say, the Prince of Castiglia for the Emperour, and the Governour of Milan for the King of Spaine, and that defenses should be made to either part to commit any act of Hostility.

A Peace concluded betwix
the Governour
of Milan and
the Duke of Sauoy for Montferat.

They that haue written of these warres said, that it was concluded in as great haste, as the Duke of Sauoy had begun the warre: yet the Duke of Mantua's Agent at Milan durst not accept thereof, hauing no speciall commandement from his Prince: yet afterwards the Duke did allow of it. And although the Duke of Sauoy had promised to restore the places within sixe daies, yet hee did it not before that hee had receiued letters from the King of Spaine to presse him thereunto. After this restitution, the Duke of Sauoy would not disarme, notwithstanding any instance that was made, before that the King of Spaine should cause the duke of Mantua to signe and to execute the foure priuate Articles which the Governour of Milan had yielded vnto, in signing the restitution: and that the Duke of Mantua seeing him still in armes, would be more tractable to accord their differences.

The Duke of Sauoy refused to disarm, and the reason.

The foure Articles were, First, That the two dukes should not pretend any damages one against the other by reason of the warre. Secondly, That the subjects of either Duke, which had followed a contrary party, should not be molested in their persons, nor goods. Thirdly, That a month after the restitution made by the Duke of Sauoy of the places taken by him in Montferat, the Princeesse Mary should bee deliuered vnto him by the Duke of Mantua, to be restored within 15 daies after to the Princeesse Marguerite his Mother. And fourthly, that within a short time after, they should treat friendly of all the pretensions and differences which were betwix the two Dukes.

In Iuly Monf: de Saurre a Knight of both the orders, and Governour of his Maiesties person, was honoured with the dignity of Marshall of France, in the place of the deceased Marshall Fernanquis. It was thought the Duke ofully should haue been advanced, in regard of the good seruice hee had done to France, for that they said the deceased King of immortall memory had promised him the first Marshalls place which should be voyde: yet every man thought it well bestowed vpon Monf: de Saurre as a Nobleman most worthy to be be recompensed with that honor, for the great and commendable care he had had for the instruction & government of his Maiesties person: he continued little in that dignity, for presently after his aduancement he resigned it into their Maiesties hands to be conferred vpon the Marquis of Ancre, as it was: and the King being at Fontaine-bleau, caused him to be receiued Marshall of France although it were not with the good liking of many private persons.

The Almanack
of Morgard.

By the Ordinaries of the most Christian Kings made vpon the complaints of the Estates of Orleans and Blois, all Soothsayers, and makers of Prognostications and Almanacks, exceeding the termes of lawfull Astrology, should bee punished extraordinarily and corporally. A holy and iust law, but ill obserued, through the liberty which these makers of Predictions tooke, who not content to speake of faire and soule weather, busie themselves to prognosticate of the effects of Mars, and of the affaires of State: as it happened in the beginning of this year, in the which Noel Leon Morgard made an Almanack as he had done the year before, in the which he spake much of warre: and yet France was as quiet and peaceable as it had been in 30 years. In his Almanack for this year, this Morgard seeking to be admired for his insolency and malice, assured, that the State of France should change: he touched the Kings person: and set downe the times, months and quarters, and he spake of many great Princes, altring onely the letters of their names. This Almanack being sold on the first day of the year, was extraordinarily sought for by curious persons, who assured themselves that it was a Prophesie. And that which gave it the more credit was, for that Morgard hauing set in the first quarter of Ianuary that a Marshall man should play a bad prank with his owne sonne: It hapned that an aged man of the Suburbs of St. Germaine who had sometimes bene a souldier, due his son thinking to kill a woman whom he entertain'd. The peoples murmuring of these new Predictions being imparted to the Queene Regent with a discourse of the wonders which he foretold: Her Maiestie held the author worthy of punishment, commanding the Officers of Iustice to make search for him, the which was continued for some daies in the end he was apprehended in Saint Honoris street, and the Printer in like manner, who had sold the said Almanack. Morgard was first caried to the Bastile, and afterwards to the Conciergerie. The Court of Parliament tooke knowledge of the cause, and examined the offenders, especially Morgard who at the first denied that he had given the said scandalous Predictions to be printed, the which was verified euen by the testimonie of such as had wrought vpon the said Almanack, who said that they had receiued those scandalous predictions in small papers from the said Morgard, and that being printed, hee instantly tooke them away againe: which being in the end confessed by the said Morgard, he was by a decree of the Court condemned to serue in the Kings Gallies 9 years, and was presently deliuered ouer to be chained to others. Before his going to Marsilles, hee cast diuers mens Nativities, saying vnto some; That they had done him wrong to condemne him before he had spoken with the Queene, to whom if he had bene admitted, hee would haue told many things for the good of France. Some held that this Morgard was very ignorant in Astrologie, and that hee vnderstood not the Latine tongue. That by race hee was a Cur-purse, and that the year before he had bene a prisoner in the Conciergerie along time, being accused for many thefts; yea some said that he had not made this Almanack, which was the subiect of many discourses that were published abroad, and of a feare, which for a time troubled the mindes of the French, vntill August, that their Maiesties went into Poitou and Britany, which was the month vnto the which this miserable wretch had limited the Kings life.

against Duells.

Presently after the Feast of Christmas was past, Duels were more frequent amongst the Nobility then they had bene in former times; there was no common discourse but of combats and encounters, which made the Queene Regent to aduertise the Court of Parliament thereof, to the end they might devise some expedient, to diuert the course of such a mischief. The Court hauing taken deliberation thereon, made a very rigorous decree against the aggressors and acceptors of Duels & Combats: forbidding all persons to quarrell in publicke or private, to goe to feld, or make any assignations to fight; vpon paine (for all such as should infringe this decree) to bee held guilty of High Treason, and they and their posterity to be declared base and ignoble for euer: forbidding all persons to fauour them, or to receiue them into their houses or Castles, vpon paine of razing of the said

A said places: exhorting all Clergie men not to giue them buriall, and giuing power to all persons to cease vpon them, and to deliuer them into the hands of Iustice, allowing 25 Crownes to bee taken out of the fines of the Court, to euery one that shall ayde to seize vpon the said combatants: which decree was published in all the streets and suburbs of Paris, and set vp in many places.

In the beginning of the year, there appeared some discontents, which made France to feare and apprehend a ciuill warre. The Prince of Conde assisted by other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Noblemen, and Officers of the Crowne, retired from Court seeing the affaires within the Realme, some in confusion, and others in disorder: accidents which happen ordinarily during the Minority of Kings, and wherein the bounty and wisdom of the Queene Regent, had bene careful during the time of her regency, as much as possible he could, to stay the course of such disorders throughout the Realme.

The Prince seeing how little he should preuaile to speak in Court of a general reformation, he thought it fittest (by the aduice of some of his friends) to absent himselfe, and to consider of this important businesse: the which hee did in the end of February, going to Chateauroux in Berry. The Duke of Neuers retired himselfe into his Government of Champagne, and the Duke of Mayen to Soissons: And within few daies after, the Marshall of Bouillon went from Paris. They which did adhere to this partie haue written in this manner,

C Men haue discoursed diuersly of the departure of the Prince of Conde, and of the Dukes of Neuers and Mayen from Court, and of their discontents: the which gaue occasion to the Marshall of Bouillon (who remained in Paris after them) particularly to informe the principall ministers about the King thereof, vnto whom hee signified that they had no other designe, intention, nor desire, but to remaine in that most humble obedience which they owe vnto the King and Queene: that the cause of their discontent proceeded not from any private interest, but onely from the disorder and confusion, which since the death of the deceased King, had crept into the Government of the State: that to their great griefe, they saw it increase in such manner, as it would proue incurable, if it were not prevented in time: that the rank they held in this Realme did oblige them, to represent these inconueniences to the Queene, to the end they might apply fit and necessary remedies: That to this end they were to meet at Meziens on the 15 of February with their ordinary traines, and there to aduise of that which they had to say; that vpon these words of the Duke of Bouillon, they held a Councell and resolved to stay him, but hee went speedily out of Paris, hauing aduertised the Prince of Conde of his going towards Meziens, and of the other Princes and Noblemen: That on the 10 of February, the D. of Longueville went out of Paris by night with a small traine towards Amiens, without taking leaue of their Maiesties: And that the day following at night, the Queene being aduertised that the Duke of Vendosme was of the said party, shee had caused him to bee stayed in the Loure by the Capitaine of her Guard, who appointed certaine Archers to keepe him in his chamber, where they put Barres of Iron to his windowes.

Some to excuse this, said, that the Queene had bene aduertised that the day before this Duke had conferred long with the duke of Longueville, and that he prepared himselfe to steale away, as the other had done, whereupon moued with the care hee had of his fortune and reputation, for the loue of the deceased King, he thought it fit to stay him within his chamber in the Loure, to keepe him from disobedience, into the which hee might fall following the bad aduice which was given him. The Court was much troubled with the retreat of these Princes, and with the brutes which were dispersed: which caused the Queene to write to all the Courts of Parliaments, the Gouvernours of Prouinces, and to Maiors and Sherifes of Townes after this manner.

MY Masters, I haue made no haste to write vnto you, touching the departure of the Prince of Conde my Nephew from Court, and of other Princes who retired at the same time, for that my Nephew hauing taken leaue of the King and mee, promised to returne whensoever he should be call'd, for the good of his seruice, and the others did the like. I conceiued that their retyring was rather to visit their Houses, and to spend some time in the pleasure of hunting (as my said Nephew and the rest had often done) then for any other designe: Notwithstanding, hearing rather by common report then by any ad-uertisement from them, that they seem to haue some discontent: I haue done what I could A to informe my selfe more particularly, for the which they haue small cause: for if they complane of that which concerns their priuate interest, I may say with truth, that both my Nephew, and all these Princes haue beene as much respected and honoured by the King my sonne and mee, as they could with reason require. And for that which con-cernes the government of affaires, all the Princes, Dukes, and Officers of the Crowne are admitted to Councells which are held to that effect. It is certaine that there is no businesse of importance, propounded, treated, or negotiated, but the said Princes, and especially my said Nephew haue beene alwaies called, yea they haue often times bene deferred to attend their company and presence. And as for the distribution of fauours and B rewards, euery one of them in his particular, and those which haue beene recommended by them, haue had so good shares as they haue no reason to complaine. If there be any question touching the generall affaires, they haue beene so gouerned since the death of the deceased King my Lord, as it may well appeare we haue omitted nothing, that might serue to the good, greatnesse, and reputation of this Crowne, hauing had a care to preserue the amities and alliances with all foraine Princes and States: the which hath succeeded so happily as they were neuer in better estate. And for that which is within the Realme, hauing giuen order (as euery man knowes) to haue all the Edicts of pacification carefully obserued, and to maintain peace, vnion and concord amongst the subiects: and withall haue done what possibly I could for the ease of the people: and I may iustly say C my care hath beene such, that althoughe wee haue bene charged with great and extraordinary expences, yet haue we not raised any extraordinary Impositions, but diminished them in many occasions. And moreover, wee haue maintained all the other orders and Estates in their authority and accustomed functions, so as I cannot coniecture what true ground the said Princes or others may haue to complaine, either for the generall or their particular. Notwithstanding well considering how this retreat with these signes of discontent, and the brutes which are sprd and augmented vpon this occasion, may produce bad effects in the Prouinces, to the preiudice of the publike; I haue desired to take the most conuenient course to prevent it. And to this end hauing caused the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and chiefe Councillors of State to assemble; I haue resolved by their ad- D uice to send my Cousin the Duke of Ventadour, and the Siegneur of Boissie (a Councel-lor of State to the King my sonne) to my Nephew the Prince of Conde, to inuite and intreate him to come vnto the King and mee, there to take the place and rancke due to his quality, and to giue vs counsell and assistance in all these occurrents, yea in the great and important affaires which we haue now in hand, the which I hope he will resolve to doe at their coming vnto him, according to the promise which he made at his departure: And to make a full declaration of the truth and sincerity of my actions past, and to seeke out the best meanes which may be to settle a good order for the good of this Estate hereafter, especially at the entry of the Kings Maiority, I haue thought it conuenient to call an Assembly of the three Estates of the Realm, wherein they may take resolutions fit for the dignity E thereof. This I thought good to write vnto you touching the occurrences here, whereof I pray you to aduertise those which are within the limits of your iurisdiccions, to the end euery man may doe his duty in his charge, and be carefull that all things may be contained vnder the Kings authority and obedience, and the obseruation of his Edicts, according to the accustomed order without any innouation or alteration, opposing themselues to all such as shall seeke to trouble the State, giuing them charge to stand vpon their Guards, and not to giue way to any practices which may be amongst them, to the preiud-ice of their owne peace and the Kings seruice: desiring you to employ the authority of your Parliaments in all things which shall import the publike and the Royall authority of the King my Lord and Sonne.

Vpon these alterations, and the feare of ciuill combustions, the Marquis D'Ancre (newly made Marshall of France) being Gouverneur of the Cittadell of Amiens, had left the Siegneur of Rubempré, to command there in his absence; but now he posted thither to assure the place, drawing forth Rubempré, whom he put into Corbie: The Kings and Queenes companies of men of armes with the light horse were sent for and lodged in Creil, Saint Denis, and Monstreau-faut-Yonne; to the end they might be neere their Maiesties vpon all occurrents. The Duke of Ventadour and the Siegneur of Boissie, being vpon

A vpon the way to goe to Chasteauroux, thinking there to find the Prince of Conde, were aduertised that he would crosse Berry to passe the Riuer of Loire, and goe into Champagne; they sent a man expressly vnto him, to acquaint him with the commandement they had receiued from their Maiesties, and to know whether they should goe to finde him: from whom they had no other answer, but that hee went to Meziers: so as they returned to their Maiesties, and the Prince continuing his journey, with thirty or forty horse past the Loire, and entered into Champagne, where he was receiued by the Duke of Neuers, neere vnto Vitry, from whence they went together to Chaalons, and from thence to Meziers, whither at the same time came the Dukes of Longueuille, of Mayen, and of B Luxembourg.

The Marquis of Vieuville Gouverneur of the Towne and Cittadell of Meziers, was then at Paris: and D'Escruelles his Lieutenant was in the Cittadell with D'Amours, who vpon an aduice giuen them by the Marquis, prepared themselves as well as they could, to hinder the Duke of Neuers entry into the Cittadell; yea they receiued in some Wallons.
But this place was like vnto many others, which in the time of peace want munition, and where nothing is repaired. The Duke of Neuers hauing sent for D'Escruelles to come and speake with him, he refused, and sent him word he should make no offer to come into the Cittadell: whereupon all the Princes resolved to haue that by force which they could not get by faire meanes. But vpon this refusal of entry, they doubted that D'Escr-uelles had receiued some commandement from the Queene, whereof they desired to bee satisfied, and if it were so, to yeeld all respect and obedience. But D'Escruelles and D'Amours hauing declared not onely to the Duke of Neuers, but also to the Prince and the rest, that they had no commandement from her Maiestie, but were onely aduertised that the Duke of Neuers meant to doe them some affront. The Queene hauing giuen no command, they began to feare that it was some conspiracy against the State, the which might extend not onely to the Cittadell of Meziers, but also to the person of the first Prince of the blood, and to others of the chiefe of the Nobility of France, for whose safeties it had bene provided by the good affection of the inhabitants of the town. The Duke of Neuers as Governor of the Prouince (in whose person the Kings authority had bene condemned by this action) resolved to force them to yeeld the obedience due vnto his Maie-stie; and presently sent la Brosse vnto the Queene to aduertise her thereof, and to assure her that nothing should passe in this action but for the Kings seruice and her Maiesties, whose commandements he attended to obey and execute them: Hauing afterwards represented vnto them which were in the Cittadell, what belonged to their duties, and the danger they might incur by this disobedience, and the punishment they should iustly deserue: The place being deliuered into his hands, he presently gaue aduertisement thereof vnto the Queene by this Letter.

Madam, I haue formerly informed your Maiestie of the rebellion which hath bene committed against the Kings authority, by them of the Cittadell of this towne: Now E I informe you of the obedience which I haue made them to yeeld, hauing deliuered it into my hands: for the safety whereof I haue provided, to the end your Maiesty may be obeyed as you may expect from me, hoping that you will take into consideration the disobedience which the Marquis of Vieuville hath shewed me, in the charge which it hath pleased the King to giue me in this Prouince: for that this example may draw a generali consequence for all the Gouvernors of this Realme. I humbly beseech your Maiestie to command such iustice to be done as you shall thinke necessary for the maintenance of the Kings authority, wherein I may receiue that contentment which you shall thinke reasonable, seeing that this towne is vnder my charge, and my proper inheritance, which makes my apprehension the more considerable.

F This Letter could not so satisfie the world, but they conceived that the taking of the Cittadell of Meziers was contrarie to the Kings authority: for that the Lieutenants generall of a Prouince, and the Gouvernors and Captaines of places of strength, are giuen by the King, and not by the Gouvernors of Prouinces. They say moreover, that the Prouin-ces in France are great, and did abound in good and strong townes, which are so many Realmes: and that if the Gouvernors in chiefe (which are all Princes or Noblemen of great power) should put Commanders at their deuotory into places of strength, it might breed disobedience and trouble: Wherefore Kings had alwaies reserved that power vnto them.

A vſuall formes during the minority of Kings : In the which the generall Eſtates haue beene “ alwayes aſſembled, which are ſo neceſſary as Kings haue called them in their maiorities “ for leſſe diſorders, then thoſe at this preſent. I would to God Madam, it had coſt me part “ of my blood, ſo you had called them preſently after the Kings death ; you had enioyed “ the ſame or more authority, with the good liking of the Church, the Nobility, and the “ Commons : France had not loſt that generous name of Arbitrator of Chriſtendome, pur- “ chaſed ſo gloriously by the deceaſed King, a title which held the balance of the two great “ factions of Europe, protecting the publike tranquillity : This loſſe is ſo much the greater “ and more lamentable, for that it ſeemes we are gone out of the way, which the deceaſed King “ had tracked vs : they had not razed the Citadell of Bourg, againſt the aduiſe of the Princes “ & Officers of the Crown, yea & againſt the Conſtables : they had not giuen 40000 pounds “ ſterling as well for the razing as the recompence thereof : They had not precipitated the “ Kings Mariage and his ſiſters, vntill that the law of God, and all the orders of the Realme “ (the Kings majority approaching) had approoued it : Theſe mariages had bene declared in “ publike, not by the reading of a writing, containing the reaſons they had to haſten them : “ but in demanding aduiſe whether they had bene profitable or no : The Parliaments had “ not bene interrupted, in the free functions of their places : The gouernments of Pro- “ uinces and of places of importance, had not bene giuen to incapable and unworthy per- “ ſons : They would haue ſought to reconcile the Clergie with the Colledge of Sorbon, “ not to diuide them, nor oppreſſe them by vaine and fruitleſſe diſputes in theſe times : The “ authority of Prelates and Clergy-men, had not bene violated, but maintained : They had “ not giuen any charge for fauour or money ; the aduiſe of the Princes and Officers of the “ Crowne had bene firſt demanded, to be afterwards conferred by your Maieſtie vpon “ worthy perſons : Ambaſſadors had not bene choſen but by the ſame aduiſe : their diſpo- “ ſitions had not bene yknowne vnto all ſuch as haue an intereſt in the good of the Eſtate : “ No packet had bene receiued or read, but in the preſence of the aforeſaid : They had “ not ſuffered the enterpriſes made vpon Nauarre and Monſerrat, nor hindered the renew- “ ing of the league betwene the Venetians and the Griſons, ſomuch deſired and allowed “ of by the deceaſed King : They had not broken the mariage (protected by the deceaſed “ King) with the Duke of Sauoy, without mature deliberation : And by a full obſervation “ of the Edicts made for them of the reformed religion, they had taken from them all ſub- “ iect of complaint : They had ſuppreſſed ſuch among them as had ſurpaſſed the limits “ of their duties : They had not ſowne diuiſions among them, which making them carefull “ of their owne particulars, haue failed to bring the Common-weale into danger : They “ had not giuen thirty thouſand pounds ſterling to buy the Caſtle of Amboiſe, redeeming “ his Maieſties places with his owne money ; they would haue cut off ſo many exceſſiue “ gifts to unworthy perſons : Few men had not ingroſſed the chiefe dignities of the Eſtate “ without the aduiſe of any Prince or Officer aboue-named : The Eſtates or the Councell “ would haue eaſed you of ſo many importunities, charging themſelves with enuie, and you “ with bleſſings.

Your Maieſtie may conſider, if you pleaſe, of theſe diſorders, and thereby iudge of the “ neceſſity to call the Eſtates, to puniſh the wicked, and to recompence the good, which is “ the ſupport of well ordered Monarchies : which being perſuaded, ſhewes at what danger “ this Realme ſtands. All the offices of Iudicature and of the Treauſure, are growne to ex- “ ceſſiue rates : There remains no recompence for vertue, ſeeing that fauour, alliance, and “ money, haue all the power : And the Treauſure is ſo profeſſibly beſetwaged, as 100000 pi- “ ſtols are not valued, yea they are employed about matters of no moment, to men that en- “ rich themſelves without any labour, by the blood of the people. The complaints, cla- “ mours, and teares of the three Eſtates, ſmother in their hearts, ſhould ſerue the Church “ hath loſt her beauty : No Clergy-men are employed in Embaſſies, neither haue they any “ place in Councells ; and benefited men are ouer-charged with vexations and vniuſual bur- “ then : The Gentrie is impouerished and ruined by taxes and impositions of ſale in the “ extraordinary Commiſſions to get money, all their commodities are made ſubject to “ imposts, and all their titles are examined, becauſe they loſt or burnt : The Nobility and “ Gentry, the ſupport of France, the terror of ſtrangers, and the vanquiſher in the field, “ which ſeale ſcepters and ſails, Crowns, is now made ſubiect to taxes and excluded “ from all offices, for want of money, their lands and goods are at the command of others

The day after the delivery of this Letter, the Prince ſent a gentleman of his called Fif-brun with a packet to the Court of Parliament, the which they would not open, but ſent it vnto the Queene by two Councellors of the Court, who led the gentleman with them: the Queene looking only on the direction, ſent them to the Chancellor, who found in this packet a copy of the Queenes Letter, with this other vnto the Court.

MY Maſters, I know well that ſome will anticipate my iuſt intentions with many ſlanders and falſe reports, contrary (I aſſure my ſelfe) vnto the opinion which you will conceiue, hauing conuerſed with me and knowne me, that fearing to alter any thing by my reſolutions of that which I haue had to the Kings ſeruite and the good of the State, I haue reſtrained my iuſt diſcontents, and as it were buried them by my patience. But yet
 I would ſatiſfie you better, and giue you an accompt of my actions: to you I ſay, whom I know to be the chiefe gardian of this Eſtate: and therefore I ſend vnto you a copie of the Letter which I haue written vnto the Queene, by which I doe fully lay open the holy affections which had moued me to retire from Court: for that I would not adhere vnto the abuſes which are committed by ſuch as manage and diſpoſe of the Kings affaires and of the State, demanding reformation by my moſt humble petition vnto the Queene, pro-pounding the remedy vnto her, and requiring it aſte firſt Prince of the blood, a ſubiect to the King, and one that hath the chiefe intereſt in the good of his Maieſties ſeruite: hauing no other armes then my humble prayers to their Maieſties, as you may ſee by the Copie which I ſend you: humbly beſeeching you to aſſiſt vs with your Councell and authoritie, in ſo iuſt and commendable an enterpriſe, as the moſt conſiderable for the Kings ſeruite and the reformation of the State: In ſo doing you ſhall acquire your ſelues of the due of your charges, and purchaſe honor and reputation, remaining had beene giuen since the Kings coronation. The Queenes complaint against the Prince of Conde, that he had not assisted her in the conduſt of affaires: That he had not aduertised her of the abuses whereon he grounded his discontent, and that hee should not absent himselfe from Court, and make a society of Princes and Noblemen: That the authors of these new troubles tooke the mariages of Spaine for a pretext; and conceale that which was treasured of England, blamed the Kings fauourable dealings towards them of the Religion, and stirred vp the people vnto sedition, impatient to see the King grow vp: That the alliance of Spaine had beene preferred before that of Sauoy, by the Earle of Soissons aduice, and approved by the Prince of Conde and Duke of Bouillon, who was expressly sent to giue notice thereof vnto the King of Great Britaine: An answer vnto the objections touching the enterprises of Nauarre and Montferat, and the Fort of Fuentes: An inuention to blame the Ministers of State, thereby taxing the Queene and her Regency: A commendation of the Ministers of State, ready to resigne their places at the Queenes command: her desire to reforme the Councell of State: The order which had beene taken, to the end the Prince of Conde might see what past in dispatches and the treasure: Tealouise for the Queenes entring into Councell touching the affaires of the Prouinces: The pretext why they demanded the generall Estates to be safe and free: That there was neuer any resolution to stay the Marshall of Bouillon, and that the Duke of Longueville had not beene hindred from going into his government: The reason why the Duke of Vendosme was stayed in his chamber in the Loure: An answer to that which was objected touching the Cittadell of Bourg and the Castle of Amboise: That he had alwayes followed the steps of the deceased King, suffering Clergy-men to enioy their Benefices, and gratified the Nobility and Gentry: That the exorbitant prices of offices had not beene brought in since her Regency; and that the impositions vpon salt had beene moderated during her government: An answer to the Prince of Condes complaint, that they fought to diuide the Colledge of Sorbon: The Queenes hope in the loyalty of the Nobility towards the King, whom he brings vp to acknowledge their merits, in imitation of the King his father: She enioynes the townes to stand vpon their guard: She saith that the Prince of Conde should not absent himselfe from the King, and countenance a diuision betwixt the King and Catholike Noblemen: That he should abstaine from blaming the government of affaires, and not suffer factions and schismes to bee raised in the State: That hee should not incense the three Estates, nor delay the mariages of Spaine which he had signed: Not to interpret in the worst sense whatsoever was done to the Kings aduantage, nor arme, nor draw in strangers: That he should looke well to the demand hee made of the Estates: That he should alter his proceeding and come vnto the King with those which were ioyned with him. This is the substance of the Queenes Letter which deserueth a full relation, but I am forced to abridge some things fearing to exceed a iust proportion.

A Letter from the Cardinall du Perron to the Prince of Conde.

" The Cardinall du Perron sent the Prince an answer to his Letter in these termes. Sir, the affection which I haue vnto your seruice, and the honor it hath pleased you to doe me, in aduertising mee of your commendable desires for the good of the King and Realme, oblige me to pray that the issue thereof may be as happy as the proposition is plausible. In truth it is a thing which I can leaue hope for then desire, if in the meane time you continue absent from their Maiesties, and doe not assist them as well with your presence as your counsell. There is no government of a State so absolutely perfect, and especially vnder the minority of Kings, that can please all, and wherein there is not some thing worthy of blame. But as an Ancient hath written wisely, there is no Prince so bad but is better then a ciuill war: so may it be said of the government of States, that there is no administration whatsoever, but is better then a ciuill discord. I know your intentions are farre from it, but I know also that the successe and euents are many times far different from the intentions. There will be many reports made of you to the Queene, and of the Queene to you, which your presence would prevent; Being absent they will grow bitter by the way, and fill your head with iealousies. You shall not be able to prevent it, but many seeing you diuided from the Court, and thinking that your separation proceeds from discontent, will make vse of the shadow of your name, to trouble the publike peace. My Lords, your predecessors, haue alwayes enioyed much more happinesse and content, when they haue beene neere our Kings and in Court (which is the Firmament where such

A such starres should shine) then when they were retired, and yet neuer any one of them had a greater share, either in authority, or in their Maiesties graces and fauours, then you haue hitherto had: it being the Queenes bounty, who hath alwayes fought to giue content to euery one, and hath particularly studied by all means to oblige you. Your good aduice of reformation will be more easily executed when you are by her to assist her, then when you shall be in place where your absence being imputed to discontent, will cause many to take your good intentions for pretexts. France hath the remembrance so fresh, and is so weary with the miseries of fore-past troubles, that the first Article of all reformation must be the entertainment of peace, from the breach whereof, if they (by whose occasion it hath beene in former times broken) could haue scene the successe painted in a table, or imagined to how many miseries of State and Religion they had opened a gap, and what curses they haue encurr'd both from God & men, they would rather haue desired to haue cast themselves into the fire, then to haue been the cause of the ruine of their country. I do not repent these things vnto you, as doubting that you do not abhor them; your good disposition, and your zeale to the good of Religion and the Realme giue too good assurance: But to beseech you to be careful, lest many turbulent spirits and desirous of innovation, abuse not the occasion of your absence to kindle a fire, which will be more easie to prevent, then to quench; but in the end will vex them more which kindle it then any other. For God who distinctly protects the causes of Kings, Widowes, and Orphans, will more powerfully protect them, when they shall be all three conioyned together; and you your selfe would be the first to expose your life for their defence. I pray God there be no need hereof: and you Sir to esteeme me, your most humble and most affectionate seruant, I, Cardinall du Perron. From Paris 13, March, 1614.

The Queene who was prepared with the one hand to warre, stretched out the other to peace; and according to her first designe, to seeke to pacifie this great alteration by mild and gentle remedies, she sent the President Thou vnto the Prince of Conde. He thought to haue found him at Meziers: but he was gone to Sedan with the Marshall of Bouillon: who returned with two Cannons which he brought from thence, the which and two others that the Duke of Neuers had draue from Cassine, so terrified D'Efculles, as he yielded the Cittadell of Meziers, which should haue held out against an Army Royall, if it had beene furnished, and the Cannons which were within it mounted.) The President finding no man in Meziers but the Duke of Neuers, hee was forced to goe to Sedan, where he was well entertained by the Prince of Conde, and all the Princes and Noblemen which did assist him. The towne was full of the French Nobility and Gentry, to haue commission for the leauing of souldiers, although the season was too sharpe to goe to field. The Princes hauing feasted the President, his integrity and sincerity had such power with the Prince of Conde, as he gaue him his word to come to Soissons, and there to enter into conference, to seeke out the means to restore peace & tranquillity to France, which this stirring had in the beginning much altered. The President hauing obtained what he desired, returned to Court the 27 of March. But attending the sūe Deputies which were to be sent from the King to Soissons, and the arriual of the Princes there; let vs see how the duke of Vendosme escaped from the Loure, and his first letters to the King after his coming into Britanie.

This escape of the duke of Vendosme is diuersly written: Claude de Malingre writes that he freed himselfe by a pleasant and witty inuention: In an evening seeing his wife visited by many great Ladies well attended on by their waiting women, he disguised himselfe in one of their habits, tooke a maske and slipped out among the Ladies and Gentlewomen without being discovered by his guard, gets into a Caroch, and so escapes: hauing changed his apparell heooke horse and poasted into Britanie.

The French Mercury relates it in this manner: On the 10 of February the duke being guarded in his Chamber, he gaue it out that he would fast, for that it was Ember weeke; whereupon he retired into his cabinet with the Duchesse his wife. Soone after, some of his Gentlemen said vnto the Exempt or yeoman vsher of the guard, who parted not out of the chamber, they fast here to day, but we fast not, will you come and sup with vs? The Exempt seeing the duke retired, followed them, hauing giuen charge to the archers which were in the great chamber to do their duties. The Dukes Chamber doore being shut, he came instantly out of his Cabinet, and caused a little doore to be broken open, which had beene been dammed vp, by the which they brought wood to his chamber before his restraint. A Which done, passing over a heape of logs and recouering the backe staires, he went out by the backe gate of the Louure, where hee found a foot man holding a horie, whereon hee mounted, being followed by one of his people which attended for him; and so he got out at a clocke at night by Saint Honories gate, and within few daies recovered Ansenis in Britanie. An houre after that his escape was knowne, (not discouering either the manner or the time) they shut the Loure gates, whilst they made a strict search through all the Chambers, in the Ditches, and in the Caroches which were before the Louure. Thus they write of his escape, which I leaue vnto the reader; but his escape was certaine.

The Queene had formerly written to the Court of Parliament of Britanie, and to the Townes to stand vpon their guard, and not to receiue any one of what qualitie soeuer without the Kings expresse commandement. Shee had sent the Duke of Montbazan to Nantes, to gouerne there: so as the Duke of Vendosme being come to Ansenis, thinking to vse his authority as chiefe Gouverneur of the Prouince, hee found the gates of all the great Townes shut against him: yet many of the Nobility repaired vnto him, and the Duke of Retz drew together some troopes from him. Being at his house at Ansenis much discontented, he wrote vnto the King, and complained of his vllage in these termes.

Sir, Having since your Maiesties comming to the Crowne, caried my selfe innocently in all my actions, I haue beene intreated other wise then I should expect: my afflictions in the end haue me speake, and humbly to beseech you to giue redresse: leaving the former, to come to them which are more fresh: You know Sir the commandement the Queen gaue me in January, in your presence, not to depart the Court, for what cause soeuer without leave; although it were with the ruine of my household affaires which required then a speedy order, yet I obeyed: Eighteene daies after, hauing made no attempt of disobedience, relying vpon the testimony of a good conscience, and the safety I did beleeue was in Court, I was made a prisoner and guarded as your Maiestie knownes. Nine daies after, God taking pittie of my innocent intentions, he set me at libertie, and in stead of a short and easie retreat, he inspired me to one which was long, and impossible, if hee had not as it were led me by the hand to bring mee to my house, thereby to auoid the blame which your Maiestie might haue laid vpon mee, if I had retired else where. This proceeding Sir, seemed fit to procure him peace, who shewed plainly that he breathed no other thing. I am so farre from the enioying of this desire, as I was no sooner ariued, but first I vnderstood that Nantes, and consequently that the whole Prouince was in Armes against me: But brutes could not haue shaken my belief, if two of the Duke of Montbazans seruants had not fallen into my hands, whom I found seized of a Commission and two letters vnder the signet, to dispossesse mee of the government of the Countie of Nantes, and to transference my charge to the said Duke. Your Maiestie may iudge if this should not cause a griefe more sensible then death it selfe, for that I conceived thereby, that the like wrong had beene done me throughout my whole Government, hearing also from diuers, that the other Lieutenants were ready to diuide my spoiles. In Court when I desired to depart for my domestick affaires, I was forbidden; after which I was made a prisoner, God hauing enlarged me and brought me to my house, his bounty is made a crime to me, and they haue stript mee of my government. But this is not sufficient, they arme against me: I am not safe in any place. Sir, neuer had any man so much cause to demand iustice of his King. Releue me, I most humbly beseech your Maiestie, in all these afflictions: I haue serued innocently & profitably; I ought not to be dispossessed of my charge, I am in a peaceable estate, and therefore it is needlesse to arme the Prouince against me. By birth and many other great respects, I am more tied to your Maiesties seruice then any one within the Realme: This should giue a better Impression of mee then of those in whom they put all their confidence here. I hold of the deceased King your father, my honour, my goods, & whatsoeuer I haue in this world; he is liuing in your person: I am well grounded to beseech you, to entreat me as he did: besides the reputation of Iustice which your Maiestie shall purchase, your Prouince of Britany shall be restored to peace; the consequence may extend farther, and I shall be able to serue you with life and goods in all occasions, where I shall haue the honor to be employed; which I will attend with patience, and execute with the fidelity,

Of your most humble, most obedient and most faithfull seruant and subiect, Casar de Vendosme.

The Kings letters to the Parliament of Britanie.

A They conceived by this letter that the Dukes intention was conformable to that of the other Princes: and vpon an aduertisement giuen vnto the Queene that he had caused Blauet to be taken & fortified, and that he was become master of Lambale, and of many other places in the Duchie of Ponthieure belonging to the House of Merlaur, they fear other letters to the Parliament of Rennes dated on the 5 of March, forbidding all persons to leaue any troopes without commission and expresse commandement from his Maiestie; giuing authority to the Earle of Vertuz Gouverneur of Rennes, to haue a care that no troopes should be raised in that Countie of Britany without commission, and especially that the company of his base brother the Duke of Vendosme should not assemble vnder the Cornet of his said base brother, vpon paine to be declared guilty of high treason. The Court made a declaration according to the tenor of these letters, and withall enioyned all Noblemen, Gentlemen, and all other the Kings subiects to repaire presently with their Armes and equipage to the Kings Lieutenants in that Prouince, to strue the King vnder their commands.

The Duke of Vendosme seeing all the Countie in Armes against him, and that his first letter vnto the King had preuailed little, hee was much amazed; for that some had informed their Maiesties that he did arme in Britany, (as in truth there were some troopes of Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others which did assist him) and that he had fortified Blauet against the Marquis of Coeuvre, refusing him to enter into the same Fort. These reasons made him to write againe vnto his Maiestie. In the which he complains, First, that they had giuen their Maiesties to vnderstand that he was in Armes, and that hee fortified Blauet, to the end they might invade him with their Forces in that Countie. Touching which points hee would satisfie their Maiesties. Secondly, That as for his Armes hee knew not whether they grounded themselves vpon his traine, or vpon his actions: if on his traine, hee confessed he had beene alwaies assisted with a good number of Nobility, and that in other voyages he had not beene lesse accompanied: If vpon his actions, it were to be desired that Rennes and other townes in Britany were as peaceable and quiet as his, all then should be in better estate. He concludes in these termes. Sir, to acquaint you with the true cause of these combustions: there is a rooted faction within the Prouince, which hath reduced it to this estate, a worrne which will kill the tree if you endure it any longer. The head of it hath beene alwaies impatient to endure his superiours, hauing found the like members, who doth not know the practices that he and they haue held these foure yeares to vlturpe my place: from this spring they draw the aduertisements that I am in Armes: but to what end? to haue the head of this faction sent with an Army, and to make vse of your Maiesties name and Forces, to commit all the insolences which factions are wont to doe when they haue power. If I had no respect but to mine owne particular, I would not endeavor to diuert this designe. I am come of too good a stocke to apprehend and feare my priuate enemies whatsoeuer. But Sir, I cannot endure without complaining that by their practices and importunes, they still seeke to moue your Maiesty to choller against mine innocency, and against the continuance of my obedience. Vpon this second protestation of seruice, I beseech you most humbly to re-establish mee here in the exercise of the charge which I hold of the deceased King your father; not to honor thereof, (in attending this effect of Iustice) those which haue in times past borne armes against him, and which are now my irreconcilable enemies, and to hinder them from troubling with open warre the peace of this Prouince. In a foraine warre, Kings may teape honor and profit, but in a domestick all the losse falls vpon themselves. If your Maiesties Armes haue no other object but me to worke on, it shall suffice to honour mee with your commandements: My perfect obedience shall giue good testimony, that I haue nothing in my hart more firme, then the inuolable quality of your most humble and most obedient subiect and seruant, Casar de Vendosme.

The Duke of Vendosme second letter to the King.

France was amazed at this brute of Armes, and the people troubled, yet all stood firme for the Kings seruice: vpon this assurance that their Maiesties had of the fidelity of their good subiects, the Queene resolved to treat louingly with the Princes: and to this end on the 6 of Aprill they sent the Duke of Venadour, the Presidents Lannin and Then, with the Siegneurs of Boissie and Bulion as deputies from the King, to conferre with the Princes at Soissons. The Prince of Conde hauing left Sedan in the end of March, with all the Princes which assisted, hauing about 4000 foot, French, Wallons, and Liegeois, and and fixe or seven hundred horse, he arrived there on the 5 of April, the duke of Mayen having put a great garrison into the Towne for their safeties. On the 14 of April the Kings Deputies entered into conference with the Princes in the Castle of Soissons, where as all the Princes in general and particular protesting to love their Majesties service, and the quiet of the State, before all humane duties, they demanded to have these three points granted. First, The continuation of the Estates. Secondly, A stay of the Kings marriage, and of the Lady his sister. Thirdly, A disarming on either side. After which they would treat of the safety and libertie of the said Estates, and of all other assurances. The Queene desired to maintaine peace. The second demand touching the stay of the marriage, was that whereon they made some question, touching the time, how long it should be delayed: for the Princes demanded till after the assembly of the Estates, whereunto the Deputies vnder their Majesties pleasure would not consent, but vnto the time of the Kings Maiority. They would have peace, but with security, in preferring his Majesties authority. In the end the said three Articles were concluded with this condition, That the surseance of the Marriages should be until the Kings Maiority, and that it should not be inserted into the Articles of the peace which should be published, but that the Queene should promise it by a letter which she should write to the Prince.

The three Articles agreed.

During many goings and comings from Paris to Soissons, the Kings Army which was drawne together in Champagne was increased with 6000 Swissers leauied by Galatius so as they prepared both for warre and peace at one instant. Some held that the Prince of Conde grew into calouise, and it was said, that all the Princes being now in Soissons, an enterprife vpon them would have been more easie: The Lorraine Regiment of Vaubecourt had commandement to goe lodge in Vitry, and the King Army was to go towards Saint Manehold. This made the Prince and his Army to leaue Soissons, having written a letter vnto the Queene, thanking her for that shee had granted the three points aboue mentioned, and sending her word, That he had intreated the Dukes of Mayen and Bouillon to remaine at Soissons, giving them power to finish the treaty with her Majesties Deputies, to agree of the safetie and libertie of the said Estates, together with the points which concerne the disarming, and the estate wherein the King and Queenes persons, and of the other Princes and Noblemen which assisted him should remaine, until the Conuocation of the Estates.

The Prince of Conde going towards Vitry, had aduertisement, that the Kings troopes were entred the Towne. The Duke of Neuers with his traine alone, and eight of his guard went towards Rethel, and so to Saint Manehold. Bouconville Gouverneur of the Towne and Castle, with the chiefe inhabitants, hearing of his approach went to meet him. The Inhabitants besought him not to enter into Saint Manehold, telling him that they had receiued letters of command from their Majesties not to suffer any one of what qualitie soeuer to enter into their town without a new commission from her Majestie: they intreated him to beleue that they were his seruants, but the subiection & obedience which they did owe vnto the King, was of more force. The Duke told them that he would enter into his Castle, that he would not endure, that they should refuse him entry into the Townes of his Government, nor into his owne inheritance. Finally, the Inhabitants falling vpon their knees, could not diuert him from his resolution. These being returned vnto the Towne, they made report of the Dukes intention, which stricke a great terror among the people. Bouconville retired himselfe into the Castle, which is diuided from the Towne by the riuer of Eync. The Duke of Neuers being thus refused entry into the Towne, hee threatened to raine them within 24 houres: and they seeing how few men they had, spent the time in consulting what they should doe. The Duke desirous to find a way to enter into the Castle, hee was surprisid with a darke night and the riuer not to be waded through, so as he was forced to take vp his lodging at a house which is vpon a little hill nere vnto the Towne, where hee past the night. In the meane time the Prince of Conde vpon aduice he had had from him, aduanced with his Army, and came before Saint Manehold at two alocke in the morning: Which when the Inhabitants knew, they were much more astonied, and especially those who had propounded not to receiue the Duke. So seeing themselves betwene the Castle and the Army, they had no other helpe, but early in the morning to send vnto the Duke, to intreat him not to remember that which had past the day before, and to have a care to the preferuation of their townes.

The

A The Prince of Conde mediating their peace, they entred into Saint Manehold, whereof they assured themselves. The Lieutenant of the Iustice, and some other Inhabitants, retired themselves vnto the neighbour places where there was any Garrison for the King.

These newes that the Princes were become Masters of Saint Manehold, and that there was some difficulties grown in the conference of Soissons, touching a demand made of the Castle of Amboise for the Prince, the Queene resolved to draw all her Troopes into the body of an army, and to giue the leading thereof to the Duke of Guise. This troubled many men, who besought her Majestie to forebare her resolution, for that it might reuiue quarrels, which peace had buried in forgetfulness.

B Hereupon the Queene sent Montaigne to the Prince, to moue him to hasten the treaty of peace: who being returned, reported that the Prince besought their Majesties that the Deputies which were at Soissons, might aduance vnto Rethel, whither he would also come: and that there should be no fault in him, nor in them which assisted him, that the treaty were not concluded. Whereupon the King sent new letters of Commission to his Deputies for the finishing of this treaty, and the Queene Regent wrote vnto the Prince of Conde touching the treaty of marriage, in this manner:

The conference of - sions transferred to Saint Manehold.

Nephew, you may remember that the resolution taken for the marriage of the King my sonne, and of my eldest daughter, was imparted vnto you, and to the deceased Earle of Soissons, as also to the other Princes and Officers of the Crowne which assist you, as well as to those which now attend the King: yet you having demanded a stay thereof vntill the Kings Maiority, I haue bene content herein to accommodate my selfe to your desire, seeing that the time of this Maiority is so neere, and that the nature of the businesse, and the course of affaires giue me this leisure: having also resolved with your aduice, to assemble the generall Estates before the said Maiority, whereof I thought good to assure you by these presents, being confident that herein you will shew your affection and fidelity to the King my sonne and me.

According to the Kings commission, the Duke of Ventadour and the other Deputies went to Rethel, but the Prince of Conde entreated them to come to Saint Manehold, the place being more commodious: Their commission tying them to no certaine place, the Deputies went thither, where all difficulties which might contradict the peace were reconciled, and the Articles following concluded: The which being signed, the Prince, the Kings Deputies, and all the other Noblemen, went to giue God thanks, and from thence to a Feast.

Articles accorded by the Duke of Ventadour Peere of France, and Gouverneur for the King in Languedoc, and the Siegneurs of Lannin, T bon, Boisfise, and Bullion all Councellors of State, and Commissioners deputed by his Majesty by vertue of a commission dated the 5th of May last past, To the Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, as well in his owne name, as of other Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and Noblemen which haue assisted him, be they present or absent.

Articles of peace concluded at Saint Manehold.

E I That the Generall Estates of the Realme, shall be called and assembled in the Town of Sens, after the accustomed manner, by the 24 of August, in the which the Deputies of the three Orders which shall assist, may with all liberty propound whatsoever they shall thinke in their consciences to be profitable for the good of the Realme and ease of the subiect: That thereby his Majestie, with the aduice of the Princes of his blood and of other Princes, Officers of his Crowne, and chiefe Lords of his Councell, may make some good lawes and ordinances, to containe euery man in his duty: to fortifie the lawes and Edicts made for the preferuation of the publike tranquillity: and to reforme the disorders, which may giue iust occasion of complaint and discontent to his good subiects.

II. As for the Mariages with Spaine, the Queene Regent hath written her letters vnto the Prince, touching that subiect, whereby he hath receiued contentment, so as it shall not be needfull to make any mention thereof in this Article.

III. The fortifications of the Citadell of Meziers which are towards the Towne, shall be dismantled and defaced: and that, vpon a Petition made by the Duke of Neuers, that he would please his Majestie to assigne vnto him a summe of money to helpe to build him a house in stead of that which hee had in the Towne of Meziers, which was ruined and demolished when the said Citadell was built: It hath bene agreed that he shall haue an assignation of such a summe as shall be thought fit, to his good liking.

IIII. The Fort of Blauet which hath bene seized on during these late alterations, A and which they have begun to rectifie & fortifie, shall be razed, and left in the same estate it was in before the surprisand that hereafter there shall not be any Capitaine or Garison in the same; and in like manner all other new fortifications made in Britanie by whomsoever upon this occasion, shall be ruined.

V. And to prevent the ruines and oppressions which the people suffer by souldiers, as well French as strangers, which have bene leauied since the first of Ianuary last past, and are dispersed into diuers parts of this Realme, whether for his Maiestie or the said Prince, they shall be discharged, and the strangers conducted out of the Realme by Commisaries deputed by his Maiestie and the said Prince, within twelve daies after the signing of these B Articles: and as for the French, they shall be enjoined to retire to their houses within 12 daies after notice given them, upon paine to be punished as Vagabonds.

VI. His Maiestie to gratifie the Prince, upon his request and instance made vnto him, and the assurance which he hath of his affection to his seruice, hath willingly granted the Towne and Cattle of Amboise vnto him vnto the conclusion of the Generall Estates; and for the guard of the said Castle, 100 men in Garison.

VII. The Duke of Vendosme being absent, yielding the obedience which is due vnto his Maiestie, for the causes contained in this present treaty, his pleasure is that the said Duke shall be restored to his Government, charges, honors and commands, to enjoy them as he hath formerly done; and that all inhibitions made by letters patents, shall be disannulled by the like letters directed to the Court of Parliament of Britanie, in such sort as they may proue no whit prejudiciall vnto him.

VIII. And touching that which he hath caused to be represented, that he had obtained the consents of the Estates of Britany, for the leauying of such money in the Country as was necessary for the entertainment of his guards; his Maiestie hath bene pleased to confirme and allow of that which the said Estates had done in that behalfe.

IX. As also having regard vnto the Petition presented vnto him on the behalfe of the Duke of Rerz, that he would bee pleased to entertaine the number of souldiers in Macheou and Belle-Isle, as it is contained in a Briefe granted by the deceased King; it is agreed that the said souldiers shall be continued for 4 years.

X. The enterprize made vpon Hennebont to the preiudice of the Seigneur of Camore, who is gouernour thereof, shall be repaired, and he restored to his charge, as hee was before these alterations.

XI. All Garisons put into any Townes or places of this Realme by reason of these present motions, since the first of Ianuary last, shall be discharged, except 100 men which shall be entertained at Meziens, vntill after the Assembly of the generall Estates, and 200 for the like space in Soissons, whereof the Duke of Mayen is Gouernour, and all other places shall remaine in the same estate they were in before.

XII. Letters Patents shall be directed to all Courts of Parliaments to be verified, by the which his Maiestie shall declare, that he hath bene duly informed, that the said Prince and other Princes, and Officers of the Crowne, of what quality and condition soever, which have followed and assisted him in these alterations, had no bad intention against his seruice, with all clauses necessary for their safeties and discharges, that they may not be called in question hereafter, and that they shall be restored to their Offices, Estates and Dignities, to enjoy them as they had formerly done.

XIII. And in like manner his Maiestie shall write to all Princes, Estates, and Common-weales, allied to this Crowne, and men of quality shall be sent expressly vnto them, to let them vnderstand what he had found concerning the innocency and good intention of the said Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and Noblemen which had assisted them.

XIIII. His Maiestie doth also grant, in regard of the charges which the Princes and other Noblemen have bene at, by reason of this alteration, to giue presently vnto the Prince of Conde, 45000 pounds sterling, to bee diuided by him amongst the rest as hee should thinke good.

XV. In consideration of the aboue-mentioned Articles, which otherwise had not bene granted by his Maiestie, the said Princes, Officers of the Crowne and Noblemen, doe renounce all leagues and associations with whomsoever, as well within as without the Realme, with promise neuer to make any more hereafter.

XVI. His

A XVI. His Maiestie doth also grant in consideration of the great and worthy seruices done vnto this Crowne, as well by the predecessors of the said duke of Neuers as by himselfe, to giue him all necessary expeditions for the reuerfion of the Government of Champagne in the name of his eldest sonne. This treatie was concluded the 15 of May 1614, and signed by the Prince of Conde, the Kings Commissioners, and the other Princes and Officers.

These Articles were brought to the King and Queene, who signed and ratified them, sending them presently backe vnto the Prince: whereupon they resolved to separate themselves. Two daies after, the Prince retired to the Casteaux, the Duke of Neuers to Neuers, the Duke of Mayen to Soissons, the Duke of Longueville to Amiens, and the Duke of Bouillon and the Duke of Luxembourg to Sedan. Thus God turning the Princes hearts, made them to preferre the publike, before their priuate interest, compounding all things mildly, by a speedy and full resolution to the content of all good men. For the Prince fearing that his too long absence, ill interpreted by some, might open contrary to his intentions the way to some dangerous faction in the State, to the preiudice both of the King and people, he wisely resolved (and by his example, all they which did assist him) by his returne to free them from all iealousie and mistrust, which his absence had bred.

The Queene in like manner, to make it knowne that she could not grow distrustfull of those in whom before she had neuer seene any signe of infidelity or disobedience, iudging by their resolutions to peace, of their faithfull intentions, full of affection to the Kings seruice: and to take away all causes of iealousie, shee thought good to make knowne vnto the publike what assurance she had, by a letter she sent vnto the Court of Parliament, giuing them to vnderstand what had past in this treaty; and what satisfaction the Princes had giuen the King and her by their obedience; and that now all distrusts should cease: wherefore there was no further necessity, for the inhabitants of Townes to continue their guards, nor to forbid the entry to any; but that all things should remaine in the same estate they had bene in before these alterations.

Before their departure from Saint Manchold, the Marshall of Bouillon said vnto the President Iannin, that neither heretofore, now, nor hereafter, his owne particular should euer crosse or hinder that of the publike; desiring him to take that assurance from him, and to undertake for him to all those which should say the contrary. The Prince said also vnto the President, I giue all the iniuries which some haue sought to doe me, vnto the publike, and it rests in their Maiesties to giue me the effect of the treaty. I offer to add to my helping hand (as all they will doe which haue assisted mee) with a heart free from all bitterness, so heere from whomsoever an ouerture of the meanes that may bring all things to a good end: assure your selfe Sir, I desire not the ruine of any one for my priuate hatred, vntill I finde that it may deliuer the State from some approaching ruine. The Siegneur of Vignier returning to Court, he brought this letter which the Prince sent to the Queene.

Madam, I haue heretofore receiued so many testimonies of your fauour wherewith I hath pleased your Maiestie to honor me, as I hold my selfe infinitely bound: yea those which it hath pleased you to shew me in this treaty with his Maiesties Deputies, haue againe so strictly obliged me, as I can no longer forbear to make a most humble acknowledgement thereof vnto your Maiestie, whom I humbly beseech to beleue, that my inclination hath alwaies bene to yeeld all seruice and obedience vnto you. Consider if it please you with what freedome I haue alwaies caried my selfe, yea in the last moneth of Ianuary; and had not the malice and practice of mine enemies bene, who by false reports removed me from the honour of your presence and fauour, matters had bene as they need otherwise for the good of the Kings seruice, neither had all these disorders hapned: but seeing by the grace of God, and your Maiesties wise conduct they are now ended, and suppressed, I most humbly beseech you so to provide by your authority, as wee fall not hereafter into the like disorders; assuring you that for mine owne particular I will doe all that is in my power for the seruice of the King my Lord, and that of your Maiestie, Sec.

The Queene having receiued this letter sent to assure him of all fauorable visage and countenance: Desires should cause the Castle of Amboise to be deliuered vnto him.

The manner of condemned by the Court.

Anne de Montmorency who died of his wounds received at the battell of Saint Denis in the year 1567, there had beene no Constable in France, vntill the year 1595, when as Henry the fourth aduanced him (being sonne vnto Anne de Montmorency) to the dignity of Constable: In his youth he was called D'auinelle, and vnder that name at the battell of Dreux, he tooke Lewis Prince of Conde prisoner. He was afterwards made Marshall of France, and after his fathers death had the government of Languedoc. Hee had borne Armes in Piedmont. During all the ciuill warres vnder King Charles the ninth, hee did many military exploits against the m of the reformed Religion: but during the time of Henry the third he would neuer come to Court. In the beginning of the league 1585, as the most ancient Marshall and first Officer of the Crowne, he ioyned himselfe with Henry the fourth (who was then but King of Nauarre) and Henry Prince of Conde, against the authors of the league. The good seruices he did to the state during this war, and since in the time of peace in the time of his honorable age vnto his death, are written at large by the Historiess of these times, and therefore I will forbear to make any farther repetition. His sicknesse was somewhat long, and his son Montf. de Montmorency Admirall of France came to see him and assisted at his death; to whom hee gaue goodly admonitions for the instruction of his young years: among other things, hee recommended two vnto him: the one was to bee alwaies faithfull and obedient vnto the King, and watchfull for the good of the State and aduancement of the publik: weale, as those goodly charges did binde him to doe. The other was that being dead, they should not make any funerals for him, but onely cary his body to the graue, being followed by him and his household seruants, and but with fixe Torchess, the which was obserued in euery point as hee had ordained: yet much against his sonnes will, who for the loue hee bare to the memory of his Progenitor had a great desire to prepare him a funerall pompe according to his quality, and to haue his body conuaducted out of Languedoc to Montmorency neere to Saint Denis in France, there to be laid in the sacred monument of his Predecessors. Hee left foure children, one son, and three daughters, the 2 daughters of the first venter are married, the one to the Duke of Ventadour, and the other to the Earle of Auvergne now duke of Angoulême: by the second marriage hee had one sonne, now duke of Montmorency, Admirall of France and Gouvernor of Languedoc, and his third daughter is married to the Prince of Conde: by his third wife hee had not any children.

In this month also newes came to Court of the lamentable death of Francis Perle of Loraine, Chevallier of Guise, and Lieutenant generall for the King in Prouence. This generous and maiesticall Prince, who aimed at nothing but honor and glory, going from Arles to the Castle of Baux, which is but fixe leagues off, hee would needes giue fire to a Cannon, which breaking, a peece wounded him so in the face, as hee died within 2 houers after: feeling himselfe thus wounded, hee refused all remedies, and contented this life to chuse better, crying out, let no man speake vnto me of liuing longer. The Duke and his other brethren were wonderfullly afflicted, so were the Prince of County, and the Princessesse his sister. The Duchesse Dowager of Guise continued too without any consolation. All France lamented the death of this generous Prince, and their Maiesties did weinisse (especially the Queene) how much they grieved for his losse.

The King, Queene, and Court being gone to Saint Germaine in Lay, the Court of Parliament had seized vpon a booke which was pernicious and preiudiciall to the French Monarchy, intituled, Defensio fidei Catholicae & Apostolicae aduersus Anglicanae sectae errores, the author whereof, was one Francis Suarez a Doctor of Diuinity in Greado, and a Jesuite by profession, printed first at Coimbra in Portugal by permission of the Prouinciall, in the year 1613: which booke the Kings Councell had verified in Court by the conference of the abstract which they had in hand printed from the original. And it is to be noted that this booke though most pernicious, had beene allowed not only by the Prouinciall of the Iesuits in Germany and commended by the Prouinciall of Portugal, but also by the Bishops of Coimbra, Alguaz, and Lameca, by vertue of a Commission given by the R. Don Pedro de Castille Vice Roy of Portugal, and Inquisitor generall of the aith, with a note made by Don Fernand Martinez, Bishop of Algarbe the which is worthy of censure.

Where as bringing their conclusions into the Court, and representing an extract of some speciall passages, they required that the propositions and maxims contained in the said booke of Suarez should be declared contrary to the ancient Councels, and to the decrees

A crees of the Court, scandalous, pernicious, and tending to incite subiects and others, to attempt against the persons of Kings, Princes, and Christian Potentates, and that the booke should be forbidden to be sold, or for any man to haue it, keepe it, teach or dispute of such Maxims, vpon paine of high treason: Whereupon this Decree was made.

The great Chamber, the Tournell, and the Edict being assembled, and hauing scene a booke printed at Cullen, entituled Francis Suarez Granatensis de societate Iesu Doctoris Theologi, Defensio fidei Catholicae & Apostolicae, aduersus Anglicanae sectae errores: containing many propositions contrary to the soueraigne power of Princes ordained by God, and the quiet of their Estates, and that it is lawfull for their subiects and strangers to attempt against their persons. The conclusions of the Kings Attorneys generall being heard: the Court doth declare the propositions and maxims contained in the said booke to be scandalous & pernicious, tending to the subuersion of States, and to induce subiects to attempt against the sacred persons of Kings, making mention of King Clouis, and Philip the Faire, the which were false & calumnious. Wherefore the Court ordained, that the said booke of Suarez should be burnt in the Palace yard by the Hangman; forbidding all Printers and booke-sellers to print or sell them, and for all men of what condition soeuer to haue them, or for any other to write or keepe any such booke. Moreouer, it was decreed, that Ignati. Armand Rector of the Iesuites in Paris, Cotton, Fronton, and Sirmond should come the first Court day, and be giuen to vnderstand, that contrary to their declaration, and the Decree of their Generall, in the year 1610, Suarez booke had beene printed and brought into the Court, being contrary to the Kings authority & the safety of his person & estate: and that they should be enioyned to cause their Generall to renew the said Decree, and to haue it published, whereof they should bring an Act within fixe monthes, and provide that no booke containing such damnable and pernicious propositions should be made or put forth by them of their society: and that they should be enioyned in their sermons to preach the contrary doctrine vnto the people, otherwise the Court would proceed against the delinquents, as guilty of treason and troublers of the publique peace.

In this month of Iune newes came to Court that the Marquis of Bonniuet (hauing certain Troops of Horse in Poictou) had committed great spoiles, and that hee had ruined part of the suburbs of Poictiers, and some farmes belonging to the Bishop of that place, and that many of his men being disbanded, committed infinite acts of Hostilitie within the Country.

On the other side their Maiesties were informed that the Duke of Vendosmes souldiers in Britany did the like, to the great discontent of the Prince of Conde, and the said Duke, and to the great oppression of the poore people: whereupon their Maiesties resolu'd in Councell to make a voyage into Poictou and Britany thinking that the Kings presence would disperse and scatter (as it were) all these petty cloudes and threatnings of warre.

The Prince of Conde hauing taken possession of the Towne and Castle of Amboise, according to the Articles of the treaty, went into Poictou; visiting his houses, and hindering what he could, that those troopes which had followed him vnder the Marquis of Bonniuet should not oppress the poore people. He came to Chastelleraut whither many of his friends came to visit him, where remembering that hee had received some cause of discontent against the Bishop of Poictiers, being informed that hee had spoken vnworthily of him, and that to satisfie his promise vnto President Jannin, to forget all iniuries, hee would in regard thereof assure them of Poictiers of his sincere intentions: whereupon hee gaue charge to Monsieur de Latrie to carie Letters of assurance to the Towne-house, giuing them to vnderstand, that all things were pacified by the treaty: that hee had recovered her Maiesties fauour, and that for his part all discontents were forgotten: yet could hee not passe ouer with silence the words which the Bishop had spoken against him: which Letters were received by the chiefe of the Towne from de Latrie, but some of them hauing not heard the Letter read, or not well vnderstanding the sense, aduertised the Bishop of the Princes complaint, whereat both he and some of his friends were offended: so as on the 22 of Iune, de Latrie walking with a Gentleman called la Blanchardiere and one Footman, they were encountered by a troope of 40 or 50 men with short peeces, who were led by a Scholler called Boux, and countenanced by Saint-George, the Bishops kinsman: theise approaching neere to de Latrie, asked if he were not he which had brought the letters from the Prince against the Bishop of Poitiers. These two gentlemen finding they had an intent to assault them, drew their swords for their defence, but presently the others discharged their peeces, and wounded de Laitry in diuers places: they also slue his Footman and a Townesman which was neere them; after which they retired to the Bishops Palace, and de Laitry was led to the Maiors house there to be drest: where hee entreated Blanchardier to take the paines to goe and informe the Prince of this accident, whom he brought returning to Amboise, to whom he related the tragedie and the truth of the fact. The Prince finding himselfe wronged in the person of de Laitry thus wounded, fearing that he should hardly get out of the towne with his life, he resolved to goe himselfe and to free him from this danger: But to take away all cause of ialousie from their Maiesties, and the towne of Poitiers, he dismissed all the Nobilitie which was with him, entreating them not to follow him to Poitiers, and so onely with fifteene horse he approached neere the towne, with an intent to enter in person, and carie away with him the person wounded. Being come within two leagues, hee met with de Laitry, who had got forth by policy, yet notwithstanding he would goe on to be informed of the wrong done him, and the outrage vied to the party in doing that which he had in charge: Being within 50 paces of the gates, he heard of some mutinie within the towne, for the wrong done to de Laitry, wherein the Bishop did also intermeddle, who being aduertised of the Princes approach, and seeing two factions among the people (the one maintaining the fact of Saint George, the other the Princes interest, & of his friend wounded) apprehending also what might happen if the Prince entered, he resolved to take the government of the Towne into his hands and to keepe the Prince from entering, to whom he sent word that it was not good for him to enter, the which he would oppose. This message was deliuered vnto him by a young man called Beaulieu de Perse; yet notwithstanding the Prince went vnto the gate, where he found one called Berland, who told him he had charge from the Magistrats of the Towne to refuse him the gate, shutting the barre against him, neither could they get any better satisfaction from this resolute souldier. The Prince went away with much discontent for this refusal, for with this Berland there was another with his pistoll charged and the cock downe, and ouer the gate was a Capitaine called Malagues with certain souldiers, who by his commandement discharged their peeces, and hurt some of the princes traine.

The Prince complains to the Queene of the wrong done him at Poitiers

The Prince retiring to Chastellerault, hee made his complaint vnto the Queene, sending a Gentleman expressly with Letters, by the which hee demanded iustice for his friend which was hurt; for the refusal which was made to receiue him; and for the insolvency of their Porters: But he complained especially of the Bishop, as the author of this tumult, from whom he demanded a satisfaction due to his qualitie: and that information might be made against Saint George, at the suit of de Laitry, whom he protested to assist with all his means, seeing that he had bene wounded in doing him seruice.

The Duke of Rohannois gouernour of Poitiers comes thither, and what pass.

About this time the Duke of Rohannois, Gouernour of Poitiers came thither; hee was receiued by the Maior, Sheriffs, and some Burgeses, who conducting him to his lodging with all respect, he was invited to supper by the Maior, whither the Bishop of Poitiers came to visit him, entreating him to forget the attempt which had bene made in his charge at the Princes coming, whereunto the Duke did willingly consent; beseeching him that hereafter he would not attempt the like; and going to conduct him out of the Maiors house, he found him attended by eleuen horsemen with their pistolls, and about 400 foot carrying short peeces vnder their cloakes. The Duke being with the Maior and Sheriffs, he was aduertised that vpon his arrival the streets were barricadoed; whereupon hee resolved with them and others, to forbid any barricadoes to be made, or chaires to be drawne without his commandement, enioyning them to pull downe all the barricadoes which had bene made, and in case of any alarme to goe vnto the rendezuous appointed, there to receiue the Dukes commandement. The which was published the next morning, being the 26 of Iune, and the same day after dinner he went to visit the Bishop, where they resolved that hee should Duke with the Maior and Sheriffs should send la lettre vnto the Prince, who had bene with him the day before, from the inhabitants, to whom he had promised not to offer to enter into the Towne before her Maieitie had so ordained. The like he confirmed vnto the Dukes messenger: But the Bishop hearing that the Prince came within a league of the towne, he sent vnto the Duke to haue Saint Cyprians gate shut; to whom the duke made answer, that he held it not fit, being but three a clock; but

A but he would take such order, as there should happen no inconuenience, whither he went to giue order for the sure guard thereof.

In his returne to his lodging he was aduertised, that they did arme about the Bishops Palace; whither going with some of the chiefe Burgeses, and being before the Palace, they found the chaires drawne, and lockes put vnto them; seeing many men armed, he demanded the reason of it, and why they had drawne the chaires: to whom they said, they had seene many horsemen without the towne and neere the suburbs: The Duke answered that he had bene without, but could not see any one which might annoy them; and that being their Gouernour, he would be the first which would oppose himselfe against any which should attempt against the Towne; that they should vie more moderation; and not arme so rashly, and at the same time he caused the chaires to be vnlocked.

The Duke saw many signes of a popular fedition; the Capitaine who had the guard of the port of Pont Ioubert, hauing abandoned his charge, let downe the Portcullis, and retired with all speed to the Bishop who had sent for him. The Duke returned in his Caroch by the Bishops palace, to see if the people were still in armes, where hee found the chaires drawn and lockt againe; and de Roumay coming vnto him, told him that the Bishop could no longer containe the people, whereupon hee entreated him to cause the locks to be opened that he might passe; which done, after some long attendance for that the Bishop kept the keyes, he past to the Bishops gate, where hee entreated one to goe vnto the

C Bishop in his name, and to tell him that he held it strange to see the streets chained, and the people armed: then going himselfe out of his Caroch, and seeing a great number of armed men, he began to tell them they did ill to arme so lightly, and that it was not for the Kings seruice to liue after that manner, and to vie such violent and seditious courses: a souldier being in the middle of the presse answered, that they would doe it notwithstanding his command; whereupon he instantly saw a number of other souldiers coming out of the Bishops palace, with Pikes, Muskets, and Harquebuses, and then he heard one cry out, Behold the Traitors; and thereupon they thrust at him with their pikes and holbars, which his people that were about him, and the Gentlemen which did accompany him, defended as well as they could, yet he was touched a little on the nose, so as hee

D bled: He was presently conducted by some that were with him into the palace, where he found the Bishop in the head of a great multitude, armed with his Curaffe, and a pike in his hand; to whom the Duke said, Why Sir, what courses are these, to seeke to murder good men, and such as haue the honour to be as I am, without any subiect where haue they learned to serue the King after this manner? whereupon, about 150 which were armed in the Court, would haue quarrelled with the Duke, telling him, that they were not to obseue any other orders then such as had bene accustomed: Hereupon one of his friends wished him to retire into an upper chamber, and to speake little, otherwise he might be in danger.

The chiefe of the towne were suffered to come vnto him, who testified their griefes for the iniurie that was done vnto him, and offered to die with him, rather then hee should haue any wrong. There was hee forced to sup and to stay till after midnight, hoping that they would suffer him to depart vnto his lodging, the which hee could neuer obtaine; having no other priuate friend there, by whom hee might demand safety of this mutinous multitude to goe to his rest; for all that were now with him were the Bishops friends, and dissuaded him, saying that the people would not suffer it, and that there was no safety for him but there, the which it seemed he was forced to beleue, for that the Sergeant Maior having by his commandement giuen charge to the six Capitaines to bring two Companies of euery Company to the old market place, there to vnderstand his Maiesties intention, and in what manner they should guard, Pidoux one of the six Capitaines understood that it should not be so, and that the Bishop was not placed there to discharge his judiciall function alone, but to gouerne the towne and to execute his priuate commission, adding thereunto in the presence of the Mayor, that all men did conceiue the Gouernour should haue shewed the speciall authority hee hath from the Queen, to commande others; but seeing hee hath not done it, to the whole body, they were not resolved to obey him. Then the Maior and Sergeant Maior told him, that seeing his commission had bene once published and enrolled, and hee installed in the place, hee had not any need of new Letters. But the Duke found the effects of his words: for about midnight one Esnard acted like a

Sergeant

Sergeant of a band, came vnto him with twenty musketers, and some halberdiers (having A been first with the Bishop) and said, I come in the behalfe of 2000 men of this towne, who are very sorry for the danger you have bene in, and offer themselves for your preservation, knowing that you are a good servant to the King, and their Gouverneur; yet they desire to obey you vnder the authority of the Bishop of Poitiers: They are your servants, and will acknowledge you, desiring notwithstanding to serve the King after their owne fantasies, that is to say, to draw their chaires when they please, at the found of the Bishops drums, which are his bells; saying moreover, that there were traitors in the towne, whose counsel they would not have him to vfe.

During these speeches, Boux (he which had assaulted de Latrie) came vp accompanied B with many others, who in the Bishops presence spake many words vnto the Duke to moue him; but he obseruing the aduice which had bene giuen him, and seeing him to be the author of the sedition, and that the Bishop did in no sort blame him, he held his peace, resolving to suffer all indignities, having but foure Gentlemen with him, without any other armes but their swords against five hundred townesmen which were armed within the palace: And to finish the worke, they caused him to retire into a chamber to sleepe, setting two Sentinels at the doore, and a Corps de guard at the staires foot, and another in the garden right against his chamber window, commanding them to shoot, if they saw any one present himselfe: They also set two other Corps de guards, the one in the Bishops Court, the other at the gate.

The next day about nine a clocke, the Duke (seeing himselfe vnable to doe the King any C service, and for his owne safety) desired to retire himselfe out of the towne, being conducted by some of the chiefe Burgeffes; and it was happy for him, for all the streets were barred, and he past by their fauours which conducted him.

The Marquis of Cœure sent to the Duke of Vendôme with the Articles.

The Queene Regent, after the treaty of Saint Manehould, sent the Marquis of Cœures D into Britany to the Duke of Vendôme, who signified his consent by a declaration which he signed. But presently after the Marquis returned to Paris, the Queene was aduertised by Letters from Britany, that the Dukes troopes continued their hostilities, and that by the intelligence of the Seig: of Aradon, Gouverneur of the Towne and Castle of Vannes, he had entred the same towne: And that it seemed thereby he had no intent to keepe the treaty, whereupon he wrote presently vnto the Queene, to giue her an account of the whole businesse: That hauing by a declaration vnder his owne hand, deliuered vnto the Marquis of Cœure, promised to obey the Articles concluded, he thought hee had right to enioy the benefit of his re-establisment, vnto which her Maiesties bounty had restored him in case of obedience, and by consequence to enter into the townes of his government: That notwithstanding the decrees of the Parliament, hee was well grounded to demand entry of the Seigneur of Aradon: That being neere to Vannes on his way to Blauet, Deputies were sent vnto him in the inhabitants name to offer him entry into the town, where he entred, the inhabitants being in armes, receiuing him withall honour and respect: That he had found the towne in the guard of the inhabitants, and so had left it; not fearing to E put his person into their power, hauing none with him but his guards, and some of the Nobility, among 300 men that were armed: That to free them from all doubt of his sincere intentions, he had declared vnto them publicly his full submission to her Maiesties will, promising presently to dismisst his troops, whereupon hee entreated her Maiesty to take his entry into Vannes as an action of a Gouverneur, restored by her bounty and his obedience, &c.

The Duke enters Vannes, and

the Queene.

The Kings Declaration in fauour of the Prince of Conde.

Their Maiesties hauing resolved the voyage of Poictou and Britany, the King in his Council thought it fit in fauour of the Prince of Conde, and according to the Articles of the treaty of Saint Manehould, to cause a Declaration to be published, by the which his Maiesty did discharge the said Prince and all other Princes and Noblemen which had F joined with him, from all search, and from all that might be imputed vnto them by reason of the last troubles and alterations; suppressing thereby the memory of all that was past, during the said troubles, by means of his said cousin, and of the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, Noblemen, and others, which had assisted, followed, or fauoured him, were it in the leauing of troopes, taking of places, intelligences, and negotiations both within and without the Realme, or any thing else whatsoever; being sufficiently informed that their intentions were not against his seruice, nor the good of the common-wealth: forbidding any

A any pursuit to be made against them in regard thereof, and commanding that they should enioy all their governments, honors, and dignities in like manner as they had done before the said alteration: which Declaration was verified the first of Iuly by the Court of Parliament.

After this Declaration, their Maiesties being ready to begin their progresse, the Prince of Conde being aduertised hereof, wrote a short letter vnto the Queene concerning the Duke of Vendôme, and the tumults in Poitiers. The Prince of Conde writes Letter to the Queene.

Madam (said he) I was euen now aduertised, that without any other considerations, the Duke of Vendôme hath obeyed you, the Marquis of Cœure is restored to Blauet, B and that in every circumstance, and in all places he hath freed me of my word giuen at S. Manehould: so as the voyage which they have perswaded you vnto, is altogether vnprofitable for Britanie, and it rests onely in you, Madam, to finish the disarming, in making your word compleat. There remains ten thousand pounds sterling, to send vnto the Duke of Vendôme, if it please you, being necessary to make him finish his disarming. I beseech you then that you will command it to be speedily sent vnto him. If your Maiestie come into these parts, it is to assaile me, for that I haue demanded iustice. I beseech you, Madam, be not caried away with these counsels, and beleue not (as some would haue) that I would be the meanes to haue the assembly of the States broken off, so much desired by those which are about you. In a word, Madam, feare hath no power ouer me, C and beleue that I haue in my hands wherewith to preferre my selfe from all oppression. But the loue I beare vnto my King, the Estates, and vnto your person, shall make me attend Monsieur de Mayen to giue you all content, assuring my selfe your Maiesty will command I shall receiue that which is due vnto my quality. And so, &c. This Letter was written from Duffay neere Poitiers, Iuly 16.

The Prince of
to the King.

The King being come to Paris, and giuing order for his voyage into Britany, his Maiestie receiued a Letter from the Prince of Conde, written from Lusignan, by the which he complained againe of the Bishop of Poitiers, and demanded iustice for the outrage they had done vnto his friend in that towne, for want whereof he protested to be reuenged: That he was their Maiesties most humble servant, and was ready to vndergoe all D their commandements, yet he could not forget nor passe ouer in silence what they had done vnto him in that place, nor returne out of Poictou, before he were satisfied for that affront: Finally, he besought him that iustice might be done, and that hee might receiue contentment. But without any answer, their Maiesties resolved to depart within two dayes, so as the regiment of the guards, and three companies of Swisse marched presently away: They gaue warning to all their Maiesties officers to be ready, and in like manner to the Councillors of the Grand-council.

The Councillors of the Court of Parliament, and of the other Courts, went vnto the Loure, to yeeld vnto their Maiesties that wherunto their duties did binde them. The Citie of Paris, carefull about all other of the sacred person of their Kings, fearing to lose E this glorious Sunne of France, from whom they borrowed all their lustre, sent their Prouoost of Merchants and their Sheriffes, to beseech the Queene Regent, not to suffer the King to goe out of Paris, promising to guard him, and to answer for him with the hazard of their owne liues, assuring her Maiesty that the Kings good subiects should receiue much contentment by his stay; fearing that his person being yet young and tender, might receiue some prejudice in his health, by the vndertaking of so long a voyage: which their petition vnto their Maiesties, they said, proceeded from the loue and common consent of all their good subiects of Paris.

desire the Kings stay.

But the Queene gaue them wisely to vnderstand that the voyage was of great importance: That the affaires of the King would be in bad estate, if it were not speedily vnder- F taken: to stay disorders, restrain the liberty of troopes, cut off the way to reuolts, ease the people, assure the townes, restore the commerce, settle officers, cause the King to be obeyed, restore honour to the Magistrates, relieue iustice, heare the peoples complaints, helpe the oppressed, assure the fearfull, reconcile quarrels, and to giue peace vnto the prouinces, vpon whom did fall the choller of those Princes which are yet absent from Court: That the Duke of Montbason, the Marquis of Cœure, and the Earle of Verus, whom she had sent thither, could not preuaile: the Kings preference was therefore necessary to disperse these petty clouds: That there was no feare for his Maiestie in that voyage, that hee

he would retorne soone to their comforts, bringing peace and rest to all his good subiects. A The Parisians at that time promised their Maiesties that nothing should passe within the City, nor thereabouts, but for the Kings seruice and contentment; that they would answer for the City during the said voyage, and keepe it if need were, but it was not held necessary, and they were only commanded to haue a care that no faction should arise within the City during their absence: and so they tooke their leaues of their Maiesties.

The King begins his voyage.

On Saturday the 5 of Iuly, the King departed with his company of Light-Horse, and soone after the Queene, with all the Princes, Noblemen, and Ladies of the Court, and all the Officers; leaving Monf: de Mansan, who led his company thither. Paris B was left to the custodie of the Inhabitants, under the command of Monf: de Lieu-Court their Gouvernor, and of Monf: de Grioux Prouost of Merchants; and the Citadell & Towne of Amiens, in the guard of the Marshall D'Ancre. In lesse then three dayes, Paris was emptied of about 30000 persons, for all men that had any businesse or suites, either before the Councell of State, or the great Councell, were forced to follow the King in his voyage to sollicite their causes. The first Towne where their Maiesties stayed for their traine was Elampes, where the inhabitants made shew of their publike ioy in receiuing their King: but I may not stand to make particular relation of the reception the King had in all the Townes as he past in this voyage, hauing much matter of farre greater importance to treat of.

The Duke of Mayen sent to the Prince of Conde.

The King came to Orleans, where the Inhabitants met him in Armes, and receiued their Maiesties with all the honor they could deuise: they stayed there eight daies, as well to attend the Prince of Condes answer, as to heare how matters went in Britany and Poictou: for before their going from Paris, their Maiesties had resolued (according to the Princes owne letter) to send some one to conferre with him: the Duke of Mayen had offered himselfe to this employment, promising to acquit himselfe, as hee assured their Maiesties to perswade the Prince to come vnto the King, wherefoeuer he should bee, to yeeld him that whereunto his birth and quality did binde him. The Duke vpon this promise parted from Paris, with some Gentlemen of his House, thinking to finde the Prince at Chastelleraulx or at Lusignan in Poictou, but hee was forced to goe to Chastelleraulx, D whither the Prince had retired himselfe, hearing of the Kings coming. Others say it was, for that the Duke of Neuers had intreated him to christen one of his Children; but howfoeuer, there the Duke found him, where hauing spent some dayes in conference with the Prince, he could draw no other reason from him, but that hee would neuer come to Court before the King had done him iustice for the wrong he had receiued from the Bishop of Poictiers, and that they had giuen contentment to the Duke of Vendosme, for the 10000 pound which was yet vnpaid by the treatie of Saint Manchould. The Duke of Mayen seeing him thus constant in his resolution, was forced to returne to their Maiesties without any effect, coming to Orleans on the 13 of Iuly, to whom he related the businesse as it had past, and assuring them that he could not perswade him to come to Court; E vnto the Duke had the contentment about mentioned: that for his part hee had vied all the meanes he could inuent, to make him forget the action of Poictiers, but hee tooke this affront done by the Bishop so to heart, as he said he had no power to resolue, vntill hee had drawne such reuenge from the King, as he desired, promising to come vnto his Maiestie as soone as it should please him to doe him iustice. Whereupon seeing hee would not yeeld to the intreaties of the Duke of Mayen, they thought it not fit for the Kings dignity to send againe vnto him, but to proceed on in their journey, to comfort the poore afflicted people, and to assure the Prouinces troubled with ciuill combustions.

The Kings troops aduance towardes Britany.

The Marshall of Brillac went on with 6000 Swisses, and led them to the frontiers of Britany, being a lamentable thing to heare of the spoiles, murders, and acts of hostility, F which were daily committed in Britany by the troops of the Duke of Vendosme, and by those of the Marquis of Bonniuet in Poictou: the Marshalls of Lauardin and Boisdauphin, and with them the Marquis of Sable, Monf: Praslin and others aduanced with the horse being about 1200: and withall Monf: de Ramburge was commanded to make ready his Regiment, which he did in lesse then fifteene daies, hauing 2000 men well armed ready for the Kings seruice, which troopes lay nere vnto Nantes, attending his Maiesties command.

A During the Kings stay at Orleans, he made a declaration directed to the Court of Parliament at Rennes, for the restoring of the Duke of Vendosme to his Gouvernement of Britany, and for the free inioying thereof, and of all his Charges, Honors, Captainships and Estates as hee had done before the last troubles: and also, for the disanulling of a decree which had beene made against the Siegneur of Aradon, concerning that which had past at Vannes, forbidding them in any sort to molest him or any other for any thing which had past in the Prouince of Britanie by reason of those late alterations.

About this time the generall Estates were assigned at Paris, and published through all the Prouinces of the Realme. The Magistrates of this great City gaue notice to all the B Inhabitants of what quality or condition soeuer, that they might freely and with all liberty bring or send vnto the Town-house what complaint or grievance they thought good, the which they might deliuer into the hands of the Prouost of Merchants or Sheriftes, or to their Deputies to be put into their instructions.

Publication of the generall Estates.

At the same time there past through France an Exhortation in forme of letters, directed to the Governours of Prouinces, by way of aduice giuen to the three Estates of the Realme, speaking to either of them in particular. And for that they containe some things worthy obseruation to moue a people to obey their King, and not to giue care to such as seeke to trouble the State, I haue set them downe in their order.

C To the Clergie.
MY Masters of the Clergie, obserue well this aduice, there is not any one of you but doth remember in euery point the Articles of the last league, made by many Princes (and with the Kings priuaty) at Peronne in the yeare 1584, the which in shew was goodly and plausible, and so fauourably imbraced of all the world, as it seemed (especially to those of your coate) the Angell of God should confound him that would contradict it. What followed after 14 yeares of barbarous and intestine warres, without intermission? What hath the wisdom, policie, and purse of Popes, of the Confitorie of most of the Princes in Italy, yea in a manner of all you preailed? Nothing, as you know, but the aduancement of heresie, the ruine of temples, many communitie depriued of diuine seruice, D the shamefull punishment of some religious men, the sudden death of the chiefe authors, the poeury of all the Clergie of France, by the sale of their lands; and such a confusion in the government of your affaires, as the suites continue yet. It is a wonder how these miseries were suppressed by the generosity of the deceased King, who hath repaired your Altars and restored the Masse in many strong townes where for many yeares it had beene intermitted. You enioy againe your Benefices and houles, from whence the Cannon had chased you. All these disorders grew from this League, the fatal spring of our miseries, which made France so feeble, as, if his Maiestie had yeelded any thing to the opposition which was made against him at his coming to the Crowne, we had beene now strangers in our owne Country. But he being assisted by God and serued by his good seruants E treated with his disobedient subiects, and with strangers in the yeare 1598.

To the obseruation of which treaty you are especially bound, hauing comprehended you as fauourably therein as you could desire, as well for your reliefe, as for the maintenance of your authority and freedoms. My Masters, in recompence of this great Princes paines, he hath left you this precious treasure of peace, which he hath purchased with his owne blood, to the end you should adde to your helpes (as the first member of this French Monarchy) to preferue it carefully. Shew your duties then by your pietie and good instructions, making the Kings tender age an ample subiect to practise your fidelities; and yeelding vnto the sonne what you owe vnto the father, also vnto your Country that which you owe, imitating the zeale and wisdom of your predecessors, that by your F example euery man may doe his duty.

To the Nobilitie.

MY Masters of the Nobilitie and Gentry, honor the Princes because of their quality which is the most eminent amongst men; and if you haue the honour to be nere them in any good esteeme, neuer leaue them: If you doe not apparently percelue them to decline from their duty vnto the King their Soueraine Lord and yours, for in this case the necessity of the Estate dispenceth you of your faith. You my Masters who are the first newes

1614 "newes of this State, her strength and defence, did you finde your felues any thing bettered A
 "during the said League, to haue run ouer all France sweating in your armes in the compa-
 "nie of strangers, onely to support some of the said Princes, and for their particular seruices, "forgetting inconsiderately what you did owe vnto your King and this Crowne? Is "your honor increaseth you or your children advanced to the chiefe places of the State?
 "Are your names become any whit the more famous? Are your goods increaseth? Are "your debts paid? haue you not rather made your condition worse then better? The last
 "peace concluded at Veruain in May 1598, hath it not made you repent that which "is past, and acknowledge openly, that nothing but blame, reproach, feare and shame apper-
 "taines vnto rebels and feditious: It hath also taught you by experience, that there is no "greater misfortune, nor more to bee auoyded, then that which separateth children from "the fathers obedience, and the Nobility from that of the King: when this comes to passe,
 "God suffers his iudgments to light vpon men without respect of age, kindred, or qua"lity, by inhumane murders, whereby some of the chiefe houses of your body are ex"tinct, by surprises, sieges, ruines and burning of houles, rauishing of wiues and virgins,
 "spoil of your goods, your fields left waste, & gourd with your blood: a general famine the "remembrance whereof is so fresh, as you may easily ghesse what you are, & what you haue "endured, and what you may: obseruing well what is past, and the present, there is no per"swasion, pretext, or ambition of any man shall euer deceiue you, nor make you forget that "the most wicked condition of men, is to haue home-bred quarrels, and cursed bee hee that "shall raise them. These Princes whom you haue so much affected, whose fortunes, haue they
 "haue so long followed, haue they not abandoned you, and made their owne peace with the
 "the King? They haue only obtained pardons for some: haue they had any other care to "releue you (for so many ruines which you haue suffered in your houses) by any honest
 "gratifications? when you haue had any occasion to vse them to your quarrels, (whereof
 "you haue too many) or for your ciuill or criminall suites, or for any other affaires, haue they
 "not assisted you coldly? If you haue at any time craued their support vnto the King, for "any government or place of command, haue you not bene better satisfied with his Ma-
 "iesties reception, with his liberty of speech, and his facility to yeeld vnto your demands,
 "then with those which presented you but for fashion sake.

"Finally my Masters, what support and fauour you haue receiued heretofore from D
 "the said Princes, the like must you expect hereafter. So as they please their owne pas"sions, and attaine to their owne ends by your assistance, they care not what may happen "for your particular, (they imbrace you if they haue cause to imploy you,) and if you in-
 "treat them they know you not, they haue no Angell to open the doores when you are "prisoners for their sakes, they bring your heads to the blocke to perserue their owne.
 "A Marshall of France, a great Captaine (if euer there were any) lost his being, decei-
 "ued by strangers: Let the King seaze vpon your lands, they will not giue you any of "theirs to recompence your losses. One of the first Presidents of a Soueraine Court
 "hath bene in a manner brought to beggery, and yet they which were the causes of this
 "poverty, pity him lesse then others.

"Moreouer, represent vnto your felues, that the King is in his Minority, that hee is but "thirteen yeares old, that you are his Tutors and Guardians, and therefore your ser-
 "uice should neuer faile him, both for this consideration, and for the strict bond which "euery one of you hath to the memorie of that great Captaine the deceased King his "father: who by his vertue and incomparable courage, hath purchased for euery one of "you, with Armes in hand, in open field, in the sight of Paris, and elsewhere against "rebels and strangers, the honour to haue bene the preseruation of your Country: bee
 "so still vnto him according to occurrences, lest that you lose that glorie.

"Finally, seeing that in our priuate actions, we desire not to admit of any superiour to E
 "command ouer vs, being Masters of our owne conduct: doe you so in like manner,
 "without expecting any prayers or intreaty from the King, and haue an especiall care that "no pretext whatsoever may make you stray from your obedience: fly all procurements
 "as dangerous rocks. Wee haue iust cause to complaine, that vertue, experience, good
 "seruices, yea and loyalty, are without esteeme and ill intreated; by reason of the sale of all "Offices and charges within the Realme; which kinde of husbandry or couetousnesse,
 "the forepassed warres of the League, of the publike weale, and of the reformation in "the conduct of affaires haue brought in, and you know the reason. Yet

A Yet let vs proceed in our complaints as our predecessors haue taught vs: let vs present our 1614
 "humble petitions when as we shall haue the honour to be called; whereof the Queene Re"gent hath assured vs, and that they shall be willingly seene and yeelded vnto by the King,
 "her Maiestie, and the Councell, so as they bee modest and reasonable: It is not in vs to "prescribe a reformation, but to craue it, and following this course we cannot erre.

To the People.

G Ood people, I will tell you that no gratifications from their Maiesties haue made A
 "me to write thus vnto the Clergie, the Nobility, and your felues: for as touching my "fortune, Collatus sum in obscuris sicut mortui sepulchri: but as a humble subiect to their Maie-
 "sties, zealous of my Country, and fearing lest it should be hereafter (as we haue seene) the "scorne and pittie of all our neighbours, yea and of Barbarians, hath induced mee to contri"bute to the continuation of peace, as euery good and naturall French man ought to doe:
 "you doe willingly giue eare to all that is spoken of the affaires at this day, and you doe
 "greatly apprehend the alarmes that are giuen you: I assure you there is reason, and I doe
 "aduertise you that you are the most interessed: if you labour not resolutely to quench this
 "fire whilst it kindles, or lies smothered, you shall be first of all set on fire, and if it increa-
 "seth you shall serue (as you haue done heretofore) for matter to make it continue: Con"sider of all inconueniences which may happen, and assure your felues, that both in field
 "C and towne, you shall be the marke whereat the choller and inolenie both of friend and "emie, of French and stranger will aime. Remember that the contempt which you "made of the royal authority, the respects you had to the heads of a faction, who had blind-
 "ed your eyes, and corrupted you by their flatteries and pretexts of Religion, or of the "common weale, and had so prodigiously diuided you, haue furnished matter for all the tra"gedies which haue hapned in France, and in our sight, whereof there yet remaine through "their continuance, and your wilfulnesse, wounds almost incurable; whereof there is some "amendment by the wholsome remedies applied by the deceased King a most excellent "Physician, who hath preserued the life of our Country, and like a good Captaine recoile-
 "red this lost Monarchie, the which by the helpe of God shall bee continued by his Maie-
 "D stie, if you alone continue constantly his most faithful subiects and seruants; and to binde
 "you more strictly therunto, set before your eyes, your miseries past, the infinit toyle,
 "and the dangers, and clemency of Henry the fourth, of whom we may say,

*Quærit Henrico parem?
 Nemo est nisi ipse.*

And that Lewis his sonne, hath neuer done wrong to any of you; who for our happines
 "approacheth neere the age wherein he may doe good to all cause himselfe to be respected,
 "and punish the feditious: in doing this you will soone lay aside Armes, which doe but de-
 "bauche you from your labour, and will frustrate the designs which may bee practised
 "vpon your facility and accustomed insconstancy. There haue bene occasions offered to "E alter the peace, since the lamentable death of that great Prince Henry the fourth, if the "Queene Regent had not courageously and wisely preuented it, which we now enioy by "her care and vigilancy. Be not for your parts so inconsiderate as to lose the fruits; and "renouncing all dissolayall practices, let vs make our felues capable of the peace we now en-
 "ioy, purchased with so much blood: First by our deuout prayers vnto God, that hee
 "would preserue the King, of whom by humane meanes depends the health of vs all; by
 "amendment of our liues, and by an exemplary obedience and fidelity to their Maiesties,
 "to the end that this flourishing Realme be not torne in peeces in our time, and that wee be "not aduersed by our posterity to haue bene the instruments to such lamentable effects, as "may happen by the renewing of troubles: or too negligent wherewith we may reproach
 "F our forefathers, for that they had not rooted it vp in the beginning as you see. There was
 "neuer Regency more free from warres and lesse troubled with theues (which might hin"der the safety of commerce) then this: let vs all assist her Maiestie with heart and affecti"on, to the end the may goe on from good to better.

To the Officers of the Crowne.

Y OU my Lords the Officers of the Crowne and of Iustice, who are the eye, the mouth,
 "and the right hand of our Prince, and the Adresser of the State: Giue good counsell
 "to

to his Maieſty vpon all occurrents which ſhall be offered; looke you faile nor your felues; A cauſe the lawes and ordinances of this Monarchy to be duly obſerued, and by the ſame lawes puniſh all thoſe which ſhall offend, without exception, or acception, for commonly the puniſhment of a wicked and peruerſe man, doth aſſure all good men, and terrifie others.

Commandement to arme
at Paris.

During their Maieſties abſence from Paris, on the 19 of Iuly there was commandement given to all the inhabitants of the City and ſuburbs, to haue their armes in a readineſſe, and to iſſue forth vpon the fiſt warning ſhould be given them; which grew vpon a report that the Prince of Conde ſhould come vnto the City: And as this continued (ſee-ing alſo many arriue daily with horſes and baggage) it made the Magiſtrates of the towne B to giue a freſh commandement that euery one ſhould ſtand vpon his guard.

The Princes
troops diſband
in Poictou.

The King hauing paſt through Orleans, Blois, Tours, and Saumur, and receiued all the honors which could be deuſed by his good ſubiects: coming neere to Chafte-lerrault, the Prince of Condes troops retired themſelues in ſmall companies without armes, ſtaffe, or ſtick, fearing the maieſtie of him whom they had offended in moleſting his good and naturall ſubiects, and namely the Marqueſſe of Bonniuers troops, which elcaped by diuers wayes, hearing of his coming: who without doubt would haue puniſhed them ſeuereſly; conſidering the complaints, teares, and cries of the poore people, which came vnto his Maieſties eares, for the indignities which they had cauſed them to ſuffer, and for the great ſpoiles which they had committed in Poictou, to the great grieſe of the Prince C himſelfe: yet they could not ſo ſpeedily retire themſelues, but that ſome of them were met withall by ſome of the Regiment of the guard, who hauing heard the complaints of the poore people, charged them and chaſed them like theues and robbers as they were.
Neere vnto Chafteſtellerault, they met with a great cart laden with all ſorts of armes which the Marquis of Bonniuer had cauſed to be transported out of Poictou, which cart was ſtayed, and the armes laid into a certaine caſtle in Poictou, belonging to the Duke of Longueville. They alſo found many Magazines in diuers places where armes lay hidden, all which were ſeized vnto the Kings vie, and laid with the reſt, the Regiment of the guards, hauing commandement to diſarm all ſuch as they ſhould find armed to any other deſigne then the Kings ſeruiſe, and to ſeize vpon ſuch as they ſhould find to keepe the D field, to make them giue an account of their intent in bearing armes.

The King
comes to Poictiers.

The King came to Poictiers, where his Maieſtie was much deſired, and where the Inhabitants did yeeld all duties of obedience, and did ſtrive to make it appeare that they were moſt affectionate to his ſeruiſe: The Biſhop and Magiſtrates of the Towne, made relation of the tumults paſt, and gaue him notice of all ſuch as had bene faithfull to him, during the brutes of warre, beſeeching his Maieſtie to take in good part that which had bene done for his ſeruiſe, & to pardon ſuch as had caried themſelues with too much zeale and heat for the defence of the City. The King ſtayed long there, cauſing a new Maior to be choſen, and other officers to the peoples content, and the ſafety of the towne: And during his abode there, he receiued the humble ſubmiſſions of the dukes of Rohan and Sully, E and of the Seigneurs of Parabel and la Boulay, Gouvernors of Nyort and Foutenay: the Duke of Sully teſtifying in the name of all the Prouince of high and baſe Poictou, that his Maieſtie might reſt aſſured that he had none there but good and faithfull ſeruants: That what had paſt was to their great grieſe, and that for his part he had done his beſt endeauour to hinder the ſpoiles made by troops, and the great liberty of ſouldiers, which did moleſt the ſubiects, and annoy the country. The Earle of Rocheſaucault was then made Lieutenant Generall for the King, and Gouvernour of Poictiers.

The Rochellers
ſend the keyes of their towne
vnto the King.

The Maior and Magiſtrates of Rochel ſent certaine Deputies thither, to make offer vnto his Maieſtie both of the keyes of the towne, and of their hearts, affection, and ſeruiſe; F which did ſo content the King and Queene, as thereby they tooke occaſion to hope for a good and durable peace for France: for at their Maieſties preſence in an inſtant, all thoſe troops which the Marquis of Bonniuer had in Poictou, did melt away like ſnow againſt the Sunne.

Death of the Prince of Conde at Paris.

During their Maieſties ſtay at Poictiers, Francis of Bourbon Prince of Conde died at Paris in his Abby of Saint German de Pres: his long ſickeſſe had taken from him all de-ſire to liue any longer, enduring ſuch continuall paines in his body. The princeſſe his wife being abſent from him, was in continuall care for his languiſhing infirmity, ſo as ſhe could not

A not reſt but in feare, ſtill apprehending the houre when ſhe ſhould heare of her husbands death: who dying the third of Auguſt, poſts were preſently ſent to aduertife the Princeſſe his wife, which newes the receiued two dayes after being in her Chamber at Poictiers;
the heavineſſe and melancholy ſhe was in the day before, did preſage this ſiniſter accident, which being confirmed, ſhe lamented the death of this good Prince with many teares and ſighes. Their Maieſties being aduertified thereof were much grieved, and it gaue the houſe of Guife a new occaſion of mourning, to whom they were allied by their ſiſters marriage.

The King hauing pacified all things in Poictou, and ſeized the Country of ſouldiers, there remained nothing but Britanie, where the affaires of the Prouince growing deſpe-rate, required his perſonall preſence, for which effect their Maieſties parted from Poictiers to Angiers. The duke of Vendome hauing ſome intelligence of his approach, he called all his troopes to Port Pelerin, which is betweene Chynon and Ancenis neere to Nantes vpon the riuer of Loire, vpon a pretext of a generall Muſter, whither all his companies (being about 2000 foot) came, and the duke himſelfe arriued ſoone after with ſome troopes of horſe, who ſpeaking to the Commanders & Captaines, he told them he would vſurme and diſmiſſe his troopes, commanding the ſouldiers to deliuer vp their Armes:
giuing to euery one a peece of money: And whereas they cryed out of the ſmall recompence they had for aſſiſting him, and that they were ſorry they were no more employed for his ſeruiſe: he answered them, that he had not taken armes to preuent ſome reuolt C in Britany againſt his perſon, and to force the obedience due vnto him in that Country, and to haue the King ſerued vnder his comandements: and that ſeeing now it pleaſed his Maieſty to come thither in perſon to ſettle all things, and to command as absolute Maſter, there was nor any further need of Armes; that there were no enemies but the enemies of his King, and therefore nothing to be feared where he ſhould be: That he thanked them for their aſſiſtance, and intreated them earneſtly to retire ſpeedily, if they would not bee taken and hanged by the Kings people who approached, the which they did with ſuch haſte as in few dayes all were vaniſhed out of ſight.

The Duke of Vendome diſ-armes at the Kings com-ming into Britany.

Their Maieſties drawing neere to Nantes, the D. of Vendome with all the Nobility he could draw together within the Country, came to meet him, where deliuering his ſword D vnto the King, he craued pardon if any thing had paſt by this occaſion in Britanie, contrary to his Maieſties pleaſure, at which time the King receiued him very gratiouſly, remit-ting all wherewith he might bee charged by reaſon of the leauing of ſouldiers, and the complaints of the Inhabitants of the Prouince, ſaying vnto him, Go and continue in doing me good ſeruiſe, and I will loue you for euer as my brother. Whereupon the King gaue him new letters of reſtaurment, and an abolition of all violences which had been committed in Britanie. After theſe aſſurances and acts of ſubmiſſion giuen vnto the King by the D. of Vendome, their Maieſties came to Nantes, and cauſed an Aſſembly of the Eſtates of Britany to be held there, which he did many times honor with his preſence, and alſo the D.
of Vendome in his behalfe: where they treated of many things concerning the affaires of E the Prouinces. This Conuocation was very profitable and neceſſary for the Country, where the King redreſſed many grieuances, and granted moſt of their petitions.

The Duke goes to meet the King.

The Kings words to Ven-dome.

Before the ſaid Eſtates, the King ſent his regiment to Blauet, with the Swiſſes and the regiment of Rambour, for that it was reported there was ſome reſiſtance in that fort, but they found nothing but obedience, and all things yeelded to the Kings ſeruiſe. It was reſtored to the Marquis of Coeuvre by the commandement which the Duke of Vendome had giuen to him which kept the place: and for that the Inhabitants of the Country complained that the ſaid Fort of Blauet (if there ſhould be any war) might annoy the Prouince and be prejudiciall to the Kings ſubiects keeping them in awe: the King with the aduice of the Queene Regent and the Princes and Lords of his Councell, ordaine that the ſaid Fort F of Blauet with diuers others in that Prouince, ſhould be razed to the ground, for the effecting whereof the Swiſſes ſhould remaine there, with the regiment of Rambour, and 12 ſouldiers out of euery company of the Guards. This done, their Maieſties parted from Nantes hauing ſeized the affaires of Britany, and returned to Paris, to giue order for the holding of the General Eſtates of France being aſſigned there.

The Fort of Blauet razed.

In the meane time the Prince of Conde leaues Chateſteauroux, paſſeth into Poictou and came to Amboiſe, reſolving to returne to Court, forgetting his diſcontentes and the aduice of Poictiers, and giues aſſurance to their Maieſties, that he would be at Paris as ſoone as they.

The King comes to Paris.

The Prince of Conde arrives at Paris.

Funerals of the Prince of Conde.

The solemnity of the Kings Maiority.

they. The duke of Vendosme, after the Kings departure from Nantes, went before to Paris, to be at his wiues lying in, where hee arrived about the 8 of Sept. and stayed there vntill the King made his entry into the City. The King having past by Angers, Mans, Chartres, and other good townes, being received with all the ioy and applause which could be, came about the midlt of September to Paris, where the Citizens received his Maiestie without the suburbs, being about 12000 foot, richly armed, and so hee was conducted to the City, where there were rare deuices at his entry, which for breuities sake I must omit. And about the end of September, the Prince of Conde arrived at Paris being accompanied with about 300 horse, whereof some stayed in the suburbs of St. Germain, and the rest followed him still, he entred by St. James Gate and went towards the Loure to salute their Maiesties: he mourned for the death of his vnckle the Prince of County: the Parisians were full of ioy to see this Prince reconciled to the King, which made them hope it would breed a peace of long continuance. Being vpon the new bridge, he was told the king was gone to Bois de Vincennes to hunt, which made him turne towards S. Antonies gate, where he met the King, who seeing the Prince his cousin, caused his Caroch to stay, and gaue him place by him, being very glad to see him, and so they went on to the Loure, where hauing left his Maiesty, he went to salute the Queene, and then retired to his house. Soone afterwards were the Funerals of the Prince of Conde in the Abbey Church of Saint Germain, with a pompe fit for the quality of his person. At which assisted the said Prince, with many Dukes, Prelates, Noblemen, and great Ladies, with the Courts of Parliament and Accounts, and many others.

During this moneth of September, there was an Assembly of the Pariffians in the Bishops palace, where there assisted many Burgeses and others of good quality, vpon the election of the deputies of the said City, to present the peoples complaints vnto the next Assembly of the generall Estates. The day being come, there was some dispute among the Burgeses, touching the said Election, so as some departed out of the Hall and went their way, but in the end all was pacified and concluded to content, where they made choice of men which were worthy and capable of such places.

Before the Assembly of the generall Estates, it was concluded in Council, by the aduice of the Queen Regent, the Princes of the blood, and of all the other Princes and Noblemen and Officers of the Crowne, to haue the King declared of full age, according to a fundamentall Law made by King Charles the fifth surnamed the Wise, and verified by the Court of Parliament, by the which it was ordained, that the Kings of France hauing attained the full age of thirteene yeares, and entering into the fourteenth, they should take vpon them the souereigne government of the State: whereof they gaue notice to the Court of Parliament that this royal action should be celebrated at the Palace in the golden chamber, where they prepared to receiue their King a Maior, as they had accustomed to doe in the like solemnity. The day for the solemnizing of this act, was appointed on the 2 of Octob. but the day before he caused a declaration to be made in the presence of the dukes and Lords of his Council, for confirmation of the Edicts of pacification, against Duells, combats, and encounters: A prohibition for all his subjects, to enter into any Leagues and Associations both within and without the Realme, and for his Officers and pensioners, to receiue any wages or pension from any one but himselfe, forbidding all swearing and blasphemy, with an intent to haue this Declaration verified the next day in Court, as the first act of his Maiority, he sitting in his seat of Iustice.

The next day all things being prepared at the Palace, and the Regiment of the Guards placed on either side the street from the Loure vnto the Palace: The Lord Chancellor being followed by many Councillors and Masters of Requests, went vnto the Palace, and were receiued by some Councillors in their robes, deputed to that end, who conducted them into the golden Chamber.

Afterward the Queen arrived, being followed by the young Ladies her daughters, Queen Margaret and other Princesses and great Ladies; then the Cardinals of Rochefaucault, Perron, and Bomfi, came to assist at this Ceremony, as Peeres of France, according to the Kings command. About tenne of the clocke, his Maiestie went vnto the Palace, before him there marched his Company of light horse, the Archers of his Guards, and the Swisses then came his Maiestie richly attired, being followed by the Duke of Aniou his brother, the Prince of Conde, the Earle of Soissons, the Dukes of Guise, Elbeuf, Espernon,

A non, Vantadour, and Montbazou, and seven or eight hundred Noblemen and Gentlemen, richly attired. Being come into the Chamber, euery one took his place according to his qualitie and the order prescribed him: being all set, the King who was vnder a rich cloth of Estate, beganne to shew himselfe vnto his Court of Parliament, and to speake these words.

My matters: being by the grace of God come to the age of my Maiority, I thought good to come into this place, to let you vnderstand, that being of capable yeares as I am, I meane to gouerne my Realme by good counsell, with piety and iustice: I attend from all my subjects the respect and obedience which is due vnto the Soueraigne power and Royall authority which God hath giuen me: They must also expect from me the protection and fauour which they may attend from a good King, who about all things affects their good and tranquillity. You shall vnderstand my pleasure more amply by my Chancellor.

His Maiestie hauing thus spoken, the Lord Chancellor made an eloquent Oration vpon the subiect of the Kings maiority, shewing them how much France was bound to thanke God, that during his Maiesties minority it had enjoyed a sweet and happy peace, vnder the glorious and royall command of the Queene his mother, who by her great wisdom had conducted all things to a happy end, during the time of her Regency, of which charge she had so worthily acquitted her selfe, to the Kings honor, her owne glory, and the contentment of his subjects, as France will for euer yeeld her the praises due to her incomparable vertues.

After this, the Queene rising from her seat, and aduancing towards the King, she made a short speech, saying, That she deliuered into his Maiesties hands the reines of his Empire, desiring him, together with the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, to haue for euer in remembrance, the care which she had taken in the administration of the publicke affaires of the Realme. After which, the King did rise from his royall Throne, and marching two or three steps towards the Queene with his cap in his hand, he said: Madam, I thank you for the great paines you haue taken for me; I pray you continue to gouerne and command as you haue done heretofore: I will and meane that you be obeyed in all things, and that in my absence you be the chiefe of my Councell. This being ended, Monsieur de Verduin the first President, made a long and learned Oration touching the maiority of the Kings of France, whereby he gaue much content to that noble assistance. After whom followed Monsieur Seruin, the Kings Aduocate general, whose rare inuention vpon that subiect, rauished that royall Assembly with admiration. These speeches being ended, there followed a Decree of the Kings Maiority, with the aduice of the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, Councillors of State, Prelates, and other persons of qualitie, which were there present, the which was pronounced by the Chancellor: And then the Declaration made the day before in Council (as you haue heard) was verified by the Court, the King sitting in his seat of iustice. After all which, the King returned to the Loure.

Within few dayes after, the Dukes of Neuers, Sully, and Rohan, came to Paris with their ordinary traines, and the Deputies of Prouinces arrived daily, according to his Maiesties Letters sent throughout all the Governments of his Realme, to appeare at the generall Assembly of the Estates, which should be soone after held in the Augustins Conuent. But before we enter into it, we will make mention of a memorable structure or building which was this yeare concluded of.

The King and Queene his mother, continuing the desire which the deceased King had for the beautifying and enriching of his Citie of Paris, and hauing bene aduertised that he held it necessary for the ease of the other bridges, and the beautifying of the City, that there should be a bridge built to passe the riuer of Sein from the Tournelle to Saint Paul, they receiued the propositions of diuers persons which would vndertake the worke vpon certaine conditions. Among all which, finding none more profitable then those of Christopher Marie, a Burgesse of Paris, hauing had the aduice of the Treasurers of France, and of the Prouost of Merchants, and Sherifffes, there passed a contract on the 19 of April this yeare, betwene his Maiesties Commisioners, and the said Marie, vpon diuers Articles: And vpon the 11 of Octob. the King and the Queen his mother laid the first stone of the said Bridge.

By the first Article concluded at Saint Manchould, the Generall Estates were to be held at Sens, and the day was appointed on the tenth of September. But the King and the Queene 1614. Queene his Mother, being forced to goe to Poitiers, and into Britanie, in the months A of July, August, and September, it was deferred vnto the tenth of October following.

The King having performed the first Act of his Maioritic in Parliament, and the greatest part of the Deputies of the three Estates of France, being come to Paris, his Maiestie on the 13 of October caused it to be proclaimed, that his pleasure was, the Assembly of the three Estates should be held at Paris, and not at Sens. And that the Deputies which were arriued, should assemble themselves; the Clergie at the Augustins; The Nobilitie at the Franciscan Friars; and the third Estate at the Towne House. But after their first meeting, the Nobilitie and Commons besought the King (to the end the three Houses might more easily conferre together, to suffer them to hold their assemblies in the two other Halls of the Augustins, that they might be neerer vnto the Clergie, where the three Houses in the beginning sent their Deputies to salute one another according to their usual custome.

The Presidents for the three Orders chosen.

The day of the Overture of the Estates, they made choice of their Presidents. For the Clergie (as Malingre writes) was chosen the Cardinal of Ioyeuse, Deane of the sacred Colledge of Cardinals, Archbishop of Rouen, and Primate of Normandie; Mercurie affirmes, that the Cardinal of Sourdis, Archbishop of Bourdeaux, was elected to that place. For the Nobilitie they made choice of Henry de Beaufremont Baron of Sennecey, Gouernour of the Towne and Castle of Auſonne; and Robert Miron Councillor of State to the King, President of Requests in his Court of Parliament: and the Prouost of Merchants for the Citie of Paris, was chosen President in this Assembly for the Commons. I will not trouble the Reader with the names of the Deputies, nor the places from whence they were sent, being in all about 470. Whilst the Chambers for the three said Orders, were by the Kings commandement making ready, they also prepared Bourbon House, for the King, Queene, Princes of the blood, and other Princes, Lords and Officers of the House and Crowne of France, to receive the Orations, Complaints and Grievances, and to resolve thereon with the aduice of the Lords of his Councell. In the Hall of this house where the King should sit, there were scaffolds built, & none were suffered to enter there during the Kings sitting but such as were qualified.

The beginning
of the assembly of the Estates.

The Estates began the 27 of October, and the Deputies being all in the said Hall, according to their ranks and qualities: the King being in his Royall Throne, assisted by the Queene his Mother, and Monsieur his Brother, by the Princes of the Blood; and other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Cardinals, Prelates, and other Officers of the Crowne; Councillors of State, Secretaries, and Masters of Requests of the Kings House, every one being first according to his degree; His Maiestie beginning to speake, said, That hee had not desired the Conuocation of the General Estates, and an assembly of all the Orders of his Realme, but to reforme the abuses and disorders, which time had bred in all sorts of men: That he would ease his people, as much as possibly hee could, and that his will should be more amply declared vnto them by the mouth of his Chancellor.

The Kings
Speech to the Estates.

The Lord Chancellor making a speech which was much commended and admired by that Royall and noble Assembly. He gave them to vnderstand how much their Maiesties had been grieved for the abuses, disorders, and corruptions which they had found, were crept into all the orders of the Realme. And that now they were much pleased to see so many good men assembled in that place, ready and disposed to take paines to discover vnto him (who is the onely Physician of France vnder God) the miseries and most dangerous maladies of the Estate: That they should expect from his Maiestie all that good which naturall subjects may attend and hope for of a good King, who loues and affects the quiet of his people: wherefore his Maiestie for his part, did attend from them all assistance and fidelitie, who being charged with the complaints and grievances of the people, they should represent them with all libertie; but especially with all purity and equity of conscience, as the charge of their deputation required, being chosen to propound the good and the ease of the people. Whereupon the Deputies of the three Orders, in presence of his Maiestie, and that Noble assembly, made their answers, protesting by their feuerall O-rations (which for breuitie sake I omit) that they would neuer aime at any other end, then the dignity of the Realme, the good and quiet of the Estate, & the ease of the people.

The Deputies labour to abolish the Sale of Offices.

After this assembly at Bourbon House, whereas all the said Deputies tooke a solemne Oath to performe all that did belong vnto their duties and charges: They then began to labour

1614. A labour seriously about their instructions; and the first thing which was resolved by all the three Orders, was the abolition of the sale of Offices of Iudicature, and others which tend to the oppression and ruine of the people: In the beginning there were some of opinion, that the Sale of Offices of Iustice (which they vse in France) was not so preiudiciall & dangerous, as the common fort did beleue, and many reasons and arguments were produced on either side: but notwithstanding haueing been concluded in the end of Nouember by the three Chambers of the Estates, that the Sale of Offices should be abolished, by reason of the vexations of the subiect which grew thereby. The remonstrances haueing bin made at Bourbon House: his Maiesties pleasure was, that the said Sale of Offices shal be extinguished, according to that which was required by the general instructions of the three Orders; so as some new Impositions of money might be laid vpon salt and the Aydes; whereunto the third Estate opposed, saying that then this Sale should be abolished at the poore peoples charge, who should receiue discommoditie without any profit: Whereupon they drew a Petition, which all the chiefs of the Deputies did signe, which was presented vnto the King by Monsieur Philbert Lieutenant General of Bloys in this manner:

Sire: Your most humble and most obedient subjects, the Deputies of the third Estate of France, haueing had an aduertisement of some new leauies, and Imposts, as well vpon the Salt, as the Aydes; wherewith they propound vnto your Maiestie to overcharge this Order, to extinguish the Sale of Offices required by all our instructions; and also to pay the duties of the other orders, contrarie to the accustomed formes; they hold themselves bound by the duties of their places and deputations; to make their humble remonstrances vnto your Maiestie touching this subiect, wherein if they should faile, they should not onely abandon them which rely vpon their trust, and haue committed their interest vnto them; but also violate the faith which all do owe vnto your Maiesties seruice, if they should dissembel the notable prejudice you should receiue therein, by the alteration of the hearts and affection of your people, who without doubt would impatiently beare it (their miseries and calamities being already extreme and lamentable) If they should reape by the assembly of the Estates, thornes in stead of fruit, and ease which hath been so often promised them. Your Maiestie may iudge, if you please, what hope of good there is, if the sale be extinguished at your poore peoples charge, & that they receiue great prejudice, without any present or sensible profit; there being nothing more true then that this order hath no more interest in the abolition then the rest, and yet for one Clergie man or Gentleman which lends to the Garniers for Salt, there are 2000. of the Commons which furnish themselves there, so as they may iustly thinke they are over-charged and oppressed in this assembly, for the benefit and contentment of the other orders, although they may glory, that they haue contributed as much zeale and affection as the others in all occasions for your Maiesties seruice, and the peace & tranquillitie of the Realme. But (Sir) there is a meanes to recompence your casuall Parties, full of Iustice, vpon the demands which the three orders haue commonly made, so as no man shall haue cause to complaine. It is the taking away of excessive pensions, granted to men of all orders, conditions, and qualities, to the great oppression of your People, the wasting of your Treasure, and discontent of many of your Subjects, who thinke themselves lesse bound to your Maiesties seruice, seeing the affection and fidelitie of others, better rewarded then theirs. There are other lawfull meanes of husbandrie and sparing, represented by the general instructions, whereby your Maiestie may draw great summes of money, the which shall not be bathed in the Teares of your poore people, whose Deputies thinke they cannot returne with honour and safety into their Proninces, if they carrie not backe sufficient Testimonie, to witness that the overcharging of this order (which it seems some seek of purpose) hath not hapned by the fault and negligence of the said Deputies. They most humbly beseech you, that as the Kings your Predecessors haue alwaies by their bountie & iustice taken in good part, the remonstrances and complaints of their subiects, yea, and their opposition to the Execution of their Edicts and Declarations obtained by surprize; it would also please your Maiestie to accept of this most humble Petition, with the opposition of the said Deputies: Not to the Execution of your will & pleasure, who haue not yet ordained the said new leauies, but to the reception & allowance of the aduice which is given you, & that vpon the said opposition the ouertures may be rectified, as preiudiciall to your Maiesties seruice, & tending to the oppression of your people: that it may be lawfull for your Deputies

The Prebend
of the Cam-mons.

1614 "to haue their petition entred into your Councell booke, and that they may haue an Act thereof, to serue them as a discharge and iustificatiō, not onely with the Townes & communitie which haue sent them, but also with your Maiestie, who shall find by the euents, that you haue not in this Assembly, nor euer shall haue more faithfull seruants and subiects, then those who haue caried their causes courageously, for the preferuatiō of your honored person and authority) endeavour to continue the hearts and love of your people, who will continually pray for your Maiesties greauesse and prosperitie.

His Maiestie hauing heard their petition, made answer in these words. I will ease my people as much as possibly I may: I haue vnderstood you well, and will conferre with the Queene my mother and Councell, Whereupon the Queene said vnto the Deputies, that they were much incommoded, might take their charges, and retire themselves. Presently after in fauour of the said petition, the King made a declaration for the ease of his people. This Petition was presented at the conclusion of the Estates.

A Combat of two souldiers.

Whilst they were labouring in the generall Estates for the good of France, the Duels were reuiued, not onely among Noblemen and Gentlemen, but also among priuate souldiers and others, so as in this month of Nouember, two yonger brethren of the regiment of the guards, hauing had some dispute in their Corps de guard; they went presently to the field to decide their quarrel by the sword, who being not releued soone enough by some of their fellow souldiers which followed them, the one of them was slain by his companion; which being done in the iurisdiction of the Abbey of Saint Germain de Pres, the Bayliffe of the said place came thither with his Sergeants, and tooke vp the dead body and wrested him, that had slaine his fellow out of the hands of certaine souldiers, carying both him and the dead body vnto prison.

The Duke of Espernon hearing hereof, and that the two souldiers had not bene deliuered to the Prouost of the Guards as to their ordinary Iudge, hee resolved the next day to cause him to be deliuered into his hands; giuing charge to the Marquis of Luallette his sonne, to take the two companies (which should that day goe out of Guard) and to march to the suburbs of Saint Germaine, and make them deliuer the prisoner and the dead body willingly or by force. Being there, they went to the Bailiffes lodging, who being absent, they commanded the Taylor to deliuer them; but he refusing it, they forced the prison and tooke them away, carying them to the suburbs of Saint Marcell. At the same instant the Bailiffe of Saint Germaine went to the Court of Parliament, to complaine of the affront which had bene done him by the Duke of Espernon, saying they had forced his prison, and therefore he required iustice.

The Duke of Espernon being informed that the Court of Parliament would take notice of this businesse, hee came in the afternoone accompanied with many Noblemen to the Palace, to giue an account vnto the Court of that which had past. Being entered into the great Hall, there were some insolencies committed by the Gentlemen of the Dukes traine, the which hauing much troubled the Parliament, considering the reuerence and respect which is due vnto that place: The Court meant to take information thereof, and to lay the fault vpon the Duke of Espernon: being ready to informe against him, aswell for that which concerned the fact committed in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, as for the insolencies done in the Palace. To pacifie all this, the Duke of Espernon had recourse vnto the King, and obtained of his Maiesty a letter vnder his signet, directed to the Parliament, by the which they were enioyned to surcease for two daies, aswell for that which had bene done in the suburbs, as in the Palace. The letters were brought into the Court by Monf: de Pralin, the 24 of Nouember, whereunto obeying, it was ordained that day in Parliament, That the Court (hauing receiued the Kings letter of Signet, brought by the said Monf: de Pralin, obeying his Maiesty) had decreed to surcease for two daies to determine of that which had past in the suburbs of Saint Germain, and of the rest which followed; and they humbly besought his Maiesty to consider that they could not doe iustice to priuate persons, if it were not done to them for a contempt committed against his Maiesties authority.

The Saturday following being the 29 of Nouember, the Duke of Espernon came to the Parliament with the Duke of Ventadour, being sent expressly by his Maiesty to assist the said Duke, who informed the Court, that the King was very well pleased with that which had bene done in this action: That he thanked the company, and would thanke them

A them more when the Court should depute any to goe to his Maiestie: That the Court had bound him vnto them, (if Subjects may binde their Prince) and that the Duke of Espernon should come presently to make his excuse and reparations: that in regard of the place which is due vnto him, the King for certaine considerations thought it good, that he should haue the place of Duke and Peere.

The Duke of Espernon said: My Masters, I did not thinke my actions should haue bene mis-construed, hauing so long serued Kings, especially hauing had the honour to be thirtie yeares of this bodie, which is the greatest and most illustrious of the Realme: I came the day after, that which had past in the Suburbs of Saint Germain, to satisfie this companie, which I found not assembled, so as I could not effect my designe: And since I haue endeouored to come twice, and would haue come sooner, if I had not thought the companie would haue taken it in ill part. I most humbly beseech it to beleeue, that knowing the honour and respect which I owe it, being of my age, and growne gray in the seruice of Kings, that I would now haue any other intent: You know that after that calamitie which hapned, that seemed to threaten France, I alone of my qualitie came to offer my seruice to this companie. As for the two last actions, the first I leaue to the Kings Censure: And for the second, if you haue conceiued any bad opinion, I humbly beseech you to forget it. And if any one findes my stile somewhat rude for the delicate eares of the companie, I humbly intreat you to excuse a poore Captaine of Footmen, who hath alwayes endeouored rather to doe well, then to speake eloquently, and to beleeue that to maintaine the honour of this companie, I would employ my blood and life.

Whereupon the first President said vnto him: seeing it hath pleased the King to impart his grace and fauour vnto you, vsing his mildnesse and Clemencie like vnto his Predecessors, hauing commanded this Companie, as well by his Letters, as his owne mouth, to reueile your excuses and satisfactions. The Court censuring fauorably of the actions of an Officer of the Crowne, Duke and Peere of France, of the Age, Qualitie, Valour, and Merits that you are: Touching that which hath past in the Suburbs of S. Germaine, and at the Palace, hath receiued and willingly allowed (by the Kings expresse commandement) of your satisfaction, and will alwaies be mindfull of your seruices, hoping that hauing done seruice to the King, you and your posteritie will hereafter yeeld the same as you ought to Iustice and the Lawes: And the Court doth forget for this respect whatsoever hath past of importance, that may concerne you: And by the same Decree it was ordained that the Prisoner should be sent backe to the Prison of S. Germaine, which was done: where hee continued long; but in the end at the suite of the Duchesse of Vantadour, hee escaped, not without great difficultie.

The Ecclesiasticall Order, vpon the report of so many Duels made in the face of the Loure, and of the Estates, resolved to make their complaint vnto the King by their Deputies, to the end there might be an exact obseruation of the Edicts made against them. The Charge whereof was giuen to the Bishop of Montpellier, who hauing audience of their Maiesties, deliuered this Speech: The Prelates and Clergie your most humble Subjects, assembled in this Towne by your authority, come to complaine of the publike scandall of Duels, which doe miserably blemish the honour of your Realme, doubting not but this mischief doth touch the hearts of the other Orders, or rather that France mourning, laments the losse of her worthiest children. But these complaints doe more properly belong to the lips of the Clergie; who seeing that whilst the French powre forth their most generous blood in quarrels, the soules committed to their charge goe downe to Hell: And that they haue not bene so dearely redeemed by the blood of the Innocent, to be so fatally spilt in Duels with the guiltie. We know well that this fury is inspired by him who is called in holy Scripture a Murderer from the beginning, who maliciously makes the Image of Honour to shine in these barbarous actions, vpon which the French Nobilitie do naturally commit Idolatrie, to raise it to credit, as he doth vpon Altars polluted with murder and blood, to recuite in sacrifice their bodies and soules.

Many things are cursed and to be lamented in this prejudiciall action to France, shame, ill to Nature, contrary to God, and doth dangerously charge your Maiesties conscience, First of all, France is wonderfully weakened by this excelsse, and as the great losse of blood quencheth the vigour of the bodie, makes the visage pale, and the functions of Nature slow and languishing: so Duels which spilt so much Noble blood, weaken it

1614. this Estate, deface the lively colours of her face and beauty : and this weaknesse may A „ give great advantages to our enemies. To say that this action is an exercise of Valour, „ which may fortifie it in making of Souldiers, or that the reparation of an iniurie cannot „ be done but by Armes, without a blemish to him that is wronged ; it doth contradiēt the „ iudgement of Henry the Great your Father, whose memorie shall bee blessed in all Ages, „ who by his Armes and infinite Victories had purchased the title of the true Iudge and so-„ ueraigne Arbitrator of Honour, who by his Sacred Edicts, declared those actions contra-„ rie to true Honour, whereof he detested the use, as a Brutish fury. In truth the action is „ neither glorious, nor worthy of Honour, which the violence of a passion may draw from „ the most fearefull. All France is equally generous, seeing wee see no man refuse the B „ Combat : We cannot say that it is an infallible mark of Honour, being so common to „ all. But as Metals have some things which resemble them ; so vertues haue vices which „ counterfeit them. The vertue of Valour being properly a setled temper of a iudicious „ spirit, alwaies equall and vniforme, which takes time to look into dangers without trem-„ bation, and contemnes them, or surmounts them by some designe worthy of commenda„ tion, the which shall neuer belong to the blind and vncertaine actions of Duels, which we „ may call a transport of fury. Wee cannot thinke of the fearefull accidents which accom„ pany this madnesse, and not deest it ; neither can wee speake of seconds without trem„ bling, and curse the time wherein they are borne, seeing it makes vs see so many Mon„ sters. No friendship hereafter can be so safe and holy among the French, (which vertue C „ vnitheth and bindeth with an honorable cymment) but before they are aware, they shall „ finde themselves engaged in this mischief : for being inuited by the principals of the „ quarrell, the one on the one side, the other on the other, the friend must kill his friend who „ hath neuer offended him. It serues to no purpose to bee modest in words, temperate in „ actions, courteous to all men, faithfull to his Prince, and exceeding vertuous, if freeing „ himselfe from the subiect of all quarrells, he must haue a share in other mens. I would here
 „ be silent, to heare Nature speake, who complains that the French confound the condition „ of Friends, with that of Enemies, and breake the sacred bond of friendship, and humane „ societie, which the most barbarous Nations honour with some religious respect. But it is „ not Nature alone which complains, Heauen also thunders ouer our heads : And we that D „ are especially ordained to expound his Word, denounce vnto your Maiestie his wrath, by „ reason of this crime, which continueth before your face, before that of all the Orders of „ your Estate, and in the sight of heauen and earth.

„ The blood which was found in all the Cisternes of Egypt, into which the Waters of „ Nilus were changed, was not only the first of the ten plagues wherewith the Realme was „ afflicted, but a presage of the subsequence. And we feare that this blood spilt in so many „ parts of France, which pollutes most of the Noble Families, with murders and punish„ ments, will not onely bee a dangerous wound vnto your Estate, but also a fearefull „ threat of the heauens bloodie rods. Pithagoras drew certaine Letters and Characters „ vpon a Looking-Glasse with humane blood, the which appeared presently in the bodie E
 „ of the Moone. It is more certaine that what swords write here below with blood pow-
 „ derd out in Duels, appears in heauen, which growes red with wrath, and will doublelesse „ reuenge this barbarisme. If your Maiestie, assisted with the Councell of the Queene your „ Mother, of incomparable wisdom and pietie, doe not prevent this mischief by some „ substantiall remedie worthy of the most Christian King and eldest sonne of the Church.
 „ It doth much offend God, to see his workes defaced which haue cost so deare, and the „ soules to be carried away, for the which he hath made such tryals of his power, & shewed
 „ so many miracles of his loue : And it grieues him to see them lost with the blood of men :
 „ and the rather, for that in his being shed, he hath first consecrated the diuine mysteries of „ our life and glorie.

„ All these complaints are not onely addressed vnto the eares, but also vnto the conscience
 „ of your Maiestie, whom God hath here established to command, hee is a free and „ liberrall dispenser of his graces, but he requires a strict account. You are seated in your Fa„ thers Throne, but he that giues Kingdomes, doth make you answerable (with those „ which assist you) for the good of your Subjects. We doubt not of your Maiesties holy in„ tentions, nor of the Queene your Mothers : but wee should betray our places, if in the „ midst of so many disorders vnworthy of men, of French men, and of Christians, wee „ should

A should hold our peace. They haue not onely past all bounds of feare, but of shame like :
 „ wife. They make a triumphant shew hereof both about, and within this Citie of Pa„ ris, in view of the Louure, with a shew of warrantie, and they seeme to bee lawful for „ that they are become publique.

I beseech your Maiestie consider of how many euils you make your selfe guiltie, al„ though that your age seemes to fauour your innocencie. The people haue not only trans„ ferred their common rights into their Kings person ; but also their publique faults, when „ they are dissembled or suffered. Wherefore God who doth often reuenge the Princes ini-„ quities vpon the Subjects ; so doth hee sometime punish the Prince for the crimes of his „ Realme. I beseech you thinke that you are borne to saue the people made subiect to the S„ bedience of your Scepter, even when as they seeke to lose themselves ; if you abandon „ them, and France be gored in her owne blood, shee will soone be abominable before „ God, and be visited in his wrath. Showers of blood haue prefiged horrible calamities „ where they haue fallne, we must apprehend the like during your raigne, if your Maiestie do „ not cause these abominable Duels to cease, which produce streames of blood. I beseech
 „ you represent vnto your selfe the Soule of Henry the Great your Father, who beholds „ these disorders from the highest heauens : for if any thing would trouble the rest of the „ blessed, without doubt this furie would alter his felicitie. God gaue vs him as a Iasper „ Stone, to stanch the blood which flowed from Ciuill Warres, and seeing that Duels drew „ C it in a full peace from this bodie to weaken it. He made rigorous Edicts, to prevent this „ mischief, and confirmed it by the ceremonie of a solenne vow. What can his thoughts
 „ be, seeing France which he hath saued and crowned with his victories, to become madde „ against it selfe, deuouring her owne children ? wee must beleue that they displease you,
 „ and then which assist you with counsell : but you must make it knowne to all France, that „ this crime is not onely condemned in the Louure, but contemned, setting honour at liber-„ tie which remains captiue in the Center of this brutish passion. Honour, which is the „ recompence of vertue, is by this meanes become the portion of barbarisme : I beseech „ your Maiestie arme your Arme which is your Iustice, with the rigor of Ordinances both „ Diuine and Humane, to the end this Monster may be encountred both from heauen and „ D earth : If your Subjects herein violate your Edicts, doe not you violate them : if they for„ get your restraints, remember the punishments ; for in these desperate diseases, it is an „ extreme cruelty to be pitifull.

The Prelates and others of the Clergie (preft by their duties) could not be silent, but it „ makes them to complaine against this scandall, which loseth so many soules, and drawes „ vpon our heads the wrath of God. And for the discharge of their consciences, they desire „ that it may be written in the eternall memorie of France, that hauing foreseene a dange„ rous tempest approaching, they haue giuen warning vnto the people : and seeing God „ greatly offended, they haue made it knowne vnto your Maiestie. They beseech you to „ looke vpon this France weeping, which stretcheth out her armes vnto you, and coniuers
 „ E it to prepare some speedie antidote against this poison of Duels, which doth suffocate
 „ it : So many subjects as your Maiestie shall saue by these remedies, so many immortal „ crownes will the set vpon your head. It will bring peace to Families, assurance to peace, „ force to France, consolation to the Church, and soules to God, which will prolong
 „ and blesse your daies, making your raigne to flourish, equall to your zeale and royall „ pietie.

The King and Queene heard this Prelates speech with great attention ; to whom the „ Chancellor made answer, that their Maiesties were very desirous to employ all kinds of „ remedies to prevent the disorders which they saw in Duels, and that they would take in „ F good part all aduice should be giuen them vpon this subiect ; That besides the deceased „ Kings Edicts which were very strid ; his Maiestie had made another in the yeare 1613 ;
 „ (the which he deliuered vnto the Bishop saying, let your Order see it, that they may adde „ whatsoeuer they shall thinke necessarie, and giue their aduice thereon, the which their Ma„ iestie will alwaies take in good part. After which the Clergie drew certain Articles touch„ ing that subiect, and presented them vnto the King.

The General Estates laboured about their grieuances, and about the fiftieth of De„ cember, there was one Article which caused a great distraction, betwixt the Clergie and „ the House of Commons, touching the safety and souerainity of their Kings. The Ar„ ticle was, That the safety of Kings

stance of this Article, concluded by the Commons being their first, was : That it should be declared by the said Estates, and set down as a fundamentall Law; That the King did not hold his Realme of any but of God & his sword, and that he is not subiect to any superior power vpon Earth for his temporall Estates ; and that no booke should bee printed containing any doctrine against the Person of Kings, touching the question too much debated in these times, by men put vp with presumption and rashnesse, who make questions whether it be lawfull to kill Kings : which question shall be forbidden to propound, dispute, or write of. And if hereafter there bee any bookes found like vnto those which haue bin condemned by the Court of Parliament, the said bookes shall bee publicly burnt in destruction of such Writings, which may draw weake spirits to the like attempts, the sole approbation whereof is full of horror. And to prevent such damnable propositions, the whole order with the Author thereof should be punished and banished the Realme without hope of returne.

The Clergie being aduertised of this Article on the twentieth of December, and that it had past the House of Commons, without any contradiction, they conceived that the Commons had put their Sickle into their Haruest; that it was a case of conscience, which concerns faith and Religion; and that it was propounded by some persons that were desirous of innovations, and were not well grounded in the faith; whereupon they desired to haue that Article withdrawn, the which some which were of greatest credit amongst them undertooke, and to that end they sent the Archbishop of Aix, who came the same day to the House of Commons, and made a learned speech to this effect.

My Masters, although that we all tend to the publique good, yet these three Orders haue some particular ends, and we must not thinke it strange if they haue diuers apprehensions; for that their professions differ: but this difference should end in a good Harmonie, and come vnto the Kings cares in a pleasing tune. If there bee in the Articles of the Clergie any particularities concerning Iustice and the Treasure, it is not fit they should be concluded before they are imparted vnto you. And in like manner if in your Articles there be any propositions found which concerne the Church, it were requisite you should communicate them vnto vs. Truth is waunting, and Truth which was the Sonne of God, had need of the support of men: That hee being the Sonne of God did rely vpon the Church, and the Church vpon him, Iuxta super dilectum suum. If the Son of God would make choise of this support, it is fit that private men should be tyed to the same Church, that they should bring all their Vowes vnto it, and depend immediately vpon it. You shall therefore communicate that vnto vs which you treat of concerning the Church. I inuite you vnto it, being not lawfull to remoue the Altars, nor to touch the foundation of the Church without vs. We are of the same Countrey and the same blood, and inclined to the same ends, Pietas ad omnia, and this Pietie should be so deare vnto vs, as we should not seeke to deform this Ecclesiasticall bodie, lest wee make the Holy Ghost (who is the Author of peace) sad. The Proposition which I make vnto you is generall; some few daies since, there was an Article presented vnto vs, which we haue reiected, for that it did not concerne vs: In like manner, if there be any Article among you which doth belong to vs, you ought to impart it.

After complements and thanks giuen; the President Miron made answer, that they vnderstood him not, and that they could not satisfie his proposition vntlesse hee did explain himselfe more particularly. The same day it was resolved in the House, that the Clergie should be giuen to vnderstand, that the Commons had inserted nothing in their Articles concerning the Doctrine of the Church, and that if it had been so, they would haue acquainted them therewith: That touching the policie of the Church there had bin something treated of, and set downe in their Articles, and that it had been concluded not to communicate it vnto them, to auoid tediousnesse, to the which the King would make answer at his pleasure.

For the carrying of which message vnto the Clergie, there were certaine Deputies chosen, and Monsieur de Marmiesse an Aduocate of the Parliament of Thoulouse was appointed to deliuer the Speech: who comming to the Clergie on the 22. of December, hauing made a learned Speech, he concluded, saying, That the King hauing called the three Estates of the Realme, had married the three Orders together, to bring forth felicity and happinesse to France. Discord falling among vs, hath sought in the beginning to stirre vp

A emulation, and enuies, and to diuine (by the difference of the qualities of the three Orders) those which were vnited by loue to labour for the common-weale. You know that three small words spoken in the Chamber of the Nobilitie by the Deputies of our order, hath heretofore alienated their hearts and affections from vs, and buffed all the three Chambers about a dispute of qualities, as much vnprofitable as prejudiciall to the State; and you know what difficultie you had to reconcile those two Orders. Wee must therefore auoid all occasions to fall into like disputes, be it with the Nobilitie, or with you; the which cannot bee auoided, if all the Articles bee communicated vnto the three Chambers. It is not for any desire we haue to infer into ours, any thing that shall bee bitter, or offensive: contrariwise we will exactly weigh the least words, to the end there may be nothing which may giue you iust occasion of offence. The dignitie of your Order, which exalts you above all others; the Characters imprinted by the hand of God vpon your sacred heads, which makes you to be reuerenced of all; and the ranke which the Prerogative of your Places, and the Dignitie of your Charges doe worthily giue you in France, commands our respect and honour towards you. If we finde in our consciences, and by the charge which we haue, that we are bound to require some reformation in your order, and not to speake against in particular: we will doe as Plutarch saith they did in old time, which would demolish the Houses which were neere vnto their Temples: they suffered those parts to stand which were next adioyning, lest they should touch any thing which was Sacred: Or as the Eagle, who taking vp Ganimede, by the commandement of Iupiter, touched nothing but his cloathes, lest hee should hurt this well beloued of the gods. Wee in like sort will vse so much discretion in the drawing of our Articles, which shall concerne this first and sacred order of the Church, as wee will neither wound the Church, nor her Ministers. We will onely touch the Robes and exterior actions of those who blemishing the beauty of this venerable body, may cause (with too much scandall) a shame vnto Religion, and a hearts grieft to all good French men, who desire to see their Church in his Puritie, Honors, Prerogatiues, and Authoritie: And vpon this assurance we beseech you to allow of our resolution, to the which we haue not brought any thing but a pure and sincere affection.

The day following, the Bishop of Montpellier came to the House of Commons, and required communication of the said Article; and hauing made an eloquent discourse vpon that subiect, in the end he demanded why that order did not impart this proposition vnto them, and that they could not refuse the communication of the Article, to the end that all together might make one, the which should be set in letters of gold vpon the Front of their Remonstrances. But they must not mingle it with other propositions which are in question betwene France and her neighbours. That there were two powers, the one Temporall, the other Spirituall; that they sought to confound them, when as the one was deriued from the other. That both these authorities had but one Fountaine. That their orders should labour to entertaine concord, and reconcile these two powers, and doe as the Ancients did, who puled the Gaule out of the beasts which they sacrificed. That resolving vpon this businesse they should free their hearts from all thoughts of iealousie and emulation, and with writings full of mildnesse and peace, conspire ioyntly for the publique good; not onely looking to that which is before their eyes, but (extending their thoughts further) consider of the consequence of many things, which in the beginning seeme plausible, and yet in the end will proue hurtfull. That this Article (as it was drawne) would cause a Schisme, and it may be, kindle a warre not onely in France, but throughout all Christendome. So it would be a rending of that Vesture without seame, which is so carefully to be kept whole. That this order ought not to be caried away with the first persuasions. That his purpose was not to plucke vp at once, that which was feared. That this order had not power to doe it, for that a melancholy spirit could not be so fild, if he were not inuited by the Author of the Church. That they must not thinke their order was able to hinder this pernicious designe, and that they must hope for the end from them. That they must referre affaires of so great importance concerning the life and preservation of the King vnto vs.

The Commons hauing resolved to communicate the Article vnto the Clergie, the Seigneur de Marmiesse was presently sent with some other Deputies, to execute this resolution; who presenting the Article vnto the Clergie, made this speech: My Masters,

The Bishop of Montpellier demands communication of the Article.

Marmiesse
Speech to the

we shall seeke in vaine to preferre our priuate fortunes, if we suffer the publike to be lost, A feeling the danger of priuate men cannot be auoided, but by the safety of the Generall. But with lesse reason shall we endeavour for the safety of the State, if we be not careful to preferre the sacred Maiestie of Kings, which are the soule of States. There must bee so strict a bond from the particular to the Generall; and from the Generall to the King, as the vnion may be made in his sacred Person; and that the other parties being tyed vnto it by the bond of respect and obedience, may maintaine and preferre themselves in their being. The happinesse of the Realme, and the fortunes of priuate men, are so vnited to the fortune of Kings, and God (of whom Monarchies are the handy-workes) hath so feared them, as no harme can come vnto them, but it drawes with it the losse of our Houses, and B the ruine and subuersion of the State; whereof we haue too many lamentable and vnfortunate examples.

The Deputies of the third estate (terrified with the remembrance of what is past, and fearing greater dangers which threaten them, if these parricides be not restrained, if they be not contained in the dutie of respect and reuerence due to Kings, these sicke spirits, who (pre-occupied by false opinions, and troubled with vaine Illusions) seeke in the death of our Kings, Hell for themselves, and miserie for France) haue drawne an Article, the execution whereof (warranting the life of our Princes, from the snares which they lay for them) will maintaine (as they thinke) peace within the Realme.

We haue not acquainted you heretofore with this Article, no more then with the rest C which we haue concluded, for the priuate reasons which I deliuered vnto you some daies past. But seeing you desire to see it, and that you haue summoned vs thereunto by the Bishop of Montpellier, we come to tell you, that as the wallies of Iericho fell at the sound of the Priests Trumpets, so we bow vnder the voice of that Reuerend and learned Prelate; and being vrged by his eloquent words, contrarie to our first resolutions, we offer vnto you the communication of this Article, whereof we bring you a Copy.

We will not discourse vnto you on the subiect thereof, our Company hath forbidden vs, concealing that in so important a businesse, in so reasonable an action, and so profitable for the general good of France, you will bee as well disposed to receive and fauour our holy & commendable intentions, as we to discourse vnto you of the occasions which D moued vs to draw this Article, and the reasons we haue to maintaine it. We will onely say vnto you, that in deliuering this Abstract, we would imitate a ceremonie obserued by the Ancients in their sacrifices. They were accustomed to cast the tongues of the Beasts sacrificed to their gods, into a purifying and no consuming fire: euen so wee as Deputies bring our vovues into this general assembly for the good of France, that in dedicating our selues to the seruice of the Publike, we haue consecrated vnto it both our hearts & tongues in giuing you this Article. Let vs cast the tongues which haue dedicated it into the Fire of this Deuotion; of this Charitie; of this ardent affection, which you haue for the good, glory, and peace of this Estate.

The affection then which you beare vnto the preseruacion of Kings, shall serue as a fire, E not to consume, but to purifie these tongues. Nor to abrogate, (for you haue already promised by the mouth of the said Bishop that it was not your intention:) but to polish this Article; to the end that as gold cast into the fire, (although it loseth his forme, yett his substance) shewes more beautifull, more rich, and more polished then it was before: euen so this Article coming out of your hands, without any change or alteration in the substance, would carry a command of greater authority, by reason of your adiunction, stronger imprecations, and severer punishments, then those we haue set down, to contraine euery man in his dutie. This is all we haue to say vnto you in the behalfe of our assembly, who attend your resolution touching this subiect.

In the beginning of the yeare the controversie reuiued, touching the Soueraignty of the Kings of France which had continued aboue three weekes of the last yeare. On the second of Ianuary the Cardinal of Perron was deputed by the Clergie to the House of Commons, touching the subiect of their first Article, being accompanied by many Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, and about 60. Gentlemen of the Chamber of the Nobilitie which were sent to assist them. Being carried into their Chamber, by reason of his indisposition. He began to speake in the praise of Iustice, and the government of the Church, concluding in the end that they should continue vnited together for that which concerned

A need the safety of the Kings life. And as for that which concerned the doctrine of the Church, the Article should be wholly referred to the discretion of the Church, and in so doing that the third estate would rest contented, that this Article should bee taken out of their instructions.

Whereunto President Miron made answer, concluding after this manner. I will assure you that this company neither hath, or euer will haue any intention to wound the Church in the resolution of this Article, the which they cannot retract; neither yet to touch the holy Sea, nor enter into dispute, touching the power of our Holy Father the Pope; that he hath all soueraignie but in spiritual things onely, and therefore out of our knowledge and iurisdiction: And if his authority and obedience, which we acknowledge B all Christians owe him in spiritual things (not excepting Kings) were lost or called in question, it should be found as well fortified among vs, as in any one order. For here resides the body of the Officers, and Soueraigne companies, alwayes found in faith: the which hath contributed much to the maintaining of the Church, as we will alwayes doe; But wee will haue a care to bring in this mixture of power, whipter by such as yme at nothing else but to diuide vs, and thereby to disperse vs, and in the end ruine the one by the other, whereof we haue but too many examples, whose wounds bleed yet among our neighbours. The intention of this Company hath bene to maintaine the Independancy of our Kings Crowne, which cannot be iustly taken from him by any power. That C his Holinesse hath not this power; That the Church hath neuer pretended it: that those which write the contrary, may bee punished as guilty of high Treason, by the secular Iudge: intending not to make an Ecclesiastical Law of this proposition, as appertaining not thereto, but a rule of Policy, which obligeth all the subiects of his Maiestie of what profession so euer. Yet notwithstanding if there be any words in our Article, which may giue you occasion to suspect, that wee goe about to meddle with the iurisdiction of the Church; We declare that these words which seeme to containe this reproach, haue not bene inserted, to assume vnto vs the power by our owne autoritie, to declare it damnable, or contrarie vnto Gods Word; but by relation onely. As a Father which instructs his children in that which he learned in a Sermon, cannot be accused to haue put himselfe D into the Pulpit, or to take vpon him the Ministers authority: So when wee declare that to bee damnable, and contrarie to Gods Word, the which is contrarie to our Proposition; wee viter that which wee haue learned in the Decrees, Canons, and Statutes, which wee haue had from your selues, and which wee hold of the Church, to be held and kept by vs. When either of vs shall transgresse any of them, we abuse them, and from hence comes our appellations as of abuse, because it is abuse when a man transgresseth that which hee hath submitted himselfe vnto. It is not then by way of enterprize, nor by a presumed power that wee doe this, but by obedience vnto the same Decrees, Canons, and Ecclesiastical constitutions, and by the executive and not ordinarie power of them. Wee constrain that to be obserued, which was established by your selues, betweene you and vs.

E Our Article is not any more then a repetition of the same: and being good as the company resolved to leaue it in their instructions, what inconuenience is there to speake it; and if there be none, what danger is there for all of vs to sweare and assume it? and yett the substance of the Article remaining, if there be any words which trouble you, setting downe in writing what you require of vs, I thinke wee shall agree together, without altering any thing of the subiect of the Article, and the company will all strive to giue you contentment with the same, still obedience which they haue vnto the beginning of this Assembly, and the which they will alwayes ioyne vnto the respect, honour, and seruice, which they haue made, and doe againe make profession to yield vnto you.

F Vnto this the Cardinal replied, that the Clergies intention was not to accuse any of that company or others of blander. In the end he gaue thanks vnto the President, and the third Estate in general; concluding that it did not belong vnto them to interpret, but to solve and conclude, in the like cases of doubtful questions when they are offered. That was incident vnto the Clergie, who are the Iudges to determine them.

The same day the Court of Parliament being informed by the Kings Council, that many persons tooke libertie to call in question, and to dispute of the Soueraignty of Kings, and to hold those Maximes disprouable, as if they were subiect to some periculous the Court of Parliament, touching the safety of King.

perious power, and that they might attempt against their Sacred Persons, whetby here A might grow great inconveniences, the prevention whereof was very necessary. They required that all former Edicts vpon that subject might be renued. Whereupon the Court, (all the Chambers being assembled) ordained that the Decrees made in the year 1561, and in the year 1594 and 95; and likewise in the year 1610, and 1614; should be kept and observed according to their forme and tenour: forbidding all men of what condition so euer, to infringe them, vpon the paines contained in the same.

This Decree did much trouble the Clergie, as if they had attempted against their spiritual, and Ecclesiastical power, vpon a consideration fought out of policy. Whereupon they resolu'd that the Cardinall of Sourdis, assisted by some Cardinals, Arch- Bishops, Bishops, and other of the Clergie, should goe presently and make complaint to the King; for that the Parliament would limit and restraine the liberty of the States and meddle with affaires which were treated of by them; humbly beseeching his Maiestie to stay the course of the said propositions and Decrees. Which being done, the Cardinall du Perron taking vpon him to speake concerning the said Article and Decree, fought to perswade his Maiestie, that it did import his good and that of the State, to haue this businesse no more talked of, and that all might be suppressed and disallowed without any farther question of any matter therein contained. The next day the King being in Councell to aduise how to suppress these differences, the Prince of Conde said.

Sir, I thinke the businesse here present, is one of the most important that hath bene argued in your Councell these hundred years, and worthy of your presence. There is question of two points of most great consequence; the one hath respect vnto Gods honour, the establishment of the Catholique, Apostolique, and Romane Church: the other, the safety and preservation of your estates.

Certainly, Sir, your Maiestie may rightly terme your selfe the greatest King in the world, who hold your Crowne but of God alone, before whom the more powerful you are; the more you should be humble, being subiect to the Pope who is head of the Church in spiritual things. But in that which concerns your temporal, the subiection of your Subjects; the obedience which is due vnto you; and the D sacred respect which they must yeeld to the preservation of the Lords Anointed; the spiritual power hath no command. That although you were an Heretike or an Infidel, yet they owe you obedience in that which is merely temporal. So making a long discourse vpon the Ordinances which had bene made against the Popes enterprises, vpon the authoritie of the Kings of France; in the end he concludes, saying, Sir, these reasons make me to admire the wisdom of your Parliament: who by the Testimony they give you of their fidelity, binde you for euer and all France, to esteeme them faithfully, courageous, and incorruptible Magistrates, who are the true preservers of holy Decrees; and from whom there proceeds nothing but Oracles of infallible truth. Magistrates who make you to be reuerenced, seeing that your person alone in France, is exempt from their iurisdiction. I speake onely for the Kings interest, for I hope hee shall liue many ages, and Monsieur his brother in like manner, so as by a multitude of children we shall see our selves assured of a settled peace. Yet seeing that rough cures were neuer good; I am of opinion to forbid any further dispute of this question, in regard of the Clergie, and the said Estate, and to referre it to your selfe, leaving them to draw their Articles as they please; and whereas your Maiestie shall answer the remonstrances, we shall then see by your wisdom, our ancient Maxims confirmed. And for that the Clergie and the Nobilitie are conceited that the Decree of the Parliament doth prejudice their libertie, I hold it fit your Maiestie should forbid the signing and publication thereof.

A Decree in Councell concerning the Article of the King's Ma-
iestie.

Whereupon there was some after a Decree made in Councell, whereof the effect was, That the King having heard of the differences which had hapned in the Assembly of the three orders of the Estates of his Realme touching an Article propounded by the house of Commons, & a Decree made by the Court of Parliament vpon that subject, having heard the remonstrances of the Deputies of the Clergie & Nobility, His Maiestie being in Councell, assisted by the Queen his Mother, the Princes of the blood, and other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crowne, & others of his counsell, for good & great con-considerations hath called in, and doth call in vnto himselfe the foresaid differences: hath surceased, and doth surcease the execution of all Decrees and deliberations which have hapned thereupon. Doth expressly defend and forbid the said Estates, to enter into any new deliberation vpon that matter, and vnto the said Court to take any iurisdiction or knowledge thereof, or to proceed to the signing and publication of that which had bene decreed.

The Clergie seemed not well satisfied with this Decree, both for that it made mention of differences between the three orders of the State, (the Clergie and the Nobilitie B concurring well together) as also for that they had no full answer to those points which they had propounded to the Councell. Whereupon they sent certaine Deputies to the Lord Chancellor, giving him to vnderstand, That the Clergie could not in any sort proceede to any businesse before that his Maiestie had commanded the House of Commons to suppress the Article propounded by them, and presented to the Chambers: And forbidden the Court of Parliament, and other Soueraigne Companies, hereafter to enter into any deliberation concerning the doctrine of the Church, nor to iudge or determine vpon any Question depending thereon, As of the Popes authoritie, referring to himselfe in the last point to treat with his Holinesse, with the aduice of the Prelates of his Realme.

The Clergie having by their Deputies made a new Petition vnto the King touching C these points. On the sixt of Ianuary his Maiestie sent the Marshall of Brissac vnto them to let them vnderstand, That to giue satisfaction vnto the complaint which they had made against a Decree of the Court of Parliament, the King had caused the Printer to be committed to prison, for printing a Decree which had not bene signed. That touching the Article of which there had bene so much debate, the King had called it to himselfe to determine thereof with the aduice of the Clergie, and therefore the King had cancelled it: And that if the Clergie had drawne any Articles vpon that subject, his Maiestie would be well pleased therewith. Touching the complaints which they had made against the Court of Parliament, they should set them in the front of their Bills, and his Maiestie promised to answer them fauourably. And whereas the Clergie desired to see a particular Estate of the Kings Reuenues, as the Nobilitie and Commons had in like manner done; his Maiestie was ready to send it vnto them, but his desire was they should make choise of a small number. Finally, the King intreated them to prepare the Bill of their Grievances, to the end he might make answer therunto, whereby the assembly might grow to an end, the continuance whereof held many mens mindes in suspense, and bred sinister opinions and apprehensions, the which it was expedient to suppress, to settle all things in peace and tranquillitie.

I cannot insit vpon all which past touching the Article propounded by the Commons, nor make any ample relation of the Popes Briefes to the Clergie and Nobilitie, giuing them great thanks for the opposition they had made vnto the said Article, and intreating them to continue in their good zeale, hauing much other matter of importance to treat E of. They were againe pressed by the Duke of Vantadour in his Maiesties name, to make haste to present their Grievances, if it were but to free the Realme of the impatience it suffered by this long delay. Whereupon on the 30. of Ianuary the three Orders resolu'd by pluralitie of voices, to beseech his Maiestie, First, that the Princes and Officers of the Crowne should alone iudge of the answers which were to be made to their generall grievances. Secondly, that if his Maiestie desired that any other of his Councell should assist, that he should be intreated to giue a list of their names, and that five or sixe of the Estates might be named among them. Thirdly, that three or foure of the Deputies of either Chamber might assist in Councell, when the said answers should be resolu'd. Fourthly, that the Estates should not be dissolved, vntill after the said answers. And fifthly, that F their Orations and thanks should not be made vntill after the said answers.

Their Maiesties having bene informed of this deliberation, made complaint vnto the Cardinall of Sourdis, saying, That they were innovations which could not be allowed; which being reported to the assembly, Cardinall du Perron being present, said, That in truth he found in the said demands many inconveniences & difficulties. Whereupon they all resolu'd to conform themselves to the Kings will, & to yeeld him all obedience; yet afterwards being moued by the Deputies of the Nobilitie, they joyntly made a Petition against vnto the King, & that with the Princes and Officers of the Crowne there should be only fixe of the ancientest of the Councell to assist and to give their aduice touching the answers of their grievances: and secondly, that the Estates after the presentation thereof, might still assemble themselves vntill they had received their answers. Wherevpon their Maiesties hauing giuen a fauourable Audience vnto the Deputies, made answer, That they were desirous and resolu'd to giue all content vnto the Estates: But this could not be but vpon the deliuerie of their grievances, the which they desired might be speedily done, at the furthest by Thursday next. That after the said Presentation, and when as they should treat of the answers, if any occasion were offered why the Estates should meete, they would provide for it.

This answer being deliuer'd to the three Chambers; in that of the Clergie some said; B That the Kings seruite, the good of his Estate, the necessitie of affaires, and the impossibilitie to resolu'e vpon their most important propositions (if the Estates did not continue and assemble after the presentation) were strong reasons to moue them to make a third Petition to their Maiesties.

Discourse among the Clergie, touching the Kings answer.

But most of them considering, that they should but offend their Maiesties by importunitie, in making farther instance vpon that subiect: That the Lords of the Councell said that the demand they made was of bad consequence, and that they would neuer aduise the King to grant it; That it was not fit the Estates (who should fortifie his Royall authoritie) should be an occasion to weaken it, yea although it were for an aduantage; which cannot bee of so great importance, as the least diminution of the royall authoritie. That the Estates should be very careful, not to purchase to themselves any blame or reproach, especially the King being yong, it did infinitely import to fortifie his authoritie, and not to shake it. Many other reasons were deliuer'd to moue them to obey his Maiesties will. Wherevpon the Clergie resolu'd to content themselves with the said answer, and to perswade the other Chambers to conforme themselves to their resolution, that hauing obeyed the Kings commandement, they might labour seriously to draw their demands into forme to be presented on Monday the 23 of February, the day which their Maiesties had prefixed for the conclusion of their Estates.

The Clergie demand the obseruation of the Councell of Trent.

On the 19. of February, the Bishop of Beauuais was deputed from the Clergie to the House of Commons, to intreat the company to ioyne with them in their demand vnto D King for the Councell of Trent, and the obseruation thereof. This Bishop made a long and learned discourse touching the said Councell, and in the end concludes, that it would please that order to ioyne with the Clergie in their demand vnto the King, for the publication of the Councell of Trent within this Realme.

The answer of President Miran.

President Miran answering his Speech, desired them to consider, that it was a thing neuer heard of in France, to haue a Councell published, how Oeconomically focuer; nor is there any mention thereof in any Registers of Parliament. The true publication of Councils consists in the obseruation and execution thereof; as for example, many things contained in the Councell of Trent, are practised amongst vs, and yet not necessary to expresse the name; it being neither Trent, nor Basill, nor Constance which haue made the Councils, but the resolution of the Fathers which were there assembled.

We are of opinion (with your good fauours) that it is not now expedient to intangle our felues in that Question, whether the Councell of Trent should be published or not. It is almost threescore yeares since this Councell was held, and hath remained in silence since that time; that we hold Councils in France in forme of Decrees. To shew that the Councell of Trent, should not be receiued and published in France before any other, there haue beene many oppositions made by our Kings, Chapters, and Communities of France; the discussion whereof deferred a second assembly of the Estates; and if my Masters of the Clergie would haue sent their reasons in writing in the beginning of the Estates, the businesse might haue beene inserted; the which cannot bee now F done, our grievances being perfected, and ready to be presented vnto the King.

The diuersitie of times wherein we liue, imports a necessitie both to you and vs, to reiect the publication of this Councell, rather then to embrace it: yet my Masters may if they please submit themselves thereunto, in practising their resolutions, and cutting off pluralitie of Benefices, and reforming other abuses, for the which it doth prouide; humbly thanking them for the zeale they made shew of, to the increase of Catholique Religion: whereunto they like obedient children would willingly submit them-

The Clergie and the Commons

A themselves; whereof they should haue farther instance by their particular answers, which was, that the time was too short to handle such a Question. To signify vnto the Commons, that notwithstanding the Clergie should againe to intreat the House of Commons to ioyne with them in the Nobilitie, touching the publication of the said Councell of Trent, The Article contained a demand of the said Councell, without prejudice to the Priviledges and Liberties of the French Church, in the interest of the State, for the which his Maiestie should be intreated to moderate the said Councell. President Miran made answer vnto the Bishop of Beauuais, That the Company could not now receiue the said Councell. That they embraced the faith contained therein; yea could they not, yea to those B which concerned the Government, for that it was preiudiciall to the interest of the State. That the Masters of the Clergie might obferue the said Councell amongst themselves, and giue the first example, & that they which had into or three Benefices might quit those vnto them which had none, desiring the Clergie to allow of their reasons and excuses.

But before we come to the conclusion of the Estates, I will relate an accident, which bred an alteration betweene the Nobilitie and the Commons. In the first of February, the Deputie for the Nobilitie of high Limosin hauing giuen the Bastinade, to the Lieutenant Vzerche; one of the Deputies of the House of Commons for bas Limosin, there was a great tumor among the three Chambers. The Commons complained presently vnto the King, who sent the knowledge of this action vnto the Parliament. The Chamber C of the Nobilitie hearing of this complaint, they presently sent five Deputies to the Clergie to complain likewise against the Commons: for that embracing the quarrell of a private man (a pretended Deputie of their Order) they would make it generally, and haue recourse vnto the King, without giuing aduice thereof vnto the other two orders, who (it may be) might haue found meanes to compound the difference, and giue contentment to both parties. The Clergie hauing deputed the Bishop of Agon vnto the Commons vpon this complaint, to aduise them that their Chamber had beene intreated by the Nobilitie to ioyne with them in a Petition, which they would present vnto the King, that he would assuue vnto himselfe, the knowledge of this difference, offend it, or the Estates there to be compounded. Wherevpon the commons deputed five of their order D to visit the Clergie, the Lieutenant of Blois deliuering the Speech, who said, That their Chamber intreated them to consider, what their quality and condition, & the foolishnesse of the wrong done vnto one of their body (and no pretended deputie as they would haue him) could not permit them to depart from the course which they had taken. That being Deputies from all parts of the Kingdome, to seeke among other things the meanes, to settle the authority of Iustice, it shall be a very shamefull and dangerous precedent, if so great an indignity, committed in sight of the Louure, in the Kings presence, and of the generall Estates in the Capitall Citie of the Realme, and in the face of the Parliament, should remaine unpunished, or disguised by any accommodation or complacencie.

That the crime was of that quality, as they neither could nor ought to haue recourse vnto E the Chambers for satisfaction, as in former alterations & combussions, where there was no question but of words ill understood, & interpreted in another sense then they had beene spoken, and wherein if their Chamber would haue shewed as great a feeling as the Nobilitie did, they might haue had as much subiect, and yet they made a great complaint vnto his Maiestie. That in truth if the question had bene betweene the two Chambers, as in other actions, there had beene reason to communicate it, and to demand aduice and remedy thereof from the third; all three being as it were bound to this correspondency. But their complaint was for a wrong done by a private man, the which they assured themselves, the Nobilitie would not maintaine nor iustifie, hauing no interest therein, but were rather bound to seeke a condigne punishment for his offence, who had violated the laws F of the Estates and so much wronged one of the Orders; the interest not onely concerning their Chamber, (although it had had the better part, for that the party wronged was one of their body;) but all the Chambers, together. And therefore that they could not doe lesse then to ioyne with the Commons, to demand iustice and reparation, at the least, that they would be pleased, that the prosecution might be made in Parliament, whether the King (out of his owne motion) had sent the knowledge thereof.

The Cardinall of Sourdis who did then reside, made answer, That their Order had bene much grieved to heare of any alteration betweene the Chamber of the Nobilitie billie and the Commons; and that concerning two private persons, having had no particular knowledge of the truth thereof, but what they had heard by common report, and as the Deputies of the Nobilitie had given them to understand, that the offences were reciprocal. Whereupon without any further information of the grounds, yet with an intention after knowledge of the truth, to blame the Offender and to procure a just separation of the offences, for many consultations and particularly fearing the two other Chambers should be at strife, they have endeavored to seek out some reconciliation: and that hereafter their House would neuer doo any thing, but with the same purpose and affection, not to preiudice any man but only to procure the peace and correspondency of the Houses.

The House of Commons having in the meane time followed the suite in the Court of Parliament, there was a Decree made, by which he that had stricken, was condemned to lose his head; and to pay two thousand Franckes for recompence vnto the said Lieutenant, which Decree was set in a Table at the end of Saint Michaels Bridge on the 16 of March.

The quarrell between Rochefort and the Prince of Condé, being the Prince of Condé, and Marillac his Maistie
fuerant.

Although this quarrell and offence were great, yet happened there one on the sixt of February a farre more important, between the Seigneur of Rochefort, a Gentleman of the Prince of Condé, & Monsieur de Marillac, a Gentleman belonging vnto his Maistie, and the Queene his Mother, because their Maisties followed the suite themselves to have justice done for the wronging of their servant, and the Prince did all he could to uphold Rochefort. There is a long discourse of the Originall of the quarrell between these two Gentlemen when they were both belonging to the said Prince in the yeere 1613. Wherefore we will briefly set downe how all the three Houses went vnto the Louvre, vpon the advice which their Maisties had given them of what had past betwene them and the said Prince.

On the Saturday the 17. of February in the morning, the Presidents of the Estates made each of them his report in their severall Houses (as they had bin informed by their Maisties) that the Seigneur of Rochefort accompanied with five Horse-men, and five or six tall foot-men, did set vpon the said Marillac, in Saint Honours street, wounding him with words and staves: whereof his Maistie being advertised, he sent vnto his Attourney General that he should make information, and prosecute the Law: which the Prince of Condé hearing of, and being yesterday in Councell, had much speech with the Queene touching that subject, among which hee often said, That hee found it strange that they would submit him to the Law like other men; that Rochefort had done nothing but by his commandment; and that hee did avow it.

The Queene
Speach to the Prince of Condé.

Whereunto the Queene answered, That he bore the good mind, and that she had no such conceits of him. These words bred many replies wherewith their Maisties were somewhat moved: yea, the King being ready to speake, the Queene stayed him and after the Prince was gone he told her, Madame, you have done me much wrong to hinder my speech.

There Maisties being desirous to informe the States of what had past, being resolved not to endure any such actions of any man how great soever, but to protect their liberties, and especially their household servants: Vpon report hereof, the three Chambers were much moved, and every one in particular made shew of their griefe. Either of them resolved to goe vnto their Maisties, to make offer of their fidelitie and obedience; and to let them understand, that notwithstanding the Princes avowing of the fact, they besought the King that iustice might be done for such outrages, wherewith their Maisties seemed to be much fatished for these demonstrations of their affection and love.

In the meane time informations were made against Rochefort for the Kings interest; the Prince represented his request vnto the Court, pretending many things against Marillac, who he said had been his household servant, and had done him bad service: That he had commanded the first of his followers which should meete him to give him the bastinado, which Rochefort had done who had found him first. The Queene having heard of this request, and that the Princes intention was to discharge Rochefort, shee sent for the Presidents of the Court, and told them the whole proceeding, and for that they had objected that Marillac was of base condition, shee said, He had served the King well, and I know he is a Gentleman descended from the House of Grand-Scin, in the Countrey of March: the King tels it you, and I assure it, therefore he should not be thus entreated. Hereupon the

A the Parliament desired that Rochefort should be apprehended having abused himselfe and that it was giuen out that he was in the Princes House, he hearing of this protested that it should bee open vnto Justice, but this House which not enter but by order of the Courts, whereupon by his commandment all the chambers of the house were opened, vnto them which came to search for him, but they found not Rochefort. This abiding out in pursuing much the publicke peace, the Queene Marillac and the Countesse of Spaldow went vnto the King and Queene, telling them that the Prince was their most humble servant, and would forsake their desires. The Queene answered that the countesse was not that she the King were satisfied, she should be in like manner to see this man stricke with the Louvre, where finding the King in the Queenes Chamber, he besought him, to forget what was past, to whom his Maistie said, I doe it with all my heart, and I assure you that you shall be welcom vnto me.

This alteration being thus pacified, there remained nothing but Rocheforts Maisties, the which was ended by letters of abolition which were vnto the Parliament, Marillac could not oppose himselfe, desiring rather to end their quarrell by combat, then by any other meanes. For as soone as his wounds were cured, hee sought all meanes to challenge him, whereof the Paunce being informed, hee found Rochefort in the presence of many Noblemen to receive any challenge from Marillac either by word or writing.

But lets now returne vnto the conclusion of the Estates appointed on the 23 of May. On May 23. There had beene on the 19 of February complaint made vnto the Chamber of the Clergy touching the estate of the Catholike Religion in Beanes; that the two Bishops were oppressed, That the exercise of the Catholike Religion was hindered, with many other considerations especially a great insolency which had beene committed at Millene whereupon the three orders sent the Archbishop of Lyons with their Deputies to these Maisties to craue reparation of these disorders, and execution of iustice for the restoring of the Bishops to their dignities. At the same time, the Agents for them of the said religion made many complaints vnto their Maisties, to the Chancellor touching that which had happened at Balea, where they had burned the Temple which shole of the Religion had caused to be built in a place which had beene given by the Edicts of pacification for the exercise of their Religion. They demanded that the knowledge of these two causes concerning the Edicts might be transferred to the chamber at Castres, as it was where afterwards there past decrees but to the contempt of the said party.

The 23 of February being come for the conclusion of the Estates, the three Orders came to Bourbon Hall, which was prepared as it had beene in the beginning, but the order was great by reason of the multitude of people which were suffered to enter. The Bishop of Luion for the Clergie, the Baron of Senefley for the Nobility, and President Merion for the third Estate, made long and learned Orations to give his Maisties thanks, and delivered their grievances. The chiefe points of the Clergies complaints were,

The Conclusion
states.

I. That excessive expences and immense gifts and pensions bred most of the miseries which ruined an Estate; that such gifts did hurt more then profit; that the peoples misery flowed chiefly from this fountain, being certain, that the increase of expences made the receipts increase: and that the more they spent, the more they were forced to draw from the people who were the onely Mytes of France.

II. That the sale of Offices had beene put in practice to supply the necessity wherunto the State had beene reduced by profusion and excessive expences.

III. That they depuied Clergie men of their chiefe honors, were it in Councell, or in the employment of Affairs: That when as Prelates had beene employed by their Princes, the French Church was full of Maisties, whereas now they were so fallen from their ancient splendor, as they were scarce to be knowne: For they were so farre from seeking any aduice of Clergie men in that which concerned the Estate, as it seemed they thought the honor which they had to serue God, made them incapable to serue their King. If it were lawfull for any to enter into Councell, it was onely for formes sake, the which appeared plainly for that they were received with such contempt, as it was sufficient to be a Layman to have place and presedency before them.

III. That Clergie men giuing willingly the tenth of their goods, they suffered them to be dispossessed of the rest, either for that they were dedicated to the world, and not to God, or for that they wanted faith and were iworne enemies to the Church: That they suffered of the

suffered the enemies of the faith to pollute sacred places by their prophane burials: and that contrary to the Edicts, and all reason they held by force the Churches of Catholics; hindering divine service to deliver the intentions of men.

¶ That there being no meanes to oblige the Nobility, by ordinary wayes besetting their profession, they had extended themselves so farre as to part with that which was Gods, and to receive it into the prejudice of the Church: so as it seems but a slight matter to give away an Abbey for a Lay Gentleman, or to put it into their hands which are of the contrary Religion: but in the meane time that it was true and easie to be seen, that the loss and ruine of the Church came from hence; for so much as the presentation of the greater part of the Cures of France are annexed vnto Abbeyes; which was the cause that being so possessed by persons of such condition, it was impossible to have any good Pastors (who notwithstanding are the true pillars which uphold the Church and maintain it in reputation.) It being evident, that a Courtier, or any other, more tied to earth then heaven, hath little care to choose one of good conversation: and that the enemies of the Church triumph, when ignorant men, and of scandalous life are placed therein. And although there might be more reason to grant pensions out of Benefices vnto Lay men, then to give them the Title to enjoy in their owne names, or by interposed persons: yet there were no equity to give them part of the fruit, which did not participate of the paines.

¶ XVI. If to come from pensions to reversiones, who would thinke it fitt to give a successful man that is living, exposing his life to the mercy of him that should profit by his death. That Councells had condemned this practice as most dangerous: That King Henry the third in the last Assembly of the Estates had bound himself by a solemn oath never to be the author of such reversiones during his reign.

¶ XVII. That the Clergy should be free from all Taxes and other impositions; payers being the true tribute they should draw from Churchmen.

¶ XVIII. That the Ecclesiastical authority was to be distinct from that of the secular Magistrate, as Cyrillus was bold to witness, that the excommunicates vpon the Church and the consent of the Tribunal of Bishops gave entry to Schismes; and broke the bond which united all the children of Iesus Christ in his house. That it was most certain that France could no better reach his subjects to obedience his power, then by suffering them to attempt against that of the great God, from whom he holds his.

¶ XIX. That of late in a full peace they had trodden downe him that should be adored, not onely by men but of Angels: so as they had great cause to say with Ieremie, Let our cities be covered with shame and ignominy, for that strangers pollute the sacred temple of the great God: and with greater reason to apprehend for this Realme the horrible punishment wherewith he hath threatened them who have filled that with abomination, which was particularly affixed for his inheritance. These were the chiefe heads of the Clergies complaints, whereunto they annexed the remedies, on which I will not insist.

¶ XX. The President for the third Estate (for there was nothing published of the Nobilities grievances) said, That the two chiefe pillars which had alwaies supported the State were Piety and Iustice. That there remained nothing in France but the name and shadow of these two vertues. That Piety was banished by the defects of Prelates, there being many Bishopricks destitute of Bishops, and many flocks without Pastors and yet the rourcemes were gathered by supposed names or stewards: That most part of the titulary Prelates fled resistance; contemning the ancient Ecclesiastical Lawes. That as the authority of Bishops had become much impaired, so pietie had become abolished and banished. That the Cures which were subiect to Bishops were reiectors for that they were so poor, as a man of mean knowledge would hold it a shame to be called vnto them: and if they had any good Reuerends, they which disdaine not the tide to receive the fruits, supplied the execution of the charge with some poore and ignorant priest with small wages. That in halfe the Abbeyes of France, there were not Abbots with Canonical titles, but the Abbeyes were held by Receiters, Gentlemen, or men of other qualities. That multiplicitie of Benefices held by one man, open Simony, and disguised by pensions reserved, were the cause of all the miseries for the which God afflicted France.

¶ That there had crept into the order of the Nobility such exesse, such contempt of Justice and Iudges, so many contraventions against the Kings Lawes and ordinances, and

A violences against the weake and feeble; That at this day their chiefe actions are consumed in excesive play, in superfluous expences; monsters and prodiges of this age, which darken the ancient luster of this Order.

That the delays, excuses and shifts of Iustice to make futes immortal, were infinit, and had no bounds by the malice of the parties, which innocently blemished the honor of the Iudges. There were few futes either ciuill or criminall if any great man or rich were interested, which past not through all the inuiditions of the Realme, by reason of euocations too frequent: for the onely iudgement of a competency before they entered into the ground of the cause, so as the accessories (smoothing the principals) in the end the plantife and the defendant found themselves ruined; and the reason of these disorders was the multiplicity of Courts of Iustice, and the excesive number of Officers & Iudges, who were not rewarded nor punished according to their merits. Having afterwards represented the inhumanities of souldiers which held the field, he besought the King for the reestablishment of Policy and trade: to cause the Treasure to be well gouerned: to abolish pensions: to ease the poore people of Taxes: and to reduce all to the same estate it was in, in the year 1576. He then directed his speech vnto the Queene Mother.

Madam, God hath committed this Realme to your care and vigilancy, whereof you have acquitted your selfe worthily during your Regency, to the content of all good men: And seeing the King doth againe referre the Gouernment vnto you, as it hath pleased him to declare vnto vs, having charge to beseech you to continue this holy resolution, guided by your good aduice and wise counsels, to the discharge of so many impositions which oppress the people, set downe at large in our remembrances, to the end that being our iust and lawfull Prince, hee may not desire more in his soueraine fortune to bee seene great, then iust and mercifull, mingling together by your example, two things, which are very diuerse, power and modestie: and that his subjects swimming as it were between loue and reuerence, may behold him as their Father, their Benefactor, and author of their safeties, by the ease for many sorts of impositions, as can hardly bee numbered; and by the same meanes to free them from the oppression of souldiers: That none but sufficient men may have the commissions to lead them who may answer for them: That the Parishes exempt from lodging, may contribute to the charge of others, without difference of land belonging to any degree, seeing they are all your subjects equally contributable to the charges of the Realme. That to this effect the Collectors of subsidies in Parishes where they lye, shall carry a note of their charges vnto the Iudges, to be equally diuided among the rest: That the Commissaries which lead them might be answerable, and if they themselves lye at discretion (as many now doe) that they may be punished with death. That information may be made against Commissaries, who have bene so audacious leading of Companies to cause themselves to bee defrayed by the people. Moreouer, forbid day works which oppress the peopls as much as taxes, a poore man being forced to leaue his seed time, and to abandon his harvest, to go and worke for a Gentleman: That this act might be declared bafe and punished with all rigor; and oppose your selfe generously against all oppressions. It is the surest meanes to retaine so many heads with one, and to reduce mildly vnder the common yoke of obedience this great turbulent and diuinit multitude. So we hope your Maiesty will suffer your selfe to be mildly forced by our perswasions to the entertainment of our iust petitions. For as in an absolute Prince, it is a great happinot to be forced, so it is a most miserable thing not to suffer himselfe to be periuaded.

After the conclusion of the Estates, the King suffered all the three orders to assemble, so as it were not at the Augustins or in any other publike place, but only in the houses of the Presidents of either Order, with charge not to make any new propositions touching the affaires which depended of the Estates. The King for a more speedy dispatch of answers to their grievances, had caused them to be drawne vp into three Chapters, and had appointed three seuerall companies to peruse them and consider of their answers. Vpon this diuision, the three Orders of Estates made choice of particular Deputies to confere with the said Commissioners, where the first Articles were first viewed and examined.

On the 24 of March the King gave the chiefe of the three Orders to understand, that he desired they should come to the Louure, where being assembled in the great Gallery, their Maiesties assisted by their Councell, the Chancellor speaking to the Estates said, That the King and his Councell had seene their Grievances; That the multitude, diuersity and importance importance of the Articles represented therein, did not permit their Maesties to make answer vnto them so soone as they thought to haue done and much desired. That for this occasion, and to the end that the Estates might receiue the testimony of their good will in their principall Articles, and vpon which they most insisted and were most affected vnto : That their Maesties were resolu'd to take away the sale of Offices, and establish good order in all which depended thereon : To reestablish a Chamber for reuiew of the Treasure, and to cut off Pensions : And all in such order and forme as the Estates should haue occasion of content. For the rest of their grieuances which were very many, they should be answered with all possible speed.

By the abolition of the sale of Offices, the King was to lose 150000 pounds sterling yearly in his casual profits: whereupon there was a proposition made to lay three shillings B vpon the bushell of salt in Countries subiect to imposition, and an equivalent proportion in others, the which should cease after ten years. Many of the Clergie and the Nobility liked of this proposition : but the third Estate held it very preiudiciall for their Order, whereupon they presented a Petition vnto his Maieftie for the stay thereof, as being hurtfull to his Maiefties seruice, and tending to the oppression of his poore subiects, whereof I haue formerly made mention.

Reception of the Commander of Silley at Madril.

In the Spring, newes came from Spaine touching the reception of the Commander of Silley, whom his Maieftie had sent to cary a New-year's gift to the French Queene : It was said that at his entry into Madril, the Duke of Lerma was sent by his Catholike Maieftie, to receiue him with extraordinary ceremonies, being accompanied by many C Grands, and other Noblemen richly appointed; who conducted him to the Palace, where he went to salute his Maieftie, who receiued him with all shewes of loue and affection: After complements done, the King tooke him by the hand, and led him to the Infanta's Cabinet, to whom hauing done his obeysance, he declared vnto her the subiect of his Embassage, and the King his Masters affection vnto her: After which, he presented in his Maiefties name, a rich bracelet made of Diamonds & other precious stones curiously wrought with certaine deuices, a present valued at about 40000 Pound sterling, the which the receiued with great admiration and ioy; and after she had put it on her arme, she tooke it off againe, and placed it in her bosome, to shew the great affection she bare vnto his Maieftie : After which hauing taken his leaue of the King, and of the Infanta, hee was conducted to his lodging, where he was dayly visited by the chiefe of Spaine, and entertained with all the sports and deuices they could, to testifie their publike ioy.

Death of
garite.

Soone after, towards the end of March dyed Queene Marguerite in her Palace in the suburbis of Saint Germaine. As the deceased King Henry the third her brother had bene the last King of the Royall branch of Valois, so this Queene was the last of the Princesses. This branch of the Royal House of Franch, had reigned 261 years, from Philip of Vallois, who was King in the yeare 1328, vnto the death of Henry the third, which was in the yeare 1589.

Hauing lyeen sixe daies vpon a bed of State in her Palace Hall, her body was afterwards conducted to the Chappell of the reformed Augustines, where it lay vntill that the affaires of the Kingdome were settled, after which they made choice of a place for her interment. The Queene Mother had a care to giue content to her creditors, and to most part of her Officers and household seruants, as shee had recommended it before her death.

Proceeding in the Court of Parliament on the 28 of March.

Oa the 27 of March, ten Presidents and Councillors deputed from the Chambers of Inquest, that is to say, two from either Chamber, came vnto the great Chamber of the Parliament, to intreat the first President to assemble all the Chambers to consult and determine vpon the Remonstrances which they had long before resolu'd to make vnto the King : the which was granted, and presently performed.

Being all assembled, the President of the first Chamber of Inquest said, that they had commanded this Assembly touching that which the King had promised to the Court of Parliament a litle before : That he would giue no answer to the grieuances which should be presented vnto him by the deputies of the three Estates of the Realme, nor make any resolution, before he had heard the remonstrances of his Parliament. That he held it a fit time to aduise now what the Court should doe in this point, considering in what estate the affaires were.

Vpon this proposition they began to deliberate after their accustomed manner; but being not able to conclude, it was deferred vntill the next day being the 28, where after

the Court.

A much debate, a Decree was concluded in these words : The Court, all the Chambers being assembled, hath decided, under the Kings good pleasure, That the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne hauing place and a deliberative voice therein, being at this present in the City, shall be invited to come into the Court, there (with the Chancellor and all the Chambers assembled) to aduise vpon the propositions which should be made for the Kings seruice, the ease of his subiects, and the good of his Estate.

This resolution was caried that night vnto their Maiefties as some say in grosse, and not in the same termes it had bene set downe, and by one of their own company. Some illaffected vnto the Court, whispered in their Maiefties eares, that the Parliament sought to meddle with the affaires of State, enter into knowledge of the government thereof, and giue counsell vncalled: That it was an apparant enterprize against the Kings authority, and did touch the Queenes Regency, which they would contrroll. Their Maiefties were much incensed against the Court vpon this report, which they held to be true : whereupon they sent to one of the Princes and some Peeres, forbidding them to go to the Parliament if they were invited, the day after the King sent for his learned Councell, to whom the Chancellor said, that the King had sent for them touching the decree of the Parliament, wherewith their Maiefties were much discontented, being giuen to vnderstand, that the Court had ordained, that the Princes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne should be invited to the Parliament, to take aduice touching the government of the Realme; whereunto Mons<sup>r</sup> Seruain the Kings Advocate answered, That they had not heard so much, but they had vnderstood, that the Court had assembled to witness their good and sincere affection, hauing for their only ayme and vow, the safety of the King and the State. Hereupon the King and Queene entering into their Cabinet, the Queene said vnto them, That they had bene aduertised of diuers speeches which had been in this assembly, by the which the Kings authority had bene wronged, and that it was a strange enterprize : whereunto the Advocate answered, that they had not bene present at this resolution, being retired after they had required that which was necessary for the Kings seruice, and concerned the publike : but they had bene summoned to propound that which they held profitable and fit in this season for his Maiefties seruice and the good of the State; where without any further ouerture, they besought the Court to remember that they had formerly propounded what they might doe, hauing not yet seene his Maiefties Declaration vpon the remonstrances and petitions made vnto him by the Deputies of the three Estates : whereupon the Court had resolu'd to giue aduice vnto his Maieftie of that which they thought concerned his seruice : the which they had not done to attempt against his Royall authority, but only with an intention to make an ouerture for the good of his seruice and ease of his subiects : and also to insuffle the constant fidelity of all the Officers of his Parliament, in the presence of the Princes, Peeres, and others which should then assist with the Lord Chancellor. And after a long discourse of the integrity and good intention of the Court, he besought his Maieftie to hold them for his most humble and faithful subiects and seruants.

The Advocates
Speech to the King & Queene.

After this, the Councell was presently assembled, and the Procureur and Advocate commanded to enter into the Councell Chamber, to whom the King said, stay here you shall heare what I will resolve: whereunto they answered, Sir, we are at your feet to obey you, and hauing the honor to be of your Councell, will doe whatsoever it shall please you to command vs in any other action : But the question being touching a resolution taken in your Parliament, seeing we are of that body, it may please you to dispence with vs from being in a place, where if any speake against the Parliament, we neither ought nor can endure to heare it; but are bound to speake for the authority of the Decree. Whereupon the King finding their excuse reasonable, commanded them to withdraw into the lesser Chamber, where hauing attended an houre or more, in the end they were called in, to whom the King said (in presence of the Queene and Chancellor) I haue sent for you to giue you that in charge which I haue resolu'd on in my Councell, which you shall deliver on my behalfe to my Court of Parliament: it being my will that you should be the messengers.

Then Mons<sup>r</sup> Seruain besought the King to excuse them, and to commit those words of the discontent which it seemed he had, to some others, letting him vnderstand that they were at his feet to do him most humble seruice, when he should command them: they were also daily at the doores of the Iudgement of the Court, the necessity of their charges tying them thereunto, to require that which concerned his service, and to second the good intentions of his Parliament; whom they had alwaies found full of trust, courage, and good affection, necessary for the preservation of his authority and State. But notwithstanding all their sure, and the excuses they could alledge, they were commanded to deliver unto the Court the reasons why his Majesty held himselfe wronged by the Decree of the 28 of March.

Three reasons declared in Councell against the decree of the Court.

The first, That the King being in Paris, the Court of Parliament ought not to have assembled to consult of affaires which concerne the State, nor inuite the Princes, Peeres, Nobles, and others having place in Parliament, before they had acquainted his Majesty therewith.

The second, That the King being declared of full age by the Lawes of France, although all his other subjects were Minors at his yeares, yet God having imparted vnto him greater graces then to other men, he should be held for more vertuous: and that his power was not lesse then that of his Predecessors.

The third, That this Conuocation ordained by the Court, although that the Chancellor were required to assit, could not be done by the motion of the Parliament or otherwise, but by his Majesties Letters Patents, it depending of his sole and soueraigne power. After which, he commanded them to bring him the Original of the Decree, forbidding the Court to proceed any further in the execution thereof.

This charge being delivered to all the Chambers by the Kings Councill, they retrying themselves; the first President propounded what was to be done concerning this charge; where after much consultation they resolved to deliver the Decree into the hands of the Kings Councill, who came vnto the Louure on the last of March; and being admitted to his Majesties presence, Monf. Seruin said vnto him: Sir, we owe vnto your Majesty the obedience of faithful subjects; having received the commandement you gave vs, we acquainted the Court of Parliament with your pleasure, wherof we are to give you a faithful account. We have acquainted them with your words: the which being heard, we observed in them all in general a wonderful griefe, to see your Majesty incensed against them; remembering that they had alwaies given examples of obedience to all your subjects, not thinking that they should incurre your indignation. In the end, letting them understand, that you would aboue all things maintaine your authority; and labouring with the Court that they would make a good resolution for your Majesties content; we have beene charged by the Court to bring you the Decree made on Saturday last, under your good pleasure; and to let you understand that they hold nothing so deare or in so great recommendation, as the preservation of your Soueraigne power and fauour, without the which all your Officers of this Company, your most humble and most affectionate, loving servants, cannot execute their charges honorably nor profitably: They most humbly beseech you to receive the Decree made with an upright heart, and with no intention to attempt any thing against your authority.

Monf. Seruin Speech delivered the Decree vnto the King.

The King and Queene seemed to be well content with these words, With the Kings good liking, and his Majesty taking the Decree into his hand, said, That he would looke on it, and acquaint the Court of Parliament with his pleasure. They thought that matters should have so rested: but they were advertised that three Presidents of the Inquests coming into the Court on the 9 of Aprill, desired that they would consider if it were not fit to beseech the King, that hee would be pleased to give an answer vnto his Parliament, and to let them know his pleasure according to his promise; that it was fit and necessary to know it; and that it were not good that the resolutions of the Parliament should remaine without effect.

The Parliament sent for by the King.

Hereupon the Presidents of the great Chamber with foure of the ancient Councillors, with many Presidents and Councillors of the Inquests and Requests, were sent for to the Loure: being brought into the Kings Chamber, he said vnto them: My Masters, seeing you would know my answer vpon your Decree, which my Councill brought mee: the Lord Chancellor shall deliver it vnto you. Who presently began thus, That the King being advertised how that some of the Parliament desired to understand his answer, notwithstanding that he had beene aduised for good and reasonable considerations to deferre it: yet he had given him in charge to say vnto them: that he was much offended at the enterprise which the Parliament had made vpon his authority, being of full Age: and moreover, in his Capital City to have sought to assemble the Princes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne,

A a thing without all president, without reason, and without apparance, the which no Parliament had euer done before. That his Majesty knew well, that the power and iurisdiction of the Court was limited, and as they tooke no knowledge of Accounts, nor of the imposts of salt, so Kings have alwayes referred to themselves, the knowledge of the affaires of their Estate: That the Parliament should remember the answer made vnto the Duke of Orleans, in the time of King Charles the eighth, by the President De la Vaugery, whose services and memory had bene commended by Kings: And the sensible feeling and dislikes which King Lewis the twelfth, and Francis the first did shew vpon a far lesse attempt. And of the rigour of a Decree which was made during the Reigne of Charles the ninth: For that in a matter of lesse consequence, they would contest against his authority: whereupon the resolution of the Court was cancelled, and the execution published, the doores being shut. That this Parliament being the first of the Realme, should employ her authority which she holds from Kings, to maintaine that of the King, and not to seeketo suppress it, being of full yeares and in his presence, wherat although he were much offended, yet hearing that it had past by the plurality of voyces of the yongest and last admitted, and that the ancientest were of a contrary opinion; he was well satisfied with them, and intreated them to continue, assuring them that he would not forget that good office. And for that the Parliament should haue no colour to excuse the Decree, for that they had referred the execution to the Kings will, hee was well advertised of the Decree, the first day it was resolved on; and of that which had bene corrected, and newly added to assuage his displeasure, all which notwithstanding gaue him no full satisfaction. Wherefore he prohibited the Parliament the execution thereof, to assemble any Princes, or Peeres, or to deliberate any more thereupon. Then the King began to speake and said, My Masters that which the Chancellor hath delivered vnto you, it is I that speake it. To morrow I will send you my answer in writing; In the meane time I forbid you to proceed.

Whereupon the first President made answer: Sir, wee are much grieved that since your happy coming to the Crowne, having so faithfully served your Majesty, the deceased King Henry the Great, and the Kings our soueraigne Lords, since the first erection of your Court, to see that our services (so well knowne to all the world) should bee so ill interpreted as to be taken for enterprizes against your authority; and that you are offended with vs. We are assured that if it were lawfull for vs to reply after a displeasure testified by your owne mouth, and signified vnto vs by my Lord Chancellor, we could with all honorable respect, to your Majesties content, and the satisfying of all those that assist you, represent, that your Parliament hath neuer concluded any thing, but the Kings have allowed it: and for the which (instead of dislike and finisier construction) wee have alwaies received praise and commendations, yea during the reignes alledged by my Lord Chancellor. But for that we are called by your commandement, having no charge from the Parliament, we will not faile to present vnto them what it hath pleased you to pronounce by your owne mouth, and by the Chancellors. In the meane time wee most humbly beseech you to take the Decree in good part, as made, not by the aduice of the last of the Company, but by the generall voice and consent of your whole Court, whereto yong and old have equally contributed; and to hold it rather an excess and abundance of a good, sincere, and true intention to your service, rather then any presumption against your authority. Then the Queene sayd, I know well that the young men first propounded this aduice, and that they have caused it to passe by plurality of voyces: I blame not the Court, but thanke the Ancients, and all those which opposed themselves; I will employ my credit with the King my Sonne, to take knowledge of them, and to require their good will. The first President answered, Madam, we most humbly beseech you to beleue that we have all participated in the Decree, and that you would be pleased to forget the contrary report, and to honor them equally with your fauour to the King.

The Queens Speech to the Parliament.

The Court of Parliament being informed of his Majesties pleasure, notwithstanding continued in their first resolution, to draw their remonstrances, and to present them in writing to the King; wherof his Majesty being advertised, he sent the next day being the 12 of Aprill, to command the Presidents and some ancient Councillors: to come to the Loure; wher in the Queens presence (the Chancellor being absent) he said, that hee had sent for them, hearing that notwithstanding his prohibition to make any remonstrances concerning the affaires of his estate, yet they had deputed some of euery chamber to draw them, touching the which, the Queen his Mother should let them vnderstand his pleasure. The Queene repeating the Kings words, said: that it was a thing had neuer bene attempted, and that he did forbid them. That if the Parliament should presume to doe it, the King would be displeased, he is (said she) your King and Master, who will vse his authority if you contradiet his will: whereunto shee added, that it was a faction of men ill affected to his seruice, and which thought to do things against his will: and withall she said in choller that she would be reuenged. Whereunto the first President answered, that he would aduertise the Court of Parliament thereof.

His report being made, they tooke aduice what was fit to be done, and in the end resolved, that according to their former deliberation, the Chambers should bring their instructions to be viewed by the Presidents and some Councillors of the great Chamber, to draw the remonstrances which the Court had resolved should be made. But for that they were not presented vnto the King before the 22 of May, wee will insert some particularities which past in the Moneths of March and Aprill.

The Kings Declaration requiring the Edicts of pacification.

During the Assembly of the Estates, there was a great contention and dispute in the Chamber of the Nobility between the Catholike Deputies and them of the reformed Religion, for that the Catholike Deputies had propounded and caused it to be resolved that the King should be intreated to maintaine the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Religion, according to the oath which he had taken at his Coronation. The Deputies of the reformed Religion made great complaints thereof, whereupon the King made a Declaration on the 12 of March, which was verified in Court the last of Aprill. It contained, That the Catholike Deputies had made this request vnto the King, to witness their zeale and affection to the Catholike Religion, and not to offend any person: the which they had protested both in particular, & all together vnto his Maiesty, desiring the obseruation of peace established by the Edicts, being fully perswaded by experience of what was past, that violent remedies had but increased the number of those which were strayed out of the Church, in stead of teaching them the way to returne: and that vpon this protestation his Maiesty (to free them from all bad impressions which made profession of the reformed Religion with a pure and innocent zeale free from all factions; as also the pretext of any which would seeke to trouble the quiet of the Realme) declared and commanded, that all Edicts, Declarations, & priuate Articles made in fauor of them in the reformed Religion, as well by the deceased King his father as by himselfe, should be kept inuiolably, and the breakers thereof punished as the breakers of the publike peace. The Agents of them of the Religion, having besought the King to name them a place where they should hold their Assemblies for the chusing of new Agents, which they did vually euery three years: they had first a Brieffe to assemble at Gergeau: but afterwards the place was changed, and the assembly was held at Grenoble.

King.

We will now returne to the proceedings of the Parliament, who hauing prepared their Remonstrances gaue charge vnto the Kings learned Councell to go vnto the Lord Chancellor, to demand audience of the King, for the deliuey thereof in writing as it had been decreed. Who hauing deliuered their charge, returned answer that his Maiesty would giue them audience the 22 of May: when as the Chambers being assembled about three of the clocke in the afternoon, there went 6 Presidents, and 12 Councillors of the great Chamber, and a President; and 3 Councillors of euery chamber of Inquests and Requests, with the Kings learned Councell, being in all about 40 persons. Being come to the Louure, they were conducted by a Captaine of the Kings Guard by a priuate staires into the Councell Chamber, for otherwise they could hardly haue past by the ordinary staires, the presse so great. In the Councell Chamber were the King and Queene, assisted by the Dukes of Guise, Neuers, Vendosme and Epemon, the Lord Chancellor, the Marshalls of Ancre, and Souure, with many other Lords and Officers of the Crowne, and other Councillors of State. The first President hauing done his obeysance vnto the King, spake on this manner: That hee had charge giuen him to represent vnto his Maiesty most humble Remonstrances on the behalfe of his Court of Parliament, and not to deliuey vnto him the motiue of the Decree which was made the 23 of March: That they most humbly besought him to beleeue that no other will nor intention had moued them thereunto, but the

A the necessity of the Estate of the Realme, and a great, good, and sincere affection which it hath alwayes borne, and doth still to his seruice, and to the good and quiet of his Estate: wherein it would not giue place to any whatsoeuer; and whereof it had alwayes yielded to good and faithfullest intimonies as greater could not be desired: That it did not enuy the great riches, fauour nor dignity of any person, nor malice any. That it had neuer failed in the fidelity due to the Kings seruice, and had alwayes this Maiesty for its soveraigne Lord and only Master, beseeching him to receive them with a good ele, as committing them to the most honour, faithful, and obedient company that liues; Whereupon her presence came vnto the King, who deliuered it vnto a Secretary of State, and then his Maiesty comman-

B ded the Parliament to retire. But before they went forth the first President said, that hee had charge humbly to beseech his Maiesty, that the Remonstrances might be presently read, the which was done very distinctly, and heard with great attention by all which were in the Chamber. And for that they were very long and would take vp too much room, I must inuente the Reader to satisfie himselfe with the chiefe points and heads thereof, which were; A Declaration of the causes of the Parliaments Complaint: That the Parliament of Paris, was borne with the State of France, and holds place in Councell with Princes and Barons, which in all ages was neere vnto the Kings person. That the Parliament had alwayes deale in publike affaires. That some Kings which had not liked of the remonstrances of the Parliament of Paris, did afterwards witness their griefe. That Popes,

C Emperours, Kings, and Princes, had voluntarily submitted their controuersies to the iudgment of the Parliament of Paris, reasons which had moued them to the Decree of the 23 of March. Of the disorders which were in the State, and the remedies. Not to suffer the Kings soveraigne power to be made doubtfull and problematicall. To entertaine the ancient alliances. To dismis from the Kings Councell such as had bene of late years addicted by fauour. To punish the Kings Officers, with reueue gifts or pensions. To maintaine the Officers of the Crowne, and the Governors in their authority and functions. Not to giue any more reuerfions of any charges & governments. To forbid the sale of the Offices of the Kings House, and of the Infants of France. Not to commit any charges and gouernments vnto strangers. To forbid the Kings subjects to haue any intelligences or communica-

D tions with the Ambassadors of foraigne Princes. To preserve the French Church. To reforme the multiplicity of new Orders of religious men; & to haue a care to the nomination of Archbishops, Bishops, and Abbots. Not to admit strangers to Prelacy. To search out and punish Avaricious, Lewes, & Magicians. To continue the deceased kings designs for the restoring of the Vniuersity of Paris. Not to suffer unpunished the violencies which were done to hinder the course of Iustice. To reforme the knowledge of affaires which are treated of in the Kings Councell. Not to dissolve or suspend the Decrees of the Court of Parliament vpon petitions. Not to giue letters of abolition and pardon for qualified crimes. To cause the Edicts against Duels to be obserued. To provide that Decrees concluded in council, might not be changed. To abolish fees newly brought in at the Seale. E To forbid all Councillors of State to take any Pensions from Partisans or vnderakers of the Farmes. To ordainethat the Edicts against tabling houses may be executed. To reforme the Financies or treasure. To reduce the excessive gifts and pensions to the same Estate they were in during the reign of Henry the Great, and to reuoke the Pensions granted to some Officers of Iustice. To reduce the managing of the treasure to few persons. And of the disorders of the treasure since the death of the deceased King. To forbid hereafter the execution of any Edicts, Declarations, or Commissions, before they were verified in soveraigne Courts. To grant a search of them, who haue gouerned the incomes in the treasure. Of vnmeasurable gifts. To forbid the transport of gold and siluer, and all exesse. To suffer the execution of the Decree of the 28 of March.

F In the end they concluded with a protestation to name the authors of these disorders. (if it should please his Maiesty for the discharge of their consciences before God and men, and for the good of his seruice and preferuation of his Estate.

with the Parliament: who contrary to his restraint had meddled with officers of State. A That the Parliament would deal in reformations, and dispose the Government and the Treasures, and that they had not yett finished judgement but that they knew they had an intent to call her Regency in question, she which all the Orders of the Realme, assembled in one body of State, and the Parliament it selfe had commended: That they could not speak of the Government of the Officers of the Realme without touching her. That she was well advertised that these Remonstrances had not bene allowed by the whole body of the Parliament: That there were sixe Presidents as of present as objected which had opposed them, and that there were vnder their seuen Presidents and Councillors which were the motives. That hereafter the King would no more endure it. That she would have every man know and might boldly speake it: That there was no Regency in France more happy then hers. After which, pausing a while, and seeming much moved by her countenance, she commanded the Lord Chancellor to make the Kings answer.

Whereupon the Chancellor said, That France was a Monarchy, where the King alone commanded, holding his Realme sovereignly from God: That he had Lawes and Ordinances by the which he was to gouerne them, and for the which he was not to give an account to any man: That it did not belong vnto the Parliament, to controul his go-uernment: That the Kings of France had distributed the charges and functions of the Realme distinctly: To the Chambers of Accounts matters of Account: To the Generals of the Iustice, the Aydes, whereof the Parliament might not Iudge: And with great reason the Parliament of Paris might not intermeddle with the conduct and direction of his Estate, and that they might not vnder take more then the King would suffer there:
It was true that Kings in great affaires had bene accustomed to take aduice of the Court of Parliament, and he did beleue they might doe great seruice: but it was when it pleased him: That when their authority was vnto the Kings will it was excellent good; and he would alwayes aduise the King to vnderstande their Counsell: not that they should giue it of their owne motion, without the Kings pleasure: That the Parliament had bene carried insensibly to a resolution which did much blemish the Kings authority: That the time it selfe was very opposite, when as they laboured about the grievances of the Estates, the which being sent vnto the Parliament, they should then haue found a subject to object that which they haue now done out of season: That out of doubt the Parliaments intention was good, but to speake truly there was a defect: That he had formerly said it was done without reason, but now he said it was without president, having expresse commission to say both the one and the other, for that it cannot bee found: (the King being in Paris) that the Court of Parliament of their owne motion, hath assembled the Princes, Dukes, Peeres and Officers of the Crowne, whereof hee would no other proof then the presidents produced in their Remonstrances: That touching the Citations whereof they complained, there had bene none granted without Deliberation of the Councell, and that was to stay the Parliament from taking knowledge of their countroversies, which had kindled in their company. As for abolitions and pardons, he could assure them, that hereafter none should passe, the Councell being so ordered: as it should be a very difficult thing to effect: And as for the dissolving of the Decretes of the Parliament, it had bene done when as the Parliament attempted to iudge contrary to the restraint of the Counsell, who held their iudgements for no Decretes: That they had caused the Councell to cease, to treat without intermission about the grievances of the Estates, and that being now vpon that of Iustice, his Maiesty had commanded to take their aduice: That the Parliament did not obserue the Ordinances concerning the reception of Councillors admitting many bretheren and neere kinsmen into one Parliament: That they neither could nor ought to complaine of the Queenes Regency, which hath bene so happy, as neuer Electors haue observed the like: during the which, France hath abundantly enjoyed all good blessings: That the Queene was not to giue an account of her Regency, but to God onely: and if she would do it vnto the King, his Maiesty would giue her thanks:
That no man could prescribe vnto the King what Councillors hee should entertaine:
That he had thought good to make vse of those persons whom the deceased King had chosen, by whom he hath bene well serued.

President Speech to the Parliament.

The Court of Parliament thinking to retire, President Iamies spake, that having managed the Kings Treasure vprightly, with such as are employed therein, he thought he

A hee should worthily incurre blame, if hee should not speake some thing concerning his charge, for the which he would answer before the severest Iudges: And that he wondered to heare himselfe blamed, not by a multitude, who interpret of another mans actions lightly, but by a company of graue & wise men maliciously informed of the managing of the Kings Treasure. That the question they made was to him, and not to the Queene who was not bound to giue an account of their Regency but to the King. And to enter into particular, that after the kings death, the Duke of Sully had continued the Command of the Treasure, vnto the warre of Iuliers, and had set downe the expences, hauing left in the Treasurers hands, but 350 Pounds sterling. To say that the kings reuenues are augmented since his fathers decease, it cannot be verified, but contrariwise there hath bene 200000 Pounds sterling abated vpon the Imposition of salt, and 400000 pounds sterling, increase for the necessity of affaires. As for the money in the Bastile, what necessity the Estate hath suffered, yett hath it not bene toucht: but to stay the course of these last alterations, and for the voyage of Poitiers.

And whereas they sayd, that in the time of the deceased King, they layd vp yearly 200000 pounds sterling, that it was not so, they bringing in onely 80000 pounds. That it was a dangerous thing to touch a diseale and bring no remedie for it. That they should name particularly such as had bene the cause, who should be presently abandoned by all good men, and he himselfe would be the first should doe it. That in truth it were expedient to cut off the great expences and vnecessary charges: that his duty bound him to speake it.

After this, some of the great personages there present began to speake, and the President was ready to answer, but the Queene imposed silence; whereupon the Marshall d'Ancre approached aker vnto her; and deliuered her a little booke, which gaue her occasion to say vnto the President: Ton suffer scandalous libells to be sold, against the Kings honour and mine, and doe no iustice: hold, read this booke, intituled Cassandra, the which he deliuered to one of the Secretaries of State, who read some leauies which were noted; whereunto the first President made answer, that three dayes since hee had caused a strict search to be made among the Printers, but could not yett discouer any thing: whereupon the Duke of Espemans said that it was not those poore men they should punish who fought nothing but to get their liuing. This libell which was called Cassandra they made to speake as a Prophete, saying, That the King should nor allie himselfe by marriage out of France, with this exclamation, what thinke you to doe French men? you make Bonfiers and spend the nights in Maskes and Dancing, in hope of these pretended marriages:
Doe you thinke thus to reconcile two Nations which haue bene alwayes enemies: the water and fire will sooner mingle themselves together and so produce their effects, then the French will agree with the Spaniards: This was the opinion of some malecontents, but this libell was answered to the full.

The day after the deliury of the Remonstrances, there was a Decree past in the Coun-cell of State both against them and the Decree of the Parliament, wherein, making a long relation of what had past, in the end it concludes, That the King desiring to preuent such disorders and vnde enterprizes hereafter, had againe disannulled, annulled and declared vnde the said Decree of the 23 of March, forbidding the Parliament hereafter, to meddle with affaires of State, but when they should be commanded. And to the end the memory of this enterprize and disobedience might be extinct, his pleasure is, that the said Decree, together with the Remonstrances shall be cancelled and taken out of the Registers; and that the Register shall be bound to bring them to his Maiesty instantly after notice of this Decree, or else to lose his Office, his Maiesty promising as speedily and as abundantly as he can to provide for the complaints and grievances contained in the intensions of the Generall Estates; which hee causeth to be viewed and examined daily, not onely in that which concerneth iustice, but also the Clergy, the Nobility, the civill government, and the Treasure, the Edicts whereof shall be sent vnto the Parliament, his Councillors, his Parliaments and sowerigne Courts of the Realme to verify them; and to make such remonstrances as they in their consciences should thinke profitable for the publicke and themselves willingly see them, make necessary consideration, and would haue as good a respect as should be requisite for witness that his Maiesty would use nothing good and take of his good subjects.

The Speech of the Kings learned Councell to his Maiefty.

The Court of Parliament in generall, complained much of this Decree: and the Kings A learned Councell was sent for three severall dayes together to the Loure, First, to heare the reading of the said Decree in Councell: Secondly, to enioyne them to cary it, and to cause it to be read in Parliament: and the third time, to know of them what diligence they had vnder concerning that which had bene given them in charge. They all three humbly besought the King and Queene, to excuse them of this charge, being fitter for other men to cary the message then themselves; but no excuses would serve, the Queene telling them, that the King would have it so; that he desired to preferue his authority, and that the Kings commandements and hers might bee executed without excuse or delay. Whereupon the Kings Proctor generall said vnto the Queene, Madam, you make vs cary B a Torch which will kindle a fire, the embers whereof will continue long, and we feare the event. What event replied the Queene? but that the people will mutine? No Madam said he, but an alteration of the good affections and deuotions of the Kings good subiects and seruants, and the diuision of the greatest companies of this Realme, who administer iustice, which makes Kings to raigne. There was a long contestation about this refusal, yet the Proctor generall fell vpon his knees before the King, beseeching him not to force them to this seruice but to haue regard vnto what they were, and that the quality which they held in the Court of Parliament might excuse them: but the King cryed full, no, no, I will haue it so, and the Queene also: whereupon they were forced to obey.

On the first of Iune, Monf. Seruin deliuered what they had in charge from his Maiefty, C and withall they gaue their aduice vnto the Court, how they might compound this business with the Kings fauour and the honor of the Parliament: which was, That the Court should depute some amongst them to the King and Queene, to let them vnderstand, that by their remonstrances, the Parliament had no intention to thinke or speake of the King or Queenes actions, nor of her Regency and government: to reiterate their great submissions which they had already made, and to make protestations of all seruice, obedience, fidelity and respect: which done, they did verily beleue their Maiesties would rest satisfied. All the Chambers being assembled, the business was taken into deliberation, and in the end it was resolved according to the aduice of the Kings Councell. Vpon the second of Iune in the afternoone, the Kings Councell were sent for to the Loure, to whom the D Queene said, that the King could not heare any thing of the execution of his will, or that the Decree made in Councell had bene read and inrolled: whereupon Monf. Seruin gaue her to vnderstand, that the Parliament was resolved to performe all the duties their Maiesties could desire, and to giue all the satisfaction they can vnto their King, namely concerning the three points which they had desired.

First, That they had neuer thought to speake of the King, nor of his actions.

Secondly, Neither of the Queene mother, or of her Regency and Government: but had greatly commended her wisdom, care, and affection to the good of the Estate, and quiet of the Realme, yet since the Kings Maioity.

Thirdly, That they had not attempted against the Kings authority, by the Decree whereof they complained, and that they did neuer beleue that they had any other authority but what had bene put into their hands by their Kings, neither that they could have any soveraigne power in this Realme but the Kings: so as they could not attempt any thing of themselves, neither could they subsist without his: That they breathed nothing but obedience and faithfull affection to his seruice, and a generous desire for the preferuation thereof. Notwithstanding this protestation, the Queene said, That the King gaue charge his commandement should be executed, and that the Decree should be read and inrolled vpon paine of disobedience: wherewith the Court being made acquainted by the Kings Councell, the Chambers being assembled, there was much consultation touching their proceeding, and in the meane time the Queene sending againe for the Proctor generall, and the Advocates, said vnto them, That hearing the Court had past a Decree, to make such submissions vnto the King as were due vnto him, with a testimony of the honors which they here vnto her the execution of which decree was expected, and that when the Court should begin, the King would giue such answer as every one should rest satisfied.

They making a new protestation of the Courts fidelity & affection to the Kings seruice, with the reuerence & obedience they did owe vnto their Maiesties, finding that the King and Queene by their good countenance (confirmed by their words) had made them con- stration

A stration of their will and intent, whereby the Court might assure themselves of all the good that might be expected from a King which takes pleasure in wife and faithfull seruants: This they thought good to represent vnto the Court, that knowing what had past, they might resolve by their wisdoms of what they should hold fit for the Kings good and seruice. Whereupon the Court being assembled, they decreed to make their humble submissions vnto the King and Queene; after which, matters remained as they were before, the Remonstrances and Decree continued in the Registers Office, and the Decree of the Kings Councell was not inrolled.

During these businesses in France, the Warre reuiued in Sauoy, betweene the Catho- B lique King and the Duke, vpon certaine differences; the King pretending a Title to the County of Aste in Piedmont, & the Duke challenging his deceased wifes Dowry in the Duchie of Millan. The last yeare they had great forces in field on either side, but by the mediation of the Popes Nuncio, and the Marquis of Rambouillet Embassador for the French King, there was a suspension of Armes for foure moneths, either party withdrawing his Armie; whereat the King of Spaine was not altogether pleased with his Gouernour of Millan, for that he had granted the Duke so long a truce and drawne his Armie out of Piedmont, to oppresse his owne subiects in the Duchy of Millan: whereupon he commanded him (by his Letters written this yeare in January) to march with all speed into Piedmont for the lodging of his Armie there; to chastise the Duke of Sa- C uoy, for the reputation of his Armes, and the execution of his commandements.

These Letters were surprised by the Duke of Sauoy, but the rigour of the winter, and the abundance of snow, hindered all warlike attempts vntill March, and in the meane time they prepared their forces. The Duke of Sauoy being aduertised that the Gouernour of Millan, leaued great forces, and made all warlike preparations, with an intent to besiege Aste, and Verceil, he fortified himselfe from France, Lorraine, Swisserland & Holland: and in the Spring both the Armies went to field, where there were many sieges, encounters, and militarie exploits; the particularities whereof I must leaue to the Original.

The Commander of Sillery being sent into Spaine to carry a New-yeares Gift to the D Infanta, from the Christian King: He had also the affaires of Sauoy in charge, to the end he might procure a peace, and know the King of Spaines intention touching that subiect. The Marquis of Rambouillet being aduertised of his Negotiation, hee sent to demand audience of the Duke being at Aste. But the Duke thinking it not fit (considering the state of the warre and his affaires) to treat of a Peace in Aste: he sent him word that by the ninth of May he would be at Valfenera, which was ten miles off, where hee would giue him audience.

At his coming thither, the Marquis told the Duke, that the Commander of Sillery had brought from Spaine, that the Catholique Kings intention was, not to take any satisfaction, nor submission from him; but that he should presently disarm, retaining only such troopes of Souldiers as shall be necessarie for the guard of his places, and for the safety of his estates and Countreys. That the said Duke should referre all the controuersies he had with the Duke of Mantua, to the Emperours iudgement; with promise not to wrong the said Duke of Mantua, nor to attempt any thing but by a ciuill course for all his pretensions. That in doing this, all the places which the King had taken from him should be restored. And if the Catholique King should attempt to wrong him, or his estates, the most Christian King did promise to vndertake his defence.

The Duke of Sauoy hearing of the King of Spaines intention, he held it fit to consider thereof before hee should make any answer, telling the Marquis that hee had a desire to confert with the Prince his sonne, his Councell, and the Embassadors of Princes which were with him touching that subiect; and that on Saturday following, hee would meet him at Quieres, and there acquaint him with his resolution. The Gouernour of Millan being with his Armie before Aste, in the meane time on Whitsunday, there was a great concluded for three dayes, during which truce, the Marquis of Rambouillet went vnto the Spanish Campe to treat with the Gouernour of Millan for the conclusion of a Peace. This truce gaue good hope thereof: The Spanish Armie suffered much, having bene six weeks in one place in great care and want of water: they held their enemies to be defeated but on one side onely, without hope of forcing it: yet both the one and the other were very circumspect not to be surprized during this Treatie of Peace. The Governour of A Millan having made a new Trench, and placed 36. Gabions thereupon, hoped there to make his batterrie, and thence to play vpon the new Fort of Saint Peters, which the Sauoyards had made. But the 21 of Iune, an houre before day, the Marquis D'Yrfe with 800 foot, followed by 800 others, and 200 horse conducted by the Earle Guy of S. George went and fired the said Gabions, and the Sauoyard entered into the Spanish Trenches, where there were many flaine on both sides: the Earle Guy was shot into the shoulder with a Musket, and two Spanish Captaines were flaine. This action was like not only to hinder, but even to break off the Treatie of Peace: yet it was apparently seene, that the Spanish Armie decayed dayly; and on the contrarie the Sauoyard increased with Gentlemen and Souldiers, which (notwithstanding proclamation to the contrarie in France) found the means to get thither.

The Ambassador of France, was very desirous, seeing he had brought the Sauoyard and Spaniard so neere the Temple of peace, that they should enter the same; and to this end exhorted the Duke of Sauoy to signe the Capitulation the same day: which hee did that evening. On the morrow, the Ambassador went vnto the Spanish campe, to cause the Governour of Millan to signe the two promises of obseruing the points of the accord: which were of this tenour:

That for so much as the most Christian King by his Ambassador had invited him; as also his Maiestie of Great Brittain by Sir Dudley Carleton, and the Swissers by their Ministers effectually exhorted him vnto peace, for the publicke good of all Christendome: His Highnesse for the reuerence and respect he beares vnto their Maiesties; and the Common-wealth of Venice, and the desire he hath to satisfie them; and all the world of his good will and loue vnto the peace and tranquillitie of the Christian Common-wealth, according to the desire of the aboue-named Princes and States, is content, and promiseth to disarme himselfe within one month after publication of these presents. And not to retaine out of his whole Armie, above foure ordinarie companies of Swissers for the assistance of his Estates, and defence of his places, and as many of his subjects as shall suffice for their safeties.

He promiseth also not to offend the Duke of Mantua: and touching their differences and pretensions, his Highnesse shall not attempt anything by force against the said Duke, but shall proceed civilly by way of Justice before the Emperor, in regard whereof the Marquis of Rembouillet promised in his Kings name, that the vassals and subjects of the Duke of Mantua, which have caried Armes, and served his Highnesse of Sauoy in the last warre of Montferrat, shall be secured for their persons, and restored to their goods, to enjoy them as before the warre.

All places shall be restored after this disarming, with all the Artillery, Armes, and Munition which was found in them, with all prisoners taken on either side: And in case the Spaniards (contrarie to the Tenour of this Treatie, and the Word giuen by the King of Spaine to the Christian King) shall directly, or indirectly, seek to trouble his Highnesse in his person, or Estates, his most Christian Maiestie shall take their protection vpon him, and shall giue him all necessary aide for his defence. The execution of the retreat of both Armies, shall be made in this manner:

1. The Marquis of Rembouillet shall intreat his Highnesse to draw 2000 foot out of Afte, and at the same instant hee shall write to the Gouverneur of Millan, and intreat him to withdraw the King of Spaines Armie from those places where it now lies, and cause to retire as farre as Croix Blanche: After which the Marquis shall againe intreat his Highnesse to retire the rest of his Armie, retaining onely a sufficient number for the defence of his Estates. And the same day that this shall be agreed, he shall make request vnto the Governour, to retire with all the Catholique Kings Armie out of his Country: And the said Marquis did promise vnto his Highnes in his Kings name, that the Governour of Millan presently after they had disarmed, should so dispose of the whole Armie, as neither his Highnes, nor any other Prince should haue cause of ialousie; neither should they demand in the Catholique Kings name, any passage for souldiers through his Highnesse territories, during the space of six months next ensuing.

His most Christian Maiestie shall presently command the Marshall of Deslignieres, and all the Governours of Prouinces which confine vpon his Highnesse Estates, having effected what he ought, (in case the Spaniards should faile on their part) to assist him with all their forces, without compelling any other order or commandement from Court, and notwithstanding any prohibition they haue formerly had: That the Swissers and Valesians shall haue free passage in the Duchy of Millan, as they had before the Warre. That his most Christian Maiestie should pardon all his Vassals and Subjects, who contrarie to his proclamations had served his Highnesse in this occasion; restoring them to their honours, pensions and entertainments, and granting them all necessarie Letters of absolution according to the custome of France: His Highnesse had three months time to giue aduice to his friends and confederates to forbear from all Acts of hostilitie, yet if anything should be done during the said time, it should not prejudice the peace, his Highnesse restoring those things which should be taken, and giving satisfaction to the parties interested.

And all the said things (except the order which shall be giuen to the Marshall of Deslignieres, and other Governours of France) shall be executed by his Maiestie, after his Highnesse disarming: the said Marquis promising in his Kings name to see the aduices of this Treatie duly obserued, as well for that which doth concerne the most Christian King, as for that which depends vpon his Catholique Maiestie, and to cause all to be executed by his most Christian Maiestie, within twenty dayes after the conclusion of this Treatie, which was signed on the 21 of Iune, by the Duke of Sauoy, the Marquis of Rembouillet, and the Agent for France: His Maiesties Ambassador of Great Brittain did also signe this Capitulation with these words. That they should faile on the King of Spaines behalf, or would directly, or indirectly, undertake against his Highnesse person, or his Estates, that the King his Master would take him into his protection; and giue him all necessary aide for his defence. Signed Dudley Carleton. Now came to the Ambassador for the State of Venice, who the like, promising that if after his Highnesse of Sauoy had disarmed, the Spaniards should faile in the conditions promised, and should offer violence vnto his Highnesse, to violate the relations for his defence with the Crowne of France, and with other Princes, which had subscribed to this Capitulation. Signed Renier Zeno.

After all this the Marquis of Inojola Governour of Millan promised vnder his hand to performe the Articles of this Treatie: and as these words were ended by the declaration of the Christian King without arming or oppressing his subjects with the cruelties of warre, Henric himselfe had beene an Arbitrator betweene these two great Princes, proceeded to the Duke of Sauoy, and stayed this Duke from attempting anything by armes in opposition against the Duke of Mantua.

There doe many times growe ialousies, and afterwards quarrels, betwixt the Countenours, and the Kings Lieutenants in one Prouince. The Duke of Longueuille, Gouverneur of Picardy; and the Marshall D'Ancre who was the Kings Lieutenant there, and Gouverneur of the towne and Castle of Amiens were in no good termes. There happened many things in the beginning of this yeare to increase their quarrell. The Marshall D'Ancre had resolved to settle himselfe in Picardie, and especially in the Citadell of Amiens, where hee had caused certaine houses to be beaten downe neere the bridge, which diuided the Citadell from the towne by a Channell of the River of Soame, the which hee could be so accommodated, as he might draw it when hee pleased. This Bridge did increase the ialousies betwixt the Duke and the Marshall, and betwixt the citizens of Amiens, and the Citadell. The townefmen complaining that they could not goe in and out on horsebacke by the Bridge at their pleasure: All these distrusts betwixt the Duke and the Marshall made them propound an exchange of the Gouverneur of Northmandie, for that of Picardie; the which the Duke would nor accept. In Iune the Duke and the Inhabitants of Amiens had resolved to break the chaines of the Bridge, called Pont Doleit: for the effecting whereof, the Duke came downe accompanied with thirty horse, setting certaine Lock-Smiths on worke to break the chaines: but they were interrupted by some which came out of the Citadell, which caused an alarme within the towne and Citadell, so as all went to Armes. Whereupon the Duke to avoid any further inconuenience, resolved to depart, sending word to the Gouverneur of the Citadell, that although he had not advertised him of his intention to break the Bridge; yet he had sufficient authoritie to doe it as Gouverneur of the Prouince. They told him that without doubt those which had resisted, would be disauowed by the Marshall.

upon this occasion they were of aduice, that he should suffer the Duke of Longueville to break the Bridge in his presence, by which means they should pacifie all their forces. That after his departure they might repaire it againe in the Marshall dole command. Hereupon having in a manner yielded to this aduice, they sent word thereof to the Duke: and de Thier, (who had made all this opposition) was maine to reue from the Bridge into the Citadell with his souldiers: Whereupon hee went to the Governour, who propounded the resolution vnto him with all the considerations, to whom hee answered, That hee had undertaken to keepe and make good the Pont Dole, or there to die; that they might not abandon it, without committing the great battelle which could be imagined, and unworthy of men which bore Armes; And hereupon returned to the Bridge; where hauing spoken with the souldiers, they promised to assist him with the hazard of their liues. Whereupon the Governour ascribed the Duke of Longueville, charging him not to lett him any thing, considering de Thiers resolution. The Duke to auoid some greater combustions, refused to give out his designe, and retire himselfe to his lodging. The newes hereof being come to Court, de Thier was commended; and afterwards advanced to a command of Horse.

The Prince of Conde & other great men retire from Court.

The Duke of Bouillon Letter to President Lamoignon.

Their Maiesties hauing resolved to part, about the end of Iune, to goe into Guiney, all things being prepared in Paris for the marriages. The Companies of Horse being called to accompany them this voyage. And the continuing the ancient Councellers of State, for the government of affaires. All these things I say increased the Jealousies and contentions of the Prince of Conde, and other great personages which had assisted him in his former alterations, taking diuers pretexts to retire themselves from Court. The Prince of Conde was the first. Some write that hee held himselfe wronged by the Seigneurs of Dole, and Bulson Councellers of State; and that he had protested he would inuoluntarily returne to Court while they sat in Council. In the beginning of Iune; The Marshall of Bouillon wrote this following Letter to President Lamoignon, which treats of nothing but matters of State, and shewes reasons of their contentions.

Sir, I had written vnto you, but receiued no answer. I do not thinke that all libertie is best, but that they which haue place and Office in the Kings Council, may communicate what they hope for, or that which is continued in the affaires of State, that by these communications they may find out the means which are offered to carry them to more profitable counsels, and to free them from those which may hurt and weaken the royall dignity, which is the ground-wooke whereon this Estate hath her chiefe support. I haue seene the remonstrances of the Parliament, and the Decree of the Kings Council, by the which itemes his Maiestie is much offended with the Parliament, ordaining that the Decree and Remonstrances shall be cancelled and brought out of the Register vnto his Maiestie. Being none of the Robe to understand their formes, I will make a briefe relation of the thing: which is, concerning the aduice which this great and honorable company giues vnto the King of many things importing his seruice. They forcing nothing, neither in the time, nor in the forme, which his Maiestie and the Queene would hold for the redressing thereof. His Maiestie seemes to referre the remedies to the answer of the Estates grieuances; which Estates as you and I know, had little or no libertie, and less satisfaction to carry into their Provinces; which leaues small hope that in their answers there will be any contentment for the publique. The ouerture made by those Remonstrances will giue his Maiestie occasion to satisfie many bad Censures, which haue beene made of the successe of affaires, seeing that the ouerture to the remedies is ill taken. That we see notable changes in their resolutions, as of the annual Rent called Paulette, and the sale of Offices; which they did allow, and promised solemnly to the Estates; yet since they haue confirmed both, and left them as they were before. They command the General Deputies of them of the Religion, to take a Bribe for their assembly at Gergeau, and yet without any cause or motion of them of the Religion they transferred it to Grenoble. These examples, shew the change of Councils: they speake also of the execution of the marriage, by which it seemes they will augment the feares of such as loue the Estate, the progresse whereof hath beene communicated to few or none of those who principally ought to haue knowledge thereof. Wee see daily many Commissions sealed and dispatched. The Duke of Sauoy more and more oppressed. The King of Spaines forces

A forces a foot in many places, and so shall likewise those of France bee leauied. And why so? but to violate the Kings right, and that of the State, in fauour of his most flourishing enemies: Who sayes it is not good the King should marry? or that the Infante is not the greatest Princeesse in Europe? Who knowes not that the mariages betwixt great personages should marry the persons, but not the Estates, and that in this regard no man hath dislike of this alliance? But the proceedings and preparations make many feare, that it will ingage vs in our former miseries, trouble vs, and make vs lose our ancient Allies, and vnto vs to those which will draw vs from the greatest of our Estate, to the exaltation of theirs; from our rest to troubles; and from the balance which France hath alwayes held in the affaires of Europe, to a forced coniunction with Spaine. The feare of these inconveniences is lawfull, and the desire of the remedy which should be bred in all true Frenchmen, to pray vnto God to inspire the Queenes heart, to diuert it as it seemes easie. If they would with the greatest part of the State deliberate of these things, and take aduice to remedy them, not sparing any one whom they shall finde to be Author of these bad counsels: They shall know them that loue their Maiesties, and the State, and nor by the false colours which are giuen by daily flanders, the which are more credited then truth. And for that I know I am more assaulted then any other, I desire to make my actions knowne to the world. They say I make leaues of souldiers, It is vntrue, but if I should assure my selfe by my friends, what should I doe, but every man in France doth the like? What can I thinke when they leaue forces in France for the Kings seruice, and I am not imploied to haue the chiefe command? If they imploy not me and other good Frenchmen, Is it not a signe that these forces shall serue to support factions contrary to the State. If this be so, why should I suffer my selfe to be oppressed, hauing committed no basenes nor treacherie? Sir, you that loue the King and the Estate, bee a means they may cast their eyes vpon the remedies, and vpon the length and diuersitie of accidents, to the end they may advance the one, and recoyle the other, to the which I will contribute faithfully, and courageously what lyes in me without any consideration of mine owne particular. I will not omit the refusal of that which is due vnto me, in regard of Sedan, and for the protection thereof, which shewes that they neglect the Kings right; and a thing of great importance, the which (notwithstanding these bad affections) I will preferre with the helpe of God for the Kings seruice, and good of France, and that no fraud or power shall diuert me.

To this Letter there was an answer published vnder the name of an ancient Councellor of State, wherein he said, That they which gouerned the State, were the cause of the abuses and disorders. That the Fountaine of all the miseries of France, proceeded from the discontent of great men, who thought they were not fauoured enough. That few busineses concerning the generall good of the Estate had beene concluded, without the aduice of the greatest which were in Court, especially of the Prince of Conde. That their Maiesties desire was to reforme the Council, if there were any necessity. That they stirred vp the people to rebell, rather then ease them. The state of the reuenues since the Kings death, and the great expences to maintain the Kings authoritie, and to preserve France from ciuill Warres in the last alterations procured by the Prince of Conde. That the publishing of the Remonstrances of the Parliament, had beene done by some which fauoured designs preiudiciall to the State. That the King had more interest to maintain the authoritie of Iustice, then any of his subiects. Hee makes answer to the Marshals complaints, touching the change of resolutions in Council, and of their Maiesties care to maintain the alliances of the Crowne of France. That it should be a shame for the King to deferre the execution of the mariages. Their Maiesties holily desire to maintain peace amongst Christian Princes. That the Princes leauied men secretly. Their Maiesties had resolved to be at Bourdeaux vpon the eighth of September: but the insupportable heate, and some affaires of State, stayed their departure vntill the 17 of August: and in the meane time the King had inuited the Prince of Conde by word of mouth, to giue him so much contentment as to accompany him in his voyage, and afterwards hee sent the Countesse of Soissons and the Duke of Neuers to perswade him; but seeing that he was gone from Saint Maur to Clermont, he dispatched the Seigneur of Villeroi vnto him. First, to presse him to satisfie his desire, and to returne to Court to accompany him to Bayonne. Secondly, to learne the cause of his absence: for his Maiestie desired fired that he (being the first Prince of his blood) should have the honour to conduct Madame the Kings Sister, and to receive the Princesse of Spaine his promised Spouse. But he made answer that before he returned to Court to accompany the King in his voyage, they must provide for the reformation of some disorders which were in the State; that is to say: 1, Upon the assembling of the Kings Councell. 2, Touching the Remonstrances of the Parliament: and 3, Touching certaine points which concerned his owne particular, and that of his friends: This being reported vnto their Maiesties by Monsieur de Villeroi, they tooke aduice for reformation of the Kings Councell, and gaue an extract of their intentions vnto him vpon that subiect, and sent him the second time vnto the said Prince, who having presented them, and deliuered his charge, the Prince seemed to allow of the Kings intentions, touching the reformation of his Councell: but touching the other points, which were represented vnto him, he said hee could not resolve any thing before hee had conferred with his friends: whereupon he departed presently from Clermont to Couchy, for two reasons: the first (as they said) was, for that it was easier to surprise his person remaining any longer at Clermont, there being many companies of men at Armes and light-horse lying thereabouts: and the second was, to meete with the Dukes of Longueville and Maine, the Earle of Paul, and the Marshall of Bouillon.

Monsieur de Villeroi sent againe vnto the Prince of Conde.

Monsieur de Villeroi third Voyage to the Prince of Conde.

The King desirous to give content vnto the Prince, and to take from him all subiect and pretext of his absence from Court, he sent the said Villeroi backe the third time, to testifie vnto him his Maiesties loue; where they entered into conference, the which if it had not bene interrupted, it was thought would have given content both to the King and Prince. But his Maiestie considering that time did presse him to beginne his voyage of Guienne; and to be at Bourdeaux the eighth of September, whereof they had aduertised the King of Spaine, they resolved to part on the first of August, their Maiesties giving warning vnto all, which should attend them to prepare themselves: whereof they thought good to aduertise the Prince, and other Princes and Noblemen which were with him, giving the charge vnto the Seigneur of Pont-Chartrain a Secretary of State, commanding him to ioyne with Monsieur de Villeroi to present the Kings Letter vnto the Prince: who coming to Couchy on the 27 of Iuly, acquainted Monsieur Villeroi therewith. But he perfwaded him to forbear the deliuerie, for that hee was vpon the point to reconcile the Prince vnto his Maiestie, and that all would succeed well, if the conference were not interrupted: notwithstanding Pont-Chartrain told him that the King had resolved to depart within sixe dayes, and that hee had given expresse commandement to aduertise the Prince thereof, and to deliuer him his Letters, the contents were as followeth.

Pont-Chartrain brings Letters to the Prince.

Coufin, I have often made you acquainted with my desire, that you should accompany me in my voyage to Guienne, for the accomplishment of my marriage, and have inuited you to come vnto me for that subiect; yea, I have let you vnderstand my good intentions touching certaine points, whereof you desired to be satisfied, before your returne, as well concerning the general, as other things: to which end I have often sent Monsieur de Villeroi vnto you, by whom you might be assured of my affection, & loue, and of the Queen my mothers vnto you. Notwithstanding, I have not yet heard your intention, there being nothing but excuses and delays on your part: wherefore being pressed to depart, I send the Seigneur of Pont-Chartrain, to acquaint you with my resolution, meaning to depart on the first of the next moneth without delay; and to inuite you againe on my behalf, to come and accompany me, and to hold the ranke which is due vnto you by your qualitie and birth; or tell them if (contrarie to my hope) your intent be to make any difficultie, and to deny mee this content, to the end I may be fully satisfied, being the chiefe subiect of his voyage: referring my selfe to that which Monsieur de Villeroi, and he shall deliuer vnto you, I pray God, &c. Paris 26 Iuly 1615. Signed Lewis.

The Kings Letter to the P. of Conde.

The Prince taking occasion to breake off the Conference vpon the Kings sodaine departure: by his answer he besought him to have patience, vntill that hee had given order for these Articles aboue-mentioned, otherwise he could not assist his Maiestie in the said voyage. This was the tenour of this answer.

Sir, vnderstanding by the Letter, which your Maiestie hath bene pleased to write vnto me, of your sodaine resolution to vndertake your voyage of Guienne, and the commandement you made me to come and assist your Maiestie; I was of opinion that this haste depart-

A departure (before you had settled the affaires of your Estate, and provided for the disorders which have bene presented vnto you, as well by the general Estates, as by your Parliament of Paris) was a continuation of their bad counsels which are the Authors, whom I have not heretofore named in my most humble Remonstrances, to the end I might not displease you, nor the Queene your Mother, hoping they would forbear to abuse your Maiesties bounty: but seeing they continue to make vse of your authority for a pretext of their pernicious designs, and violent Counsels, too publique to be any longer suffered; seeing they employ them to the subversion of your Estate, to the weakening of your Crowne, the ruine of your House, and of other Princes, Officers of your Crowne, and chiefe of your Nobilitie; I am forced, Sir, after a long patience to present vnto your Maiestie (with the humilitie of a most humble subiect) the iust reasons which stay mee from obeying your commandement. I will tell your Maiestie, that when I was retired to Creil, it having pleased you to send Monsieur de Villeroi with commandement to come vnto you, making offers that your Maiestie would aduise to settle some good order in the publique affaires of your Realme: I made him answer, that having been eight moneths at Paris, where I had seene the beginning, progresse, and issue of the Estates such as it was, the practices which were vsed to corrupt the Deputies, and to frustrate their deliberations, and resolutions: The Parliament insulted vpon, and vnworthily intreated, for that they desired to serue your Maiestie: my life, and the liues of many other Princes and Lords of qualitie put to compromise; for that wee deliuered our opinions freely in your counsell, touching those things which were presented for your seruice, and the good of the Estate; I could not returne with dignity nor safety, vntill it should please your Maiestie to provide for the reformation of your Counsels, and the publique disorders contained in the remonstrances of your Parliament. Whereupon it pleased you to send him backe againe to Clermont, with a more ample commission, wee conferred together touching the reformation of your Counsell, and the orders which hee had charge to shew mee: and as for the Remonstrances of the Parliament, I did forbear to deliuer my opinion, vntill I had conferred with other Princes, and Officers of your Crowne, which concurre in the same opinion with me, as Monsieur de Villeroi hath given your Maiestie to vnderstand, who not disliking of this reason, had thought good to send him backe to this place, where being aduised this morning, wee were already entered into conference, touching the said Remonstrances, so as matters seemed to bee vpon termes of a good accommodation, whom as the Seigneur of Pont-Chartrain arriving, hee deliuered mee your Maiesties Letter; and acquainted mee with your sodaine departure, the which deprives the publique of the fruit which they expected by the issue of this conference; makes matters impossible to bee executed by reason of your haste: and by this meanes increaseth the disorders which are in your Estate, whereof I am constrained to name the authors vnto your Maiestie, which are, The Marshall D'Ancre, the Chancellor, the Commander of Sillery, Dole, and Bullion, who had bene onely aymed at by the remonstrances of the Parliament, on whom I beseech your Maiestie to doe publique Iustice: ordaining that the complaints made against their actions, may be verified, and that they may bee proceeded against by ordinarie course, according to the usuall forme; as also for the assassinate or murder, committed some few dayes since vpon the person of the Seigneur of Prouille, Sergeant Maior of the Towne of Amiens by an Italian Souldier of the Citadell, ordaining that hee may be deliuered into the hands of the ordinarie Iudges, to proceede in his tryall as so wicked an assassin.

And vntill the orders for the reformation of your Counsell may be made and executed, the Remonstrances of the Court examined, the disorders contained therein provided for, and Iustice done as well on those persons whom I have now named to your Maiestie, as on the said Italian Souldier: I most humbly beseech you to excuse me, if I cannot attend you in your voyage: the which otherwise I would and will without any difficultie, if it please your Maiestie to provide for these things before your departure. Remaining your most humble, &c. Henry de Bourbon. From Concy the 27 of Iuly 1615.

by the refusal the other Princes and Noblemen with him, made to assist the King in this voyage. Whereupon their Maiesties being frustrate of this content which they expected from the said Princes; and that they all declared themselves to be discontented, the which might breed some combustions within the Realme; It was resolved in Councell to aduertise the Gouverneurs of Provinces, commanding them to provide for the safety of their townes, to the end that no troubles might happen to the preiudice of the Kings seruice, and the peace of the Realme. Whereupon Letters were sent into all Provinces, commanding the Governors of Townes, Places, and Castles, not to give entry vnto the said Princes; That they should keepe a strict guard during their Maiesties voyage: Nor receiue any but such as had expresse commission from his Maiestie.

But before I proceed in this publique action of the Kings voyage, I must relate an excess committed at Amiens, whereof the Prince of Conde makes mention in his Letter. The Iudge criminall of Amiens, had caused an Italian souldier of the Cittadell to be hanged for wounding an Apothecaries seruant. The Marshall D'Ancre being at Paris; and receiuing aduertisement thereof, was wonderfully offended, vowing reuenge; and that hee would cause the Iudges nose and eares to be cut off. Hee wrote in choller to Herculaque, Gouverneur of the Cittadell, who excused himselfe and laid the fault vpon Pronville, Sergeant Maior of the Towne. On the two and twentieth of Iuly, Prince Lodouici the Marshals Secretarie came vnto the Cittadell to pay the Souldiers. Pronville hearing thereof went from the Towne to visit him, where making many excuses for that which was past in the execution of the Italian Souldier, hee tooke his leave, and retired. Vpon the way neere vnto Pont-Dolent, hee was met by Alphonso, another Italian Souldier of the Cittadell, who at his first approach gaue him two stabs with his dagger and slue him, and then fled into the Cittadell. The iustice took vp the dead bodie, and vpon the complaint of his kinsfolke and friends, they demanded of Herculaque the Souldier Alphonso to proceed against him. But Herculaque made answer, that it was a businesse of great importance; That both he and the Souldiers of the Cittadell remembered the execution of the Italian Souldier which was hanged: An execution held by all men to haue bene rashly done, and that it had bred ryots betwene the Souldiers of the Cittadell and some inhabitants. Wherefore to maintaine the peace, and to take away all occasions of combustions, he must aduertise their Maiesties of what had past in the death of Pronville: That Alphonso was not to be tryed before the Criminall Iudge of Amiens being a Souldier. That he had caused him to be put in prison, and that according to their Maiesties commandement, he would deliuer him to the Prouost Marshall which should be appointed for his tryall. That Alphonso protested he had no premeditated designe to offend Pronville; who meeting him had vied some words of contempt against his Nation: whereupon they growing into choller, Pronville stricke him with his knife, and he had slaine him.

The kinsfolke and friends of Pronville pretended on the other side, that it was a murder committed of purpose, & commanded by the Marshall D'Ancre and his wife. That Alphonso had bene at Paris, and was returned but three dayes before. That before the fact hee had bene seene walke an houre together alone like a melancholy person, having some had designe: and that Pronville would rather haue stricke him with a cudgel which hee carried then with his fist. Lodouici was sent speedily to Paris to aduertise the Marshall of what had past; who deliuering the Gouverneurs Letters vnto him being in bed, hee swore a great oath, that it was too much, that he should haue giuen him a staffe ouer the face, or done him some affront, and not to haue slaine him. But afterwards by the Marshals commandement, the Gouverneur tooke him out of prison and conducted him himselfe into Flanders.

This death of Pronville happened when as the Duke of Longueville went to the Assembly of Coucy, where the Prince of Conde receiued newes thereof. They all considering that the occasion which was offered by the discontent of the people of Amiens vpon this accident, would aide them much to expell those which were in the Cittadell of Amiens. Whereupon the Duke of Longueville was to returne the next day to Amiens to entertaine such as hee thought were incensed against

A against the Cittadell, and that according the disposition of affaires, the Princes would draw all their forces into Picardy, to assure themselves of Amiens, and of whatsoeuer else they could get by force or intelligence; but the Queene hauing notice herof, shee sent Nerisfan to command in the Cittadell of Amiens, and Longueville gouerned the Towne.

The Duke of Longueville being returned from Coucy to Amiens, the Towne and Cittadell were full of practices, reports, and distrusts. The Duke going out of Amiens on the Saturday morning, the second of August, came backe againe the same night, hee had giuen out that he was gone to hunt the Stagge; and those of the Cittadell belieued hee was gone to Corbie, and that the place was at his deuotion, as well as the heart of Rubempre; that it was the Rendezvous of his friends, that from thence they might with more conueniencie make them Masters of Amiens, and the Cittadell. The inhabitants in the meane time were in feare, apprehending that their Towne would be made the Theater where the Duke and they of the Cittadell would Act their Tragedies. Some of the people which did affect the Duke offered to make a Corps de Garde before his lodging. But they of the Cittadell being armed with the Kings name, and his Letters Patents by which they were forbidden to receiue the Duke of Longueville into any Towne of his government of Picardie; they sent for the chiefe of the Clergie, the Magi-stracie, and the Inhabitants into the Cittadell, to whom hauing read the said Letters containing his Maiesties pleasure, they all protested to continue constant in the Kings obedience.

The Duke of Longueville hearing of all this; as hee was at dinner on Sunday the thirteenth of August, hee was informed that the Captaines and Souldiers of the Cittadell were arming and preparing themselves for some designe. Whereupon his people calling to Armes, they seized vpon a Port, by the which hee retired to Corbie. The Duke hauing receiued this affront, wrote his Letters of complaint vnto the King, informing him, that the Lieutenant and Souldiers of the Cittadell, had suborned two Traitors to draw him from Corbie to Amiens, saying, that it was very necessarie for the Kings seruice, and the preservation of the Towne, that he should goe speedily; the D which hee did in the night, being onely accompanied with three horses. Being armed, the people offered to make a guard before his lodging, the which hee refused, being at free from feare, as hee was from guilt. That being the next day at dinner, they of the Cittadell began to cry to Armes, telling the people that there were 1000 horse at the gates which came to surprize them, seeking by this means to draw them into a mutiny, where assuring themselves that I would come (howsoeuer accompanied) they meant to surprize me; but being aduertised thereof by one of the partie (an honest man then the rest) hee seized vpon a gate where he attended their coming; but they seeing they could not execute their pernicious designe, they sent him a Letter in his Maiesties name, by the which hee had declared him guiltie of high treason, & forbidden all the townes of his go-uernment to receiue him. That hee had retired to Corbie, whether his friends had come vnto him to prevent the like designe, and not to suffer these men to get so great power & au-thoritic in Picardie, as in time to come his Maiestie should be no more obeyed, to prevent the which, hee would willingly employ his life. Befeeching his Maiestie that hereafter he would not engage himselfe in their interests, nor suffer them to abuse his name and au-thoritic; but to doe as Kings his predecessors haue done, which was, To make themselves neuters in particular quarrels, to the end that hee might the more easily oppose himselfe against the violent designs they had vpon his life and fortunes, and that afterwards hee would willingly sacrifice both the one and the other for his Maiesties seruice.

After the declaration of the Kings will, which was sent to all the townes and countie F of his obedience, to forbid the Princes entrance; and that their Maiesties were resolved to depart without any delay. The Prince seeing they would haue no regard into his remonstrances, resolved to warre; but before he would take Armes, hee caused a declaration of his designes to be published, the which hee sent to the King and Queene, and was fled it to be printed and dispersed ouer all France and foraine countries. The chiefe points whereof are.

First hauing often acquainted the King and Queene mother, with the miseries and disorders which afflict France; and multiply dayly. Some about the King and verting this nourishment into poison, made the remedy to bee the entertainment of the A disease. 1. He complains, That demanding iustice for the abuses & disorders within the Realm, they fought to oppress him by Armes, and the Kings forces. 2. That such proceedings against humble suitors, innocents, and unarmed, having beene publickly de-tested, there were yet some good men about their Majesties, which stayed the execution of so pernicious a Councell, and then they propounded a conference, which was concluded at Saint-Marchould by a goodly resolution, for the assembling of the generall Estates of the Realme, the wholesome remedie for domestique wounds. 3. That they did expect a happy successe of the said Estates, and farre other then did appear by the event; the remedies which they had applyed were made fitter to nourish and entertine the disease, then to cure it. 4. That they had made practises throughout all the Prouinces for the election of Deputies; that they had called none to particular convocations, but whom they pleased; and that the libertie of election had beene wholly suppressed by Monopolies, threats, and violencies. 5. That they had sent instructions throughout the Prouinces, of that which they would have inserted in their Bills, the which in many places had beene drawne, and neuer imparted to the bodies of Townes and communities, as well of the Nobilitie, as of the people; so as the Estates assembled had nothing but the name, for that the people hath not yet found any ease by them, nor conceived any good hope, but many prefaces of more miserie. 6. That the house of Commons (which was the greatest part of the assembly) desiring (according to the C affection they beare vnto the King) to provide for the safety of his person, by a reme-die held fit by all good men; they had beene commanded to silence, by a Decree of the Kings Councell, as if the safety of the life of Kings had beene a scrupulous proposition, and not worthy to moue debate: so as by this silence or base preuarication, they have consented to the setting of so dangerous a mischief against the sacred persons of Kings, as to cause the Article to be drawne out of the instructions of the Estates, which mentioned a search of the detestable murder committed on the person of the deceased King of happy memory, whereof the bloody wound cryeth for vengeance before the iustice of God against the treacherous authors of his death. 7. He complains that an Italian Souldier of the Cittadell of Amiens was so audacious as to assassinate pub-likely the Seigneur of Prouille, Sergeant Maior of this frontier Towne, and no iustice hitherto done; and yet in the meane time many Gentlemen have beene rigou-rously pursued for slight causes, being sensible of the treacherie of their household ser-uants; which hath been held a great offence, for that they had affected the said Princes seruice, and hee had taken their protection. 8. Hee said they had vsed all art and inventions to leauy money of the people, and that there had beene thirtie sue or fortice Edicts sealed to that end. That this money was not appointed to come into the Kings Coffers, nor to supply the publique necessitie of the State, but to glur the insatiable couetousnesse of some priuate persons. 9. That these things and many other of the like nature, too boldly attempted, had beene made manifest to the Estates, E who having nothing remaining but the name of their ancient Dignitie, it was not law-full for them to propound any thing without the consent of those which are the authors of disorders; and if any good men (not defiled with corruption, and in whose hearts there remained any sparke of the vertue of our Ancestors) have started for griefe, and cast out the last fobs of their dying libertie, they were put to silence, and by this means the little good which was expected from this assembly was smothered.

Moreover hee said, that being resolved to goe and exhort euery one to lay aside priuate interests, and to bend their affections to the good of the Kings seruice, and the ease of his people, and to expose himselfe first of all to the censure of the Estates, and to awaken their fidelitie and diligence, to doe their endeavors for the laying open of the causes and authors of so many miseries; to propound the remedies; and to beseech the King to punish the guiltie; hee had notice given him, that the King forbade him to goe to the Estates. 10. Hee complained that having forborne to enter into the Estates, to the end there should no fault be imputed vnto him (but that his too great affection vnto the Kings seruice, and the good of the State is made a crime) they would have seised vpon his person, and of other Princes, Officers of the Crowne and Noblemen, who cannot endure to see the Maiesty of their King

A so miserably trodden under foot, nor the shamefull and licentious propagation of all things: And for that the people could not be perswaded that such violencies had beene commanded by his Maiesty. It was concluded in counsell to disarme the Parisians, to change the Captaines of quarters; to take away the chaines of their streets; to weaken the strength of the Towne; and to lodge Swifves and other Souldiers there. 11. He said that as these Estates had yielded no fruit, but penfions and aides to many Deputies of corrupt consciences, and a doubling of miseries, and apprehensions to the poore people;
The Couste of Parliament of Paris (which hath alwayes yielded so many testimonies of her fidelitie for the preservation of this Crowne, which watcheth continually for the Kings seruice; and hath alwayes so profitably directed her Counsels to the good of the Estate) had in March last decreed vnder the Kings good pleasure, that the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and other Officers of the Crowne, which haue place and voice in the Court, should be invited, to aduise vpon the propositions which should bee made for the Kings seruice; the ease of his subiects, and the good of his Estate: they sought presently to perswade his Maiesty that the Parliament had attempted against his authority, and by diuers practises to make the iust intentions of this company to be suspected, yea to moue him to indignation. Whereupon the Parliament having presented their humble remonstrances, whereby they layed open the miseries which did afflict the State, and discovered those which were the Authors: which made euery good man hope to see a speedy reformation of the affaires, & examples of iustice in the punishment of the culpable: But they made a Decree in the Councell of State, declaring the Parliament incompetent, to represent vnto the King the miseries & disorders which multiplied dayly to the oppression of his subiects, and ruine of his Estate; terming them calumnious, & enterprisers of disobedience against his Maiesty, ordaining that (to extinguish the memory) they should be taken out of the Registers of the Court & brought to his Maiesty. 12. He complains that they suffer some Councillors of State to vsurpe all the power of the kingdom, & to change all things as they list, pervert the lawes and order of iustice; to abuse and tread downe the Parliament, suppress all honest true Frenchmen, and the Kings faithfull seruants, all the Court depending vpon them which can giue Penfions, and Benefices, Offices and governments, and dare offer violence at the gate of the Louure, in the Kings Chamber, and in his presence. 13. He saith that the world sees, that since the alliances with Spaine, what contempt they make of forraigne Princes and Neighbours, and of the ancient friends & allies of this Crowne, and the great aduantages the Spaniards haue gotten in diuers places, witness the taking of Aix and Wesell, and many others vniuilly detained by the Marquis Spinola in the Countries of Cleues and Iuliers. They know that this alliance is not onely of persons, but of Counsels. They see that the King goes to mingle his affaires with a Prince which is in his full vigour; opens an entree for him into all the parts of his Realme; communicates his counsels vnto him to receiue his, for the government of his Estate: and they are not ignorant that the Queene his wife will haue her affections, her E fauourites, and her designs. That shee will haue power to bring in Spaniards into the greatest governments of the most important places, as they had seene Italians since the Kings death.

That they were in alarme for the Kings sudden departure, to see them without ne-cessitie (the affaires of the Realme being in so bad an estate) seeke to force Nature, and to hazard the health of his person, by the accomplishment of this mariage; the which might be deferred to another season, to auoid the dangers and inconueniences which are to be feared. In the meane time the King should grow in age, and in strength of body and minde; the affaires in better estate; His subiects more content; his neighbours and allies better assured, and his person in better disposition to marry. Hee should no more depend F on the ambition, couetousnesse, and peruerse affections of any one. Hee should be moderator of his owne will, and hold the reines of his Empire. Hee should be wise to free his people from miserie; strong to resist his enemies, and powerful to assure his ancient Allies. He should be flourishing in peace, inuincible in warre, his Realme filled with all blefsings from heauen, and abound in all earthly felicities.

That they of the reformed Religion, who desire nothing, but rest vnder the benefit of the Edicts, complained also of this mariage, during the Kings tender age; as tending to their ruine; and also of the refusal made by the Nobilitie in the Estates, to demand the maintenance of the Edicts of pacification, the which ought to be observed as a fundamental law of state. And also of the reception and observation of the Council of Trent, sworn so solemnly within these few days by the Clergie, assembled at Paris, in view of the King and of his Council, to the great contempt of his authority, and the honour of his Crowne, a thing neuer heard of before, and which had not been practised in France or elsewhere. Wherefore the Prince affirms that these reasons haue bound him humbly to beseech the King before his departure to provide for the reformation of his Councils, and the disorders of the State. In the meane time to prevent slanders, and to informe the world of the integritie of his intention, hee addes what he thought fit for the satisfying of all Kings, Princes, Estates, and Nations of Christendome; and of the iust and necessarie reasons which moued him to retire from Court.

14. He saith, that since the Kings maiortie, and the assembly of the generall Estates, he hath bene alwayes neere vnto his Maiestie, to testifie his humble obedience by his presence and actions; confessing that he hath bene received with all testimonies of honour and fauour, when he hath bene silent of the publike miseries and calamities; and contrariwise ill intreated whensoever he came to touch this vicer. Every man knew the affronts he had receiued, and that notwithstanding this contempt, (very sensible to a Prince of his quality and courage) he had continued eight moneths in Paris, and although he had been often excited by his duty, provoked by the cry of the publike; and urged by the violence of the cull it selfe; yett had hee alwayes patiently attended and tryed all means, vntill all men saw his presence grew more contemptible, then profitable. And to take away all occasion from such as were wont to caluminate his actions, hee restored into the Kings hands (in view of the Estates) the Towne and Castle of Amboise, which had bene giuen him by the Treatie of S. Manchould; to make knowne vnto all France, that he desired no other security but that which depended on his own innocencie, the fauour of their Maiesties, and the loue of all good men.

That they had vsed his Maiesties name, and sent the Siegneur of Saint Geran to forbid him to goe into the Parliament, vpon diuers occurrents, for the good of the State, with commandement to arrest him if he did not obey this violence, proceeding from the same counsaill's which had often refused put him in the Bastile, with the other Princes and chiefe Officers of the Crowne, which were vnted vnto him. In the end (seeing that he exposed himselfe dayly to all sorts of dangers) he had retired himselfe to his houses for his more safety. After which followed the conferences with Monsieur de Villerey and the Siegneur of Pont-Chartrain, as I haue formerly written. 15. Hee complaines that vnder colour of this conference, they had a designe to surprize him in Clermont, hauing caused many companies of men at Armes and light-horse, to aduance and lodge thereabouts. But now it was no wonder if they had broken off the said conference, and negotiation begonne by Monsieur de Villerey, seeing it did serue but for a cloake to a wicked and pernicious designe, the which they would haue disguised.

With this Declaration the Prince of Conde, with the rest of the Princes and Noblemen which assisted him, publish a Protestation, containing, That they had no other end but to yeeld all humble obedience due vnto his Maiestie, and the Queene his mother: That they did not consent vnto, nor participate with any of the pernicious Councils which were vled in the government of this Estate. That they detested all factions, enterprises, and intelligences against the Kings authority; and that they desired to see a reformation of the State; the people relieved; iustice to raigne; the good to be defended from all violence; the bad to be punished, and things to be restored to their ancient splendour and dignity, by a generall reformation of so many disorders, and by the iust punishment of those which are the Authors. In the end, they entreated and exhorted all men of what condition or quality soeuer, that call themselves Frenchmen, to assist and aide them in so iust a cause, coniuering all Princes and foraine Estates to doe the like, and not to suffer such good and loyall subiects to be suppressed by such a conspiracie. Cuncy 9. August.

The Prince sent this declaration with a Letter vnto the King, beseeching him to take it in good part, if he sent the said Declaration vnto all his Courts of Parliament, and other assemblies, and to all Princes and Estates, his allies and confederates; to the end that every one might know whereto his actions tended, which had neuer any other end, but the good of his estate, and the preservation of his Crowne. Hee wrote also protestation.

The Prince
writes to the
King.

A also vnto the Queene mother, by the which he gave her to vnderstand, That his fidelity, birth, and courage, bound him to complaine of a Letter sent vnder the Kings authority vnto all the townes of France, forbidding them to open him their Gates: Madam, take good aduice, reiect that which is giuen you, seeing by the euent they are found ruinous. Excuse me (said he) if I oppose my selfe vnto the will, offering my obedience to the King, and the respect due vnto your Maiestie; I send vnto the King the declaration of the instigation of my actions past, and what I shall haue to doe hereafter, which he will communicate I hope vnto your Maiestie. Hee sent also this Manifestation vnto all the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, and to each one a Letter of almost one tenour.

B As for the Letters which the Prince sent vnto the Parliaments, he besought them, Not to endure (during his Maiesties tender age) those Ministers of State, which made a pretext of the Kings name to ruine the ancient Maximes and fundamentall lawes of the State, for the preservation whereof their Court had bene established; Ioyne (said he) your desires with mine, which tend but vnto the publicke good, without any particular interest; this I protest and sweare vnto you, which I beseech you to beleue. It is written, that all the Soueraigne Courts to the which he wrote, sent the packets forthwith vnto his Maiestie without opening them.

On the thirtieth of Iuly, the Prince had sent the Seigneur of La Hay to the Assembly of the Reformed Religion at Grenoble; and he likewise sent to the Maior and Sheriffs of

C Rochell, writing as followeth.

My matters, I send vnto you the Seigneur of Gruyolle, to let you vnderstand, that I haue likewise sent vnto the Assembly at Grenoble, and to enforme you particularly of that which hath past in the conference betwixt me and Monsieur de Villerey, and the resolution which I haue thereupon taken: by the which I inuite you to ioyne your felues to my holy intentions, as well for the preservation of the State, as to maintain your felues in particular. It concerns you. The assistance that my Father and Grandfather haue alwayes had from you, makes me to hope for the like courtesie from you, seeing that I haue the same affection to serue you. His Letter to the Assembly at Grenoble was to the same effect.

D Their Maiesties being aduertised of all these proceedings, and that the Prince continued discontent, yea that he meant to take Armes, it was resolved to provide for the safetie of the Townes and Prouinces of the Realme, especially for the Isle of France and Picardy, whither they sent many Commissions to leaue souldiers, and the Regiments of Ram-burge and Nauarre were set on foot. The towne of Soissons (being the chiefe retreat for the Princes) their Maiesties were enformed that it was easie to surprize; there being yet no souldiers within it; and that the chiefe inhabitants would countenance this enterprise, if their Maiesties would send some souldiers of the Regiment of the Guards to execute it. They made this action so easie, and the profit so great, (for that it seemed if this Towne were taken from the Princes, they should be forced to liue in peace) that one night they drew 800 men out of the Regiment to doe this execution. But as in ciuill warres there is alwayes some friend in the Cabinet, by whom they discouer their conclusions; so the Duke of Mayenne (being aduertised of this designe) put so strong a Garison into Soissons, as the troops (finding it was discouered) returned to their lodgings. Afterwards, the Duke purthoof out of the Towne whom he suspected to affect their Maiesties seruice, and to haue any credit within the towne.

All things now prepared to armes on either side, the Marshall D'Ancre leaues Paris, and comes to Amiens on the sixt of August, where he began to raise 600 horse, and 4000 foot for the preservation of Picardy. Hee presently aduertised all the Gouernours and Maiors of Townes of their Maiesties intention, contrary to that of the Duke of Longueuille: all assure him of their fidelity to the King. Hee of Arrdes (who was held to affect the Duke) remained a neuter during these combutions. But the Gouernor of Chastelet followed the Princes party, contrary to the promise he had made. The Marquis of Bon-neur sought to fortifie himselfe in Estaples, but it was without effect: So as in all Picardy there was not any but Ruberpré in Corbie, and Haraucourt in Chastelet, that declared themselves of the Princes partie. There were great leaues made in Picardy for both parties. Gentlemen who leauied Souldiers for the Princes. Hee came thither, found him in his house, spake with him, and yet suffered him to escape; the Prouost returned to Amiens; thinking to excuse himself, saying, he could not execute the Marshalls command, without killing of the Gentleman, and that hee had no compassion to take him aliuie or dead; wherewith the Marshall was much discontented, and causing a gibbet to be set vp, he told the Prouost that he should be hanged; for an example to all others to serue the King faithfully. The Prouost was in great feare of his life, although he were not committed; but the Noblemen which were with the Marshall interceded for him, and obtained his pardon, for the which he gaue them thanks.

The Marshall of Bois-Dauphin Lieutenant general of the Kings army.

Being resolu'd in Councell to raise an army, the Marshall of Bois-Dauphin was made Lieutenant General of the Kings Army (which should consist of 1500 horse, 8000 French foot, and 2000 Swisses) in the Ile of France, Brie, Picardy, and Champagne, during their Maiesties voyage, to stop the passages of the Riuers, and to oppose himselfe against the Princes attempts: They put new Garisons into the townes vpon the Riuers of Seine and Marne, forbidding them to suffer any to passe without authority from the King or the said Marshall. The Bridges of Nante were broken by the Kings commandement: and in the meane time the Princes lay still at Coucy, Corbie, and Soissons, without any apparant shew of leauying any troops.

It was decreed that their Maiesties should part from Paris on the 17 of August, and that the Duke of Guise should conduct Madam the Kings sister, promised vnto the King of Spaine; to Bayonne; and receiue the Infanta which should be married to the King, which was a great honor to the Duke. They drew much money out of the Bastile, for the extraordinary expences of this voyage: and the Assembly of the Clergy (which was then held at Paris, to heare the accounts of their Receiuer general) promised to giue their Maiesties 44000 pound sterling.

The Magistrates of Paris sent for to the Louure.

Before their Maiesties departure, the Prouost of Merchants of Paris, with other Magistrates, were sent for to the Louure, where they receiued commandement to haue a speciall care to all things which pass within the City and thereabouts during the voyage: to looke into the dispositions of all men: to prevent seditions and tumults: to hinder practices & factions: and to be watchful, that there should be no leauies of souldiers, nor transport of armes or munition for warre, but for the Kings seruice: that their Maiesties left the guard of the Citie to the fidelity of the Burgeses vnder the authority of Monsieur de Lion-court their Gouverneur, and of President Miron Prouost of Merchants of the same Citie: and to assure and comfort the Parisians during the Kings absence, his Maiestie said that he left with them Monsieur his brother, desiring them to guard him carefully.

The King departed from Paris.

The day for the Kings departure being come, having taken the oath of fidelity from the Magistrates of the Citie, the Court of Parliament, and some other Officers, he went out of the City by five of the clocke in the morning. It is written, that some dayes before, he had sent word to Monsieur le Jay, one of the Presidents of the great chamber, that he desired to make vse of his seruice in this voyage: But hee excusing himselfe by reason of his indisposition, their Maiesties grew iealous of him, which made them loath to leaue him in Paris during their voyage. Whereupon two Exempts or Yeomen viuers of his guards, with 15 Archers of the body, went in his Maiesties name vnto the President, and told him that hee must refuse to depart presently, for that the Kings pleasure was hee should follow him in this voyage. They found him laid in his bed, ill disposed and sicke, yet notwithstanding any excuse, they caused him to rise suddenly, and going out of his house, they put him into a Caroch drawne by sixe horses, and let downe the windowes, and in this manner he was conducted by twelue or fifteene horse to Amboise, and there put into the Castele vnder a good guard.

President lay carried away.

The Queene mother parted after the King, and the Noblemen and officers in like manner: but about three of the clocke in the afternoone, Madam the Kings sister went out of Paris in great state. The Prouost of Merchants and the Sherifes of Paris (hauing the honor alone to accompany the Daughters of France, when they goe out of Paris to accomplish the promise of their marriages) prepared themselves to performe this duty vnto the Lady, and to take their leaues of her: they sent commandement to the 16 Capitaines of the quarters, to come to the Towne-house by two of the clocke in the afternoone, with twelue Burgeses out of euery quarter on horse backe: and the like charge was giuen vnto the

A the three Companies of the Archers to be there also on horsebacke. All being ready according to the accustomed order, the Prouost and other officers being attired in their lueries on horse back, went to the Louure, where hauing saluted the Lady, she came forth and entered into a Litter, open on all sides, and richly embroydered with gold and silver, and so she passed through the streets of Paris with great ioy and acclamations, they wishing all happinesse to her voyage and marriage.

The day after the Kings departure, President La Hayes wife came to the Court of Parliament, complains of her husbands imprisonment, and craues their assistance and fauour in her distresse; at whose instance there were certaine Councillors of the Court deputed to goe vnto the King to know his pleasure: who had no other answer from his Maiestie, but that he meant to vse his seruice in that voyage: but the cleare sighted Iudged it should be but to the Castele of Amboise, where they would lodge him; which they conceiued was done, both for that he had great credit in the Parliament, and was very familiar with the Prince of Conde, who came often to visit the President during his abode in Paris.

Now after the Kings departure they beganne to draw their Forces together, and to frame their camps. The King is at Meaulx. On the 20 of August, the Marshall Bois-Dauphin being in Paris, gaue order for ammunition bread for his army, consisting then but of 4000 foot, and 7 or 800 horse, but there came presently vnto him many Commanders, Noblemen, and Captaines; among others, Monsieur de Pralin, the Barons of Vitry and Monglas, Colonel Gallati, the Baron of Buify, D'Amboise, Bailloupiere, La Marke, Rembure, and diuers others: In the meane time the Princes leaue new troops about Noyon, and Soissons, Corbie, Abeuille, Sedan, and Mezieres. This great preparation to armes on either side, doth amaze and terrifie the poore people with the euent of the warre: The villages in Picardy and Bry are abandoned, and they retire their goods into Townes and Castles: about Paris the peasants carie away all they might lose; yea the very suburbs of the City was left empty both of people and goods; fearing that if the Prince should aduance with his army towards Paris, or neere vnto it, to find a passage; his troops would spoile euen vnto the very gates, which apprehension continued from the Kings departure vntill the end of October. They put strong Garisons into Saint Denis, Saint Clou, and other places, as well for the assurance and commodity of the City of Paris, as to guard the passages of the Riuier of Seine against the Prince.

Troops leauied for the King and Princes.

The Prouost of Merchants and Magistrates of Paris, sent to Corbeil, to know if they needed any Forces for the preservation of their Towne; who gaue them thanks for their care, but refused any helpe; saying that the place had at other times defended it selfe against greater attempts, and that now the danger was not so much to be feared, as they must haue recourse to Garisons and new Forces, onely to guard the passage of a Riuier.

Paris and other townes forbide themselves.

They fortifie themselves euerywhere, apprehending the danger to bee greater then it was. Paris labours in the reparation of her wals; repairs the chaires within, keeps good guard at their gates; keeping nine open, they shut vp sixe. Saint Denis doth neither solemnize Holyday nor Sunday, the inhabitants are so busie continually about their fortifications. The Reliques and other pretious things, reserved in the Treasury of the Abbey, are for more safety sent to Paris: so great was the bruite of warre in the Ile of France.

In the meane time the Duke of Montbazon leaues troops in Normandy for the Kings seruice, assures them of Rouen; puts Garisons in places of most importance where need required, especially towards Picardy and the sea coast. In Champagne the Marquis of Vicville the Kings Lieutenant there, with Dandelot and others; observe the Prince of Tingre; and hinder his surprizes, yet they could not prevent it, but that his souldiers being about foure hundred foot, and three hundred horse, spoiled the Champagne country, & until they were defeated by the inhabitants of Troyes, who slue many of them.

The Duke of Montbazon assures Normandy.

The Prince relying vpon his friends promises, leaues Coucy and retires to Soissons, where he finds the Dukes of Longueuille and Mayen, who had disarmed the inhabitants, seized a good Garison, and made himselfe master of the place. The Prince was received with all honor and respect, being followed by many Noblemen and Gentlemen.

About the end of August the Marshall of Bouillon came to Soissons with good numbers of horse and foot: he brought artillery with him, and good store of munition, especially of armes for their foot; but it was not sufficient for their new leauied souldiers:

The Prince's preparation to armes.

for the Prince found men enough, but they could hardly recover armes: the King having given commandment throughout all the townes, that they should not suffer any to passe but for his service. They got some quantity out of Paris, but without the knowledge of the inhabitants: for being once discovered that the Prince had any intelligence in the towne for the recovering of armes, the Gates were more strictly guarded, and every thing searched that went forth.

The Duke of Bouillon made Marshall of the Campe.

The Marshall of Bouillon being come to Soissons, hee was made Marshall of the Princes campe: All the armie is mustred, and within few dayes Noyon was wholly reduced to their obedience, where the Campe was assigned, and all commissions deliuered for the leauing of men. As soone as the Princes campe was settled at Noyon, the Kings Forces, commanded by the Marshall Bois-Dauphin, prepare themselves to march, and to stop the Princes passage.

The Kings
Declarat<sup>on</sup> against the Prince of Conde and his associates.

In the meane time their Maiesties goe on their voyage and come to Poitiers, where on the tenth of September the King made a Declaration, whereby he deprived the Prince of Conde, with the other Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and all which did assist and adhere unto their designs, of all their honours, Estates, offices, governments, pensions, priuiledges and prerogatiues, which they had from him or his Predecessors: declaring the said Prince and all his adherents, disobedient, rebels, and guilty of treason: commanding all his soueraine Courts and others, to seize vpon their persons and goods; if within one month after the publication thereof in the Court of Parliament, the said Prince and they which did assist him, did not acknowledge their faults, and come or send vnto him to performe that effectually which belongs vnto their duties: and in regard of gentlemen and priuate subjects, if they did not make declaration and protestation enrolled in some of his Courts, and did not abandon all actions and enterprises contrary to his authority and seruice.

This Declaration brought vnto the Court of Parliament at Paris to be verified: There were diuers opinions by reason of the Prince of Conde the third person of France: some were of opinion they should write vnto the King, and lay downe the reasons and considerations why the Court could not proceed to the publication and enrolling thereof: that it should be sufficient to forbid the taking of armes without the Kings commission: and to enioyne all the Princes to goe and attend their Maiesties persons to doe their seruice. Others said, that the rebellion being so plaine and apparant, they should sinne against the Maximes of State, if they should not follow the Kings will. So the 13 of September it was verified, and a decree published and fixed on the corners of the streets of Paris.

The proceeding of the two armies.

Their Maiesties comming to Poitiers on the fourth of September, they stayed there vntill the third of October, for that the young Lady fell sick of the small pox. In the meane time let vs observe what passed betwixt the two Armies. The King on the one side, and the Prince of Conde with his friends on the other, made leaues of souldiers in all the prouinces of France: But the King had the advantage at the bridges of Riuers and of Townes, which made his army the stronger, and much hindered the Princes from passing the Loire, and those Lords which had leauied troops for him beyond the riuier of Seine from ioyning with him.

The taking of the Siege of Friaize.

During their leaues it happened, that Friaize one of the Princes Gentlemen, being at Chartres in Beaufie, was there taken, with commissions to leaue companies for his seruice: being thus seized on, hee is caried to Paris, imprisoned, and deliuered ouer vnto the Parliament, to bee proceeded against: the Court deputed certaine Commissioners to make his processe, and it was bruted through all Paris that hee should bee executed; but many good and particular considerations stayed the Parliament from further proceeding. Before this resolution of the Court, the Prince being advertised in what danger Friaize was in doing him seruice, laboured to free him: He wrote first to the Marshall of Bois-Dauphin, demanding his friend detained prisoner, promising to doe the like by the first which should fall into his hands: To whom the Marshall answered; That hee could not hinder iustice, nor giue any pardons, the which was referred to the King and the Parliament. Whereupon the Prince wrote particularly to the Court, setting downe the causes which had moued him to take armes, which hee laid were for his Maiesties seruice, the preservation of his Estate, the good of the publicke, and the reuenge of the deceased Kings death. Then making relation of the taking of this Gentleman, he concludes thus; And

A to the end, I may haue no cause to complaine, I beseech you to entreat him in such sort, as I may haue no occasion to liue otherwise then I haue propounded, resoluing hereafter to make all those which shall fall into my hands to endure the same which hee shall suffer. I shall be much grieved to come to these extremities. But seeing the enemies of the State are resolu'd to all rigour, I will doe the like, and will make reparaill of the goods and persons of such as shall meddle in this businesse, if the fortune of the warre put them into my hands.

In the beginning, the Princes army was about 1500 good horse, as well men at armes, light horse, as Carabins; and about 4 or 5000 foot, but most of them ill armed: with two Culuerins, and two field pieces. The Duke of Longueville had in his troope which hee brought out of Picardy 4 or 500 horse, and 1500 foot. The Seigneur of Montbarot was his Marshall. The Duke of Mayen had 3 or 400 horse, and some foot: The Viscount of Tannes his brother in law was Marshall of his trooops. These two trooops made the foreward. The Princes troop consisted of 3 or 400 horse, and that of the Duke of Bouillon of 300 horse, and 800 foot, the which were well armed. Some write, that these Princes being at Noyon, concluded:

The estate of the Princes
army at Noyon

I. That as their armes were leauied for the good of the State, the charges should bee borne by the money which was ordained for the maintenance of the Crowne: That they should appoint places for the receipt of the Kings money, whereof the Marshall of Bouillon should haue the direction as well as the conduct of the army.

The resolution of the Princes.

II. For that the townes of Roie and Montdidier did hinder the free passage between Noyon and Corbie, the army should approach, to the end they might make some attempt vpon those townes.

III. That from thence they should march into the Country of Beauvoisin to put garisons into the Castle of Clermon, and the towne of Creil vpon Oyse, and there appoint the receipt.

IV. That from thence they should crosse into Vexin, to force some one of the Bridges vpon the Riuier of Seine, that they might ioyne with the trooops which the Vidame of Chartres had leauied in Beaufie and thereabouts, and that they should send for the Duke of Luxembourg to come with his trooops which hee had leauied in Champagne.

V. That to winne the hearts and affections of the Parisians, the army should not approach neere vnto the City, and preserve all their Countrey houses.

VI. That they should march with what speed they could into Guenne to ioyne with the Earle of Saint Paul and their other friends, to the end they might hinder the execution of the mariages, and take from their enemies the government of the State.

With this resolution the Princes army passeth the Riuier of Oyse, and lodgeth about Roie and Montdidier, but they preuailed nothing; the townes being well supplied with m<sup>unition</sup>, whereupon they turned head towards Clermon. In the meane time the Marshall Bois-Dauphin (who was stronger in foot and Cannon then the Princes, but not in horse, for that his trooops were not yet come vnto him) put good garisons into all the townes, bridges, and passages which are vpon the Riuier of Oyse, and at the same instant hee put a garison into Creil. The Princes being advertised that all the bridges vpon the Riuier of Seine from Paris to Rouen were strongly guarded, they altered their first designe, and resolved to seeke their passage through Champagne, over the Riuers of Marne, Seine, and Yonne, which was a great march for their army, yet notwithstanding it encreased daily.

On the 17 of September, 4 or 500 souldiers of the Regiments of Piedmont and Picardie, were charged by the Duke of Mayen, with the Princes Cheualierie, who defeated them, and put them to runne, where some were slaine vpon the place, and many drowned in the Riuier of Thierin: some Commanders, with many souldiers, were taken prisoners, all which the Prince released, except those which would follow his party: In which defeat they got armes for 200 souldiers. The Marshall Bois-Dauphin hearing that the Prince had a desire to passe the Riuier of Seine at Pontoise or Poisse, came and encamped at Daumartin; and fearing lest he should attempt to surprize Saint Denis, thereby to annoy Paris, the Parisians thought good to send 200 men to fortifie the garison, the towne being of great guard. But the Princes went and passed the riuier of Seine at Soissons, and thereabouts, and marched directly to Chasteau Thierry, which they did inuest, causing part of their armie to passe the riuier of Marne, which was then so low, as they might easily wadethrough. The Kings army made haste to relieue this towne : but the Marshall of A Bouillon having discharged some volleys of Cannon, the inhabitants were so amazed, as they forced the Gouvernor to yield to a composition, which was made the last day of September. The Prince being entred, he exacted a good summe of money from the inhabitants. The Marshall Bou. Dauphin hearing of the yeelding of this towne, he imagined that the Princes would turne the head of their army towards the riuier of Seine where vpon he sent garisons to Montreault-Yonne, and other townes where there were bridges, but the riuers were so shallow, as they might easily wade through them. The Kings army lying about Sezanne in Brie, mustred about 10000 foot, and 2000 horse. The Princes army marcht vp on both sides the riuier of Marne, as if they meant to inuest Espenay : the which did so amaze the inhabitants, as they yeelded suddenly, where the Prince also leaued great summes of money.

Espenay yeelded to the Princes.

Progress of the Princes army.

The Marshall of Bonillon having received a commission from the Prince, appointed Espenay for the receipt of the Kings reuenues from the hands of the Kings Receiueurs : and thereupon gave warrant to two of his guard to force the said Receiueurs to deliuer such money as was due by them, vnto one whom he had appointed for the receipt thereof. The Princes gaue it out, that they would besiege Rheims, but they presently marched towards Nery vpon Seine, where they passed their Cannon through the riuier with much ease ; then turning towards Yonne, the Kings army past those two Riuers at Montreault, to hinder their attempts against Sens, Joigny, & Auxerre. They thought the Prince would attempt Sens, where the inhabitants did much affect him, by reason of his neighbourhood. The army came to Marigny, whereas the Duke of Luxemburg (called Prince of Tingry in his fathers life time) joined them with 300 horse. The Prince coming within a league of Sens, heard that the Marshall was entred, and that the Kings army was thereabouts : whereupon the army marched vp the riuier of Yonne, and passed at diuers Fords neere vnto Joigny, so as they which had leaued troops for the Princes between Seine and Loire, had good meanes to ioyne with them. The Duke of Luxemburgs troops lying at Chanlay neere to Joigny, were inuested by part of the Kings army, and in the end (after some volleys of great shot) forced to yeeld by composition, where they lost all their forces and baggage. The next day being the 22 of October, the Princes army forced a small towne called Epoungny, and spoiled it. It is written, there were great violences and rapes committed, whereof the Prince and Duke de Mayen being aduertised, they caused two souldiers to bee hanged. The two armies were neere together about Bony, where there was some appearance of a battell, if the Princes had not marched away in the evening, and past the riuier of Loire at Neufuy, by three Fords ; at what time the Duke of Luxemburg (who for the losse which he had at Chanlay could not follow them) having obtained a passport from the Marshall Bou. Dauphin, retired into Champagne with many others which did accompany him. And at the same instant there were 600 Reiters (which had crossed through Champagne from Sedan) came to the bankes of Loire, and waded through it, and then ioynd with the Princes army in Berry.

600 Reiters come to the Princes.

The Marquis of Repel, Gouvernor of Vitry, hearing of their march, without any further discouery of them, went to charge them with certaine Carabins, they (who had double the number and were all souldiers well mounted and well armed) had some put to rout these Carabins : where the Marquis was slaine vpon the place. He was a valiant Gentleman of the House of Amboise, whose death was much lamented. But it is commonly said, an ill fortune comes not alone, for this death was the second which the House of Amboise receiued during this warre : for in September past, certaine Cheualiers of either army meeting neere vnto Clermont, charged one another, in the which Bussy D'Amboise was slaine on the Kings side, having aduertised himselfe too farre. His death was much lamented by the Marshall Bou. Dauphin and all the Commanders of the army.

Death of Bussy D'Amboise.

Matters doe not alwaies succeed according to the desires of Kings, Princes, and great men. The Princes had conceit that their friends in Guienne of either religion should haue so much power and credit, as to procure their Maiesties to end their voyage at Poitiers : but they were deceived. For they entred into Bourdeaux the 7 of October. Madam parted the 21 to goe to Bayonne, and from thence came to the Riuier of Bidassio to accomplish the exchange of the marriages, and all without any let, as you shall heare. On the other side their Maiesties (who had great confidence that the Assembly at Grenoble would

A would end to their contents, and that the Marshall D'Espenay had credit enough to hinder their dissensions) found the contrary to their expectation.

The Assembly having still crated the assistance of the said Marshall by their Propos he came on the 21 of October into the said Assembly, flying vnto them. Edictes de Justice Letters were full of shewes of their loue and fauour, and that although the Duke of Rohan and Sully gaue testimony of the violence and correspondence which they would haue in the resolutions of the said Assembly. But whereas it seemed they had refused to retire from that towne, by reason of the Letters which they had receiued from their Deputies at Court, whereby they had no great hope of any good answer to their requests and grievances, he would by no means aduise them to it, before they had receiued the answer and the Kings commandemens. To say, that, often youd intervene from hence you will goe and continue, together in some other place, as they did a little before the Edicts of Nantes ; I must answer, That there was no forced peace betwix them of the Religion, who liued vnder toleration in those times : but to make that berry now, were directly to breake the said Edict, and to subuert the Churches : neither could they doe it without the content of their Princes, and the Kings permission : it were a matter of distrust where there is no cause ; at which a signe of distrust is by an unlawfull change, whereby they should offend his Maiesty, and make him think that his subjects of the religion (who haue alwaies been a patient of perfect obedience) proiect an open rebellion without any lawful cause. The offence his Maiesty shall reueale will be very sensible, and therewithall not want to aggravate the crime, especially those which seek authority by armes, and to haue the chief command : They haue talked of the stay of the marriages : it is now too late : the King is now gone aduanced, and the Prince is in the remotest part of the Realme, who doth not anything capable to deferre it : Nay it seems hee hath giuen ouer this instance, to content himselfe with the obseruation of the ancient Ordinances which doe not allow strangers in the Court, nor to hold any offices or benefices in the Realme.

The marriages being accomplished, there is no doubt but the Queen will be ready able for to content the Prince vpon the rest of his demands, whereas there had been some speech as Tours, to send the Seigneur of Rignac to the Duke of Bouillon and the Duke of Neuch, who holds himselfe neuer, is ready to employ himselfe in this treaty : besides that, as the Prince is resolved not to attempt anything, for the Mar shall Bou. Dauphin is commanded not to aduance, which makes men think that there is no cause to despaire : whereas they must content themselves within the bounds of discretion, and not to draw vpon the Churches the hatred of the troubles of the State.

The Assembly must wisely foresee what it may obtaine according to the condition of the present estate and our owne : Wee must measure our felues to that which wee may, and not to what wee would, to that we may get, and not to that which we thinke doe vnto vs. If we match alwaies by declining, without doubt wee shall fall into the precipice of warre. Behold the inconveniences which will follow, and cannot be avoided. We would haue our union appare, and it will bee disioyned more and more : for there will bee a great number of them of the Religion found, who (being wise and well aduised) would neuer consent to their owne ruine. The Deputies to whom peace hath bene especially recommended, will bee disaduowed at their returne : and they will be demanded why they haue concluded of things whereof they had no Commission to giue their opinions. The King shall bee counsellled to take the way of rigour, or of mildnesse : if of clemency, in suffering them which containe themselves to liue vnder his Edicts, hee shall with draw from them that take armes, most of the men by whom they should be assisted ; And to the shall haue an easie conquest of the rest. If of rigour, in forbidding the Exercise, and in entreating them of the Religion, who haue no retreat, there will bee lost in one day, five or three hundred Cowards. The felues will let their felies vpon their throats, they will lose no occasions to make massacres, finding the people slaine against those whom they hold the authors of the warre. All good Frenchmen who would put vs, and euenque, for vs : if wee were persecuted, without cause, we will then defend and hate vs as turbulent persons which cannot be content to live in rest and quietnesse. A

And what can be the event of this warre? They must iudge whose many years have taught them great experience. They will consider the difference between necessary armes, and those which are willfully undertaken: betwixt the resolution of one of the Religion pressed and persecuted, and one that may live at quiet. They will remember how often our fathers and we have fighed for such a liberty as wee now enjoy: they will observe that there is no Estate in Christendome, vnder a Prince of a contrary Religion, where it hath the like: the Gospell generally preached; the Ministers partly entertained at the Princes charge; many places given them for their safety, and the garisons paid by him, and chambers erected to doe them iustice: In the which if there be any defect, wee may iustly craue reparation; the better to settle the condition of our Churches. But wee will not exceed the bounds of conscience or wisdom; of conscience in taking armes, which cannot be blest of God but when they are iust; nor iust, if they bee not necessary. Of wisdom, in hazarding against stronger and better prepared Forces then ours, a certaine condition, vpon a weak hope of some small advantage.

Some one will reply, that our condition is not secure by reason of the alliance with Spaine: whereunto I will answer, That a Prince which takes his neighbours daughter, doth not marry his Counsell, neither will hee willingly set fire on his Estate to doe him a pleasure: Wee haue leisure to see the forme come, and to prepare for our owne preferation.

Finally, having continued constant in our duties, if they seek to deprive vs of our religion, or to take that from vs whereon our liberty and safety depends, purchased by the blood of our fathers and our owne, and granted vnto vs by that great King the restorer of France: we shall enter into this carriere full of iustice and true zeale; finde againe in our breasts the courage and vertue of our ancestors; wee shall bee supported in our iust defence by all good Frenchmen; assisted by all Princes and Estates which loue the true religion, or the good of this Estate: and in a word, we shall bee fauoured with the blessings of God, whereof wee haue heretofore had good experience in our armes, and which will bee to the glorie of his Name, and the spiritual advancement of our Churches.

His conclusion was, That he wished them to forbear from all violent courses; if a iust necessity did not force them; and that they should attend in that place for those which they had sent vnto his Maiestie, to vnderstand his pleasure; which was not onely his aduice, but also many other Noblemens of the said religion.

The Assembly
goes from Grenoble to Nismes.

Within some dayes after, contrary to this graue aduice, the Assembly left Grenoble, and went to Nismes in Languedoc. Men spake diuersly of this translation made of their owne motion, contrary to the Kings will. Some write, that the practises of the Prince of Condes agents were the chiefe cause: afterwards the King sent them word, that he would allow of the continuation of the said Assembly at Montpellier: wherevpon the Deputies would not yeeld, saying, That the same reasons which had caused them to retire from Grenoble, preferred themselves at Montpellier: that is to say, a Governour for the King, and a Soueraigne Court, which might direct them from their resolutions.

This change of the Assembly was nothing pleasing vnto the Marshall Disseguierres, to whom they sent their Deputies to entreat him not to abandon the body of the said Assembly, assuring him that hee should alwayes find amongst them the rancke and respect which was due vnto his quality. To whom hee answered, That hee would continue alwayes vnited, notwithstanding the displeasure hee felt by their change.

The King goes
from Poitiers.

Madame the Kings sister being recovered, they parted from Poitiers the third of October. It was expected there would haue beene some opposition made vpon the passing of the river of Dordone, there being many good townes of safety vpon that river, which were held by the Protestants, and many great men were on the Princes party, as the Earle of Saint Paul, the Duke of Rohan (who should haue beene their leader) the Marquis of La Force, Governour of Beanne, the Seigneurs of Boisse, Fausse, and Pardillan, with many other Lords of Guisane, all which should ioyne together, and make

A make the bodie of an Armie of one thousand horse, and foure thousand foot. But their Maiesties were resolu'd to force a passage, hauing twelue hundred horse, with the Regiment of his Guards, in which there were about three thousand men, and the Swisses.

The King being at Angoulesme, the Countesse of Saint Paul had to labour with the Earle her husband, as shee reconciled him to their Maiesties, and Frontac and Caumont were assured for their seruice: The Earle came afterwards to Bourdeaux to their Maiesties.

During the Kings abode at Angoulesme, there fell out an accident which troubled them. The Earle of Candale, eldest sonne to the Duke of Epemon, had ioynd himselfe to the Duke of Rohan, and made profession of the reformed Religion. This did much trouble the Duke his father (whom they of Rochel held for their capital enemy) and hee was so inwardly afflicted, as he fell dangerously sicke. Thus the Earle of Candale left the King, and embraced the party of the Princes, and of the Assembly at Nismes, contrary to his fathers will.

The Earle of Candale ioynes
with the Princes.

Whilest the King aduanceth from Poitiers to Bourdeaux, the Prince of Conde comes to his house at Chateauroux, where hee findes about two thousand foot, and neere twelue hundred horse, which his wife had caused to be leauied for him in Berry: There the Viscount of Chartres ioynd with his troops, and the Marquis of Rhoisy came to visit him, and assisted him with some horse: Whereupon being thus fortified, hee marched vnto Poitou. The Marshall of Bois-Dauphin seeing that the Prince had past all the riuers and was farre aduanced, resolu'd onely to follow him, and to keepe the townes from surprize: being in Poitou, he sent vnto the King to know his pleasure, who commanded him not to hazard any thing, but to hinder the Prince from entring into the Countrey of Angoulesme.

The Princes
army fortified.

The Prince being catusped in Poitou, hee required them of the religion to ioyne with him, sending first to Rochel, and letting them vnderstand, that his taking of armes was for the peace of their Churches, the tranquillity of the Estate, and the reformation of disorders, demanding ayd from them for the warre which he had begunne. To whom they made answer, That they could not ioyne with him in this warre, seeing it would be found a bad example and of perillous consequence, which would draw after it, both the Kings indignation against them, and the curse of the whole Countrey; which might iustly blame them for renewing a cruell ciuill warre, to their great charges, who liue in peace vnder the power and benefit of the Edicts: all which they would leaue vnto his Excellencies consideration; for whose particular contentment they would not spare their liues, goods, honors, and fortunes, in any thing wherein his Maiesties seruice and the peace of the State should not be interested.

The answer of
to the Prince.

Their Maiesties being come to Bourdeaux, it was resolu'd, that the Espousals should be solemnized vpon the eighteenth of October, the which was performed with great ceremonies in Saint Andrews Church, where the Duke of Guise did espouse Madam the Kings sister, in the name of the Prince of Spaine: and the same day the Duke of Lerma was to doe the like for the King with the Infanta at Burgos.

Their Maiesties being informed that the Duke of Rohan, with the rest of the reformed Religion (which had taken armes) had past the sister of Garrone, to stop the Ladies passage; they sent La Brosse, (an Ensigne of the Kings Guard) to know why they were armed, and to what intent. To whom they made answer:

La Brosse sent from his Maie-stie to the D.
of Rohan.

1. That hauing sent many souldiers leauied in many parts of the Realme, and none of them employed, they had beene forced to arme for their defence. Moreouer, they had beene aduised by the Assembly of Grenoble, to put themselves in defence, in case F their Deputies (which they had sent to the King) should receiue no contentment vpon their demands.

The answer of
the Duke of Rohan and his associates.

2. That they had beene assured their Deputies were sent backe without any contentment, and that there was no regard had vnto the Princes Remonstrances, nor to those of the Court of Parliament of Paris, as they had humbly besought their Maiesties by their Deputies.

3. That it was published in diuers parts of the Realme, that by the means of these marriages betwixt France and Spaine, they would ruine all those of the Religion:

and that this iust feare had caused them to arme, without doing any act of Hostilitie. A This report made, they held it not fit for their Maiesties dignitie to send againe to the Duke of Rohan and his associates, but to hold them as sworn enemies against the Kings seruice, and the publicke peace: That they should prouide for the Governement of Beaurie, and other places which the Marquis of La Force held; and that they should make a Declaration against all them of the Reformed Religion which had taken armes.

The towns upon the way to Bayonne, affured to the
King.

The King sent to the Gouvernors of Tartas, Acqs, and Montmarfan (three townes which are lying in the way to Bayonne) to assure them to his seruice: The Gouvernors of these three townes desired their Maiesties by their Letters, that they would not doubt of their fidelity, nor of the inhabitants deuotion: which made them iudge that the Princes partisans hauing no retreat, the passage for Madam would be safe: the Earle of Grammont, Gouvernor of Bayonne, hauing also sent to assure their Maiesties that he would ferue them in this voyage with 200 horse, and 1000 foot.

Madams departure to Bayonne.

After the Espouals, it was resolved that Madam should part on the one and twentieth day, being conducted by the Duke of Guise, who also had the command of the army, which consisted of 4000 foot, 1200 horse, and foure Cannon; besides the Earle of Grammonts Forces which should meet with them. Upon this resolution Madam takes leave of the King and Queene, of the Princesses and the whole Court, where there was much weeping for her departure: The King conducted her halfe a League out of the towne: the Queene betooke her to her chamber very heavy for the Ladies departure; where she remained in private two dayes. The Lady arrived at Bayonne the second of Nouember without any disturbance; whereof they priuely aduertised their Maiesties.

In the meane time the Marshall D'Ancre lay not still in Picardy, hauing leauied an army of 3500 foot, and 6 or 700 horse: He caused two Forts to bee built neere vnto Corbie, where Aubertin commanded with two Regiments, which much annoyed the towne of Amiens.

Exploits of the Marshall
D'Ancre.

In Clermont Marancourt commanded for the Princes, with a Regiment of eight Companies, which did much oppresse the neighbour Princes by their leauying of taxes. This made the Marshall resolve to take this towne from the Princes: whereupon he sent Nerfian with certaine Companies of horse and foot, to force the safe towne by Petard, who coming neere vnto Clermont, found that the enterprize was discovered; yet he resolved to goe on, and in the end tooke this safe towne, where they barricaded themselves; attending the Marshall D'Ancre with the rest of his troops and artillery, who being come, and his artillery planted, the besieged yielded by composition, and retired to Noyon.

Clermont taken by the Marshall D'Ancre.

During these ciuill combustions, the poore Peasants were wonderfully oppressed by the soldiers, and forced to pay their taxes double, by the receipts which were erected by the Princes in the Prouinces of Picardy, the Ile of France, Champagne, Auxerre, Berry, Touraine, Poitou, and part of Anjou, sending out their garisons to take the richest Peasants in euery Parish, whom they kept prisoners untill they had paid the taxze of the whole Village.

Monsieur de Plessis Gouvernor of Saumur (continuing in his Maiesties obedience) made a Decree, by the which hee commanded the Parishes to set vpon those rebels which fought to leaue the Kings money, forbidding all Gentlemen to assist them, vpon paine to be made liable to taxes.

Let vs returne now to Bayonne. On the sixt of Nouember, Madam the Kings sister came to Saint Iohn de Luz, and at the same time the Catholike King with the Infanta arrived at Fontarabie. The river of Bidaso or Margari makes a diuision of France from Spaine, at a place called Andajo which is a League from Fontarabie, and two from Saint Iohn de Luz. There the exchange was made betwene the two Princesses. But I cannot insitt vpon the particularities, which were very stately: hauing a very copious subiect to treat of.

The Kings deceit against them who belonged.

The Assembly at Nismes, thinking that they of the religion in Guienne, should ioyne their Forces with the Earle of Saint Paul, sent Letters to their Churches, to encourage them to take armes and to ioyne with the Prince. Whereupon the King made a Declaration against them of the Religion, with this Prouiso, That if within one moneth after the publi-

1615

A publication thereof, they make declaration in the Registers of the Bailiwicks where they remained: That they would desist from all enterprises, and doe him faithful seruice, and in no sort assist or fauour those which shall perse in their rebellion; and deliuer vp such places as they had surpris'd: He then tooke them into his protection, forbidding all his subiects to wrong them in word or deed, by reason of that which had past. But if after the time expired, they still continued in their rebellion, either in carying armes, or assisting and fauouring them that doe: he would haue them punished as guilty of treason, and troublers of the publicke peace and that the townes and communities which should adhere vnto them, should lose all their liberties and priuiledges which had beene granted vnto them.

The Kings Esponse being entred into the Realme, he wrote vnto her in these tearmes: Madam, Hauing no meanes according vnto my desire, to meet you at the entry of my Realme, for to put you in possession thereof, as of my affection to loue and ferue you: I send Luynes vnto you, to salute you in my name, and to tell you that I expect you with impatience, to offeryou both the one and the other: I pray you receiue him fauourably, and beleue what he shall say vnto you.

The Kings first Letter to the Queene his Spoule.

The Queene mother did also write vnto her, to assure her of her affection, in tearmes of a good mother, and a great Princeesse.

Madam my Daughter, The King my Son, hauing made choice of Monsieur de Luynes, as one of his most confident seruants, to congratulate your happy entry into his Kingdom, and to let you know with what passion and desire you are expected by him: I would not lose the opportunity to let you know, that I participate in the same desire to see you; for the comfort I shall receiue in mine owne particular, and to confirme by mouth the cordial loue I beare you: I pray you beleue what hee shall deliuer on my behalfe.

The Queene's Letter.

The Seigneur de Luynes met with the Queene at Bayonne, and was receiued with as honourable a reception as could be desired, to shew the loue and affection she bare vnto the King, in his person, whom the knew was much beloved of his Maiestie.

The young Queene enters into Bourdeaux.

On the 22 of Nouember, the King with his whole Court went out of Bourdeaux to meet with the Queene his Spoule, three leagues without the towne, where she was receiued in wonderfull great state: after which the Nuptials were celebrated in the Cathedral Church.

During their stay at Bourdeaux, there happened an accident which much troubled their Maiesties, and gaue a great affront to the Parliament of Bourdeaux, by an eminent person. A Gentleman called Hauts Chastel, a prisoner at that time in the Towne, being condemned to lose his head for many foule crimes, there was great sute made vnto the King for his pardon, and a Lieutenant of the Guards was sent vnto the prison, to stay the execution. Hereupon the Court sent Deputies to their Maiesties and the Chancellor, to enforme them of the fact; so as they had commandement to doe iustice, and the Guards were commanded to retire: whereupon they meant to execute him that evening: but a Iesuit which had him in confession, said, that he had many crimes vpon his conscience, as it would require three houres to admonish him, and therefore they must deferre it till the next day, neither could the Executioner be found, they being both corrupted to make this delay. The Court being risen, the Cardinal of Sourdis came presently on horse backe, booted, and his Almoner before him with a Croffe, accompanied with thirty or forty Gentlemen of note, whom hee had not acquainted with his intent; and holding a paper in his hand, coming neere the Palace, he cryed out, A Pardon, a Pardon, God saue the King: but he found the Palace gate shut, the which hee commanded to be forced by such as were about him; the like hee did to the prison, where finding the Keeper, hee would haue forced him to deliuer the keys; who vpon his refusal was slaine, his keyes being taken away, Hauts Chastel was drawne out of a hole and set at liberty, conducted to the Rivers, and put into a boat. The Cardinal also retired himselfe by water, to a house of his a league from the towne.

An insolence committed by the Cardinal of Sourdis.

Vpon this violence the whole Court went vnto his Maiestie, to make complaint of this attempt, and to beseech him that, untill this affront were repaired, the adherents punished, and the condemned man restored, they might bee dispensed withall from doing any act of iustice to any of his Maiesties subiects.

Some say that the King
was angry.

The complaint
made by the Court to the King.

1615

The King did let them vnderstand, that his pleasure was they should proceed against the Cardinall and his adherents, by the vñall formes, for the repairing of such a crime, and that he would countenance them by his authority: but he would also haue them continue in doing iustice to priuate persons: whereupon warrants were giuen out for the apprehending of the party and many of the complices. Thus you heare the History of a new spirit, who going among prisoners, raised one from death, and put to death one that was liuing, whereby in the Kings preference he abused his name and authority, to commit a violence vnworthy the thoughts of a man of his quality. Hereupon the Court made a decree, enioyning all the inhabitants of the towne, and others which had sene the said force and murder, and which knew the persons which had committed or assisted it, to come and depose the truth, and reueale their knowledge to the Commisfaries deputated by the Court, and vpon their refusal to bee punished as authors and fauorers of the said crime of treason, and enemies to the King. In like manner they made another decree for the apprehending of the Cardinall, and diuers others mentioned therein.

The Duke of Guise made Generall of the Kings armies.

Articles concluded betweene the Princes and the Assembly at Nismes.

On the 27 of Nouember, there were two actions past worthy of obseruation, the one was in the Councell at Bourdeaux, whereas the King made the Duke of Guise Lieutenant general of both his armies, which he meant to draw into one, giuing him all power & authority by his Letters Patents, to lead and conduct his troops in his absence. The other was at Sanlay in Poictou, whereas the Prince of Conde and the Deputies of the Assemblies at Nismes signed their Accord, whereof the chiefe Articles were: 1. To vñite themselves, and to demand an answer to the first Article of the third Estate: and to make an exact search for all those which had participated in the murder of the deceased King. 2. To hinder the reception of the Councell of Trent. 3. To preuent the inconueniences which might happen vnto the Estate, by the accomplishment of the alliances with Spaine. 4. To procure a new Councell of State about the King. 5. Not to lay downe armes before the King had granted the demands of them of the Religion. 6. To provide that they of the religion which had taken armes might bee restored to their goods, places, and pensions. 7. Not to giue eare vnto a peace without a common consent. 8. That there should be a correspondency of Councell betwene the Prince and the Assembly at Nismes. 9. That the direction of all money leauied in the townes which were held by them of the Religion, and the disposing of their armies should be managed by the Assembly at Nismes. 10. That there should be a prouision made of new places of safety in those Provinces where those of the Religion had no retreat. 11. To allow free exercise of the same Religion in the armies and townes held by the Princes. 12. That prouision should bee made for them of the Religion which were fled from their houses.

Men spake diuersly of this accord: some said, that the Prince made himselfe in effect protector of them of the Religion, although he had not taken the title, for that King Henric the Great had in his life time abhorred it, and was watchfull they should haue no other protector but himselfe or his successors: he knew the importance of this protection better then any one of his Realme, and said that it tended onely, to make an Estate within the Estate.

Some on the other side said, that the Prince had put himselfe vnder the protection of them of the Religion: that he had bound himselfe to serue them well, and not to make any peace before the King had granted them that which had bene often reiected. That they finding the necessity the Prince had of their succours, and to make his retreat during the winter into their townes of safety, they had forced him to accept of any conditions they pleased.

Both the Armies in Poictou.

Both the Armies are now in Poictou, where the poore people are much oppressed, and the King was dayly expected with the other Armie, lead by the Duke of Guise: so as it seemed all their quarrels should be decided by Armes in Poictou. In the meane time the Prince hauing taken Tonnay-Charante, he visited Saint Iohn D'Angely, Rochel, and some other Townes where he was receiued with much respect.

Mary beinge perswaded the Prince to demand a peace of the King.

In the most violent heate of warre, there are alwaies some men of qualitie which imploy themselves to make ouertures of peace. There were some Noblemen of either religion desiring to draw the Prince therunto, and spake vnto him, as of their owne motion, but they preuailed not. Men doe sometimes seeme to reiect that which they desire most,

A and whereof they haue most need, either to preferue their reputation, or get the better composition. Some write that the Prince pissing neere to Chastellerault, a Capuchin letting him to vnderstand the disorders and violences which his Souldiers committed: I am more grieved (said he) then any man in France; but I haue bene forced to haue recouers to Armes for my safety. The Duke of Neuers seemed to haue continued a Newer in his Towne of Neuers, and yet it is reported that hee had fauoured their passage of the Riuier of Loire, and fortified their Armie with some part of the troopes which hee had raised vnder the Kings Commissions. Yet hee did not openly declare himselfe for them; but went from Neuers about the middle of Nouember towards Bourdeaux, where B he arrived about the beginning of December, as well to salute the Queene, as also to beseech the King to giue him leaue to conferre with the Prince, and to dispose him & the rest to demand a peace of his Maestie: with which designe their Maesties were well pleased. He had a great interest in these Princes, for he was a deare friend vnto the Prince, and the Marshall of Bouillon; the Duke of Longueuille was his Sisters sonne; and the Duke of Mayen his wifes brother.

Some write that at the same instant Sir Thomas Edmunds Ambassador Leiger for his Maestie of Great Britaine residing in Court, told their Maesties that the King his Master would neuer aduow the Princes taking of Armes. That the Marquis of Boniuer being sent into England by the said Prince to negotiate for succours of men and money, hee C had for his answer; that His Maestie would neuer goe against the peace, alliance, & good neighbourhood which was betwene the two Kings and Realmes of France and England. That the King his Master, hauing bene alwaies careful to maintaine peace in his owne Kingdomes, hee could not but desire the same in the Estates of neighbour Kings his allies, whereunto he would giue his best assistance. That hee had receiued commandement from the King his Master to acquaint his Maestie therewith, and had charge to repaire vnto the Prince, to dispose him to demand a peace: The which the King tooke in good part.

It is written that the poorer sort of them of the Religion had their braines so troubled with an imaginary persecution, as it was bruted in many good Townes of France, that D vpon the first alteration they would set fire on their houses, and come forth with their Armes to sell their liues dearly. The wisdom of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, seeking to preuent the causes in time, decreed that they of the reformed Religion should bring their Armes into the Towne-house, to take away all subiect of sedition and trouble, and to free many from feare which grew through their owne weakenesse, or some bad designe. Vpon this Decree, the two Ministers of Bourdeaux desired to retire themselves, and aduiled others to doe the like. Two Aduocates called Saint Angell, and L'Auergnac, professing the said Religion, presented a Petition to the Parliament, to the end those Ministers might be inioyned to continue the exercise at Begle: which was decreed accordingly, vpon paine to be punished as Troublers of the publique peace: and the Iurats E had charge to haue a care that they of the Religion might goe and come safely. Notwithstanding this Decree the two Ministers retired from Bourdeaux: The one to Tonnein, where the Duke of Rohan remained; and the other to Rochel.

Let vs now see what passed in Champaigne after the Princes had left it about the end of October: The Marquis of Vieuille the Kings Lieutenant in that Prouince about Rheims, and the Seigneur of Dandolor, being also Lieutenant towards Langres, hauing leauied some troopes of horse and foot: the Marquis went and tooke Neuchastell: and finding that Mery did much annoy the riuier of Seine, and the inhabitants of Trois, (who desired to be freed) he came thither with his troopes, and treated with the inhabitants, who promised to furnish him with foure Cannons, & powder for fūe hundred shot, with F eight of nine hundred good men. The Seigneur of Poirincourt, (being at his House neere to Mery, and aduertised of the Marquis his enterprize) gathered together his friends, and with some souldiers of the Regiment of Nauarre, which were in Garison at Nogent and Bray, hee went on the first of December and lodged in the base Towne of Mery, where hee found no resistance, for that Lamet the Gouverneur kept no guard there.

The same day the Marquis arrived with his troopes and Cannon before the high town where after the eighth shot, the besieged demanded composition, which was granted, and they departed the next day with their Armes and baggage. Some write that Poitrin-court having a designe to make himselfe Gouverneur of Mery (as hee had beene duene by the League) seeing that the Marquis of Vieville as the Kings Lieutenant in that Province would place one of his owne; he resolved that night with his friends, to make himselfe Master of Mery in the morning. You must vnderstand that betwene the bafe Towne and the high there was a little streame of water, which at that time might be easily waded through. Neither were there any walles betwene the two Townes but onely Baricadoes.

Poitrin-court
slaine at Mery.

At the same time when as the Seigneur of Reaux, appointed by the Marquis, entred into Mery to effect the capitulation, and Lamet with his men on horsebacke ready to depart; Poitrin-court couered with a Target, hauing a naked sword in his left hand, and a Pistoll in his right, and followed by his friends, past the water, and entered into the towne by the Baricadoes, crying out, God saue the King and Poitrin-court, and at the same time hee called the souldiers of the Regiment of Nauarre to enter by the gate, thinking they would haue seconded him; which they did not, but stood still in battell in one of the streets without mouing, which saved their liues. The Marquis histroope seeing this attempt, and that they cryed, kill, kill, did likewise aduance with the like noise, so as the skirmish grew hot, in the which Poitrin-court was slaine, with some hundred of his followers, and his sonne was taken prisoner. These bee the effects of ciuill combustions; where we haue seene an old Captaine, who after imploiment at Sea, and hauing beene present at diuers goodly actions, comes to die neere vnto his owne house.

Exploits in Champaign.

The Marquis hauing left a Garison in Mery, returned his Cannon to Troys. After which, the Seigneur of Dandelot came likewise to Troys to borrow their foure Cannons, with the which hee tooke the Castles of Brienne, with the townes of Rosnay, Pougy, and others.

Ruberpre thrust
out of Corbie
by his Sergeant
Major.

Ruberpre you haue heard, had left the Kings seruice to follow the Duke of Longueville, and the Princes. About the end of this year Le Heaume his Sergeant Maior, (whom the Marshall of Bouillon had recommended vnto him, being of the reformed Religion) hauing intelligence with Helincourt, and other Captaines, hee met Ruberpre in the open street, and told him, that he had intelligence with the Marshall D'Ancre, so as hee might stay no longer in Corbie, whereupon heeled him to the gate, and thrust him out of the Towne, where he continued foure houres, shaking of an Ague, without money, and not knowing whither he might safely retire himselfe. Le Heaume and Helincourt hauing assured Corbie, and seized vpon that which did belong to Ruberpre, they sent him one of his horses, with some money, to retire where he pleased. You may easily iudge how hee was perplexed, fearing to fall into their hands, which kept the Marshalls torts. Being in this distresse, hee took his way towards Soissons, where the Princeesse Dowager of Gonde, and the Duchesse, mother to the Duke of Longueville remained. Afterwards Helincourt did also expell Le Heaume out of Corbie.

The Cheual-
lier of Ven-dome comes
to Rome.

This year the King had resolved to send a solemne embassage to Rome, to yeeld his full obedience vnto his Holinesse.

The Cheualier of Vendome, Grand Prior of Tholouse, was chosen to execute this charge in the Kings name: hauing beene five yeares at Malta, hee receiued commandement from the King to returne into France, and to passe by Rome; there to performe the said obedience, where his reception and entry was with very great state, and done in three severall dayes; that is to say, the day of his first entry, where he was met by the Dukes of Guachiano, Santo Iemini and County; the Prince of Sulmone the Popes Nephew, with an infinite number of Cardinals, Prelates, and Noblemen, being himselfe followed by many Noblemen and Knights of Malta of the French Nation: and this was performed on the second of September. On the fourth hee made his second entry into Rome in State: and two dayes after, hee was conducted to the publique Consistorie, where hee performed the Ceremonie of the Kings obedience.

The Baron of
slaine.

In the Kings Armiethere hapned a great disaster, namely, the Duell of the Barons of Vitry, and Montglas: their quarrell chanced vpon a slight occasion, and beganne in the presence of Monsieur de Guise, and many of the chiefe of the Armie, comming forth of the Duke of Guises Chamber. Monsieur de Montglas taking exceptions at some words which Monsieur de Vitry had spoken vnto him, he challenged him, who thinking that he

A had spoken in iest, gave little regard thereto for the present. But Monsieur de Montglas still offering him the Combate; and he making many excuses and intreaties not to fight with him, as hauing beene alwayes great friends; in the end they came into the field in Xaintonge, where after some encounters, Monsieur de Montglas was slaine, to the great griefe of the chiefe Commanders of the Kings Army. His body was caried to the Castle neere Proins in Brie.

In the meane time the Prince came from Rochel to Saint Iohn D'Angely, where at the instant request of his Maiesties Ambassador of Great Britaine, and of the Duke of Neuers, hee refused to a peace, and sent the Baron of Thiangeto his Maiefty with this Letter following.

The Princes
Letter vnto
the King.

Sir, I haue heretofore presented vnto your Maiefty, by my most humble Remonstrances; the disorders and miseries which threatened your Realme; and haue besought you with humilitie & respect, which a faithfull subiect owes vnto his King, to direct them by your wisdom, and to apply fit and necessary remedies in time; lest being neglected, the mischiefe growe honorable: wherein I neuer had nor will haue any other end or intent; then the preservation of your Estate, and the publike peace. Whereunto desiring to apply all my actions, and to seeke out all possible meanes to attaine thereto; for the aboyding of those miseries and calamities which a ciuill warre doth procure: I was determined before the arriuall of Sir Thomas Edmonds the Ki of Great Britaines

C Ambassador, and of the Duke of Neuers; to doe my dutie, and satisfie the desire and request of the Deputies of the Religion (assembled by your permission) to send vnto your Maiefty some man of qualitie, humbly to beseech you to giue peace vnto your Realme, so necessary, and so much desired of all your subiects: and to take into consideration (if you please) the remonstrances presented vnto your Maiefty, by the generall Estates; the Court of Parliament and my selfe: and to that end to call into your Councell the ancient Councillors whom the deceased King your father had so profitably employed, who are not interested in the said remonstrances; and desire nothing but the good of the Realme.

With this Letter there were certaine Articles presented vnto the King to treat of the Peace, on the behalfe of the Prince of Conde, and the assembly at Nismes: 1. The Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, and they of the religion ioynt with him, desiring peace, humbly besought the King to giue it vnto his subiects. 2. That if it pleased the King to grant conference, and to send his Deputies, the Prince and they of the Assembly at Nismes will send on their behalfe. 3. The Prince humbly besought the King to grant a Briefe to them of the Assembly at Nismes, to transport themselves to some place neere vnto the Court. 4. The Prince desires that the Ambassador of Great Britaine may be present to be a witness to this Treatie. 5. That the Countesse of Soissons, and the Duchesse of Longueville might be also called to assist. 6. That the Prince might know the place and the persons whom his Maiefty would employ; and what should become of both Parties during the Treatie. The difficultie was vpon the second Article, touching the Deputies of the generall assembly at Nismes, for they would not heare them, nor reade their letters in this qualitie. In the end the Baron of Thianget told the King, that he could not returne vnto the Prince, before the Deputies of the Assembly had presented their Letters and had audience. This was granted as to Deputies of the Assembly at Nismes, and not of the generall Assembly of them of the reformed religion: so as in the beginning of this year 1616. the King being come to Roche-Foucault, they had audience and presented their Letters, which tended onely to peace.

Articles agreed on touching the submission of Rome.

On the 8 of January, the Duke of Neuers, and the Baron of Thianget returned to the Court being at Poitiers: and to agree vpon the time, the place, and the circumstances of the conference, the Marshall of Brillac, and Monsieur de Villeray deputy by the King, parted from Poitiers, with the Duke and Baron, to goe to Fontenay le Comte, whither the Prince had promised to come, and these following Articles were concluded. 1. That the King was pleased to enter into conference with the Prince, and all others which had ioynt with him, and assisted him of both religions. 2. That the conference should be held in the Towne of Loudun, by Commissioners appointed from his Maiefty, to treat with the said Prince and other Lords, and should begin on the tenth of February next. 3. And that nothing might trouble so good a worke,

was thought good with the Kings good pleasure, to have a suspension of Armes through all the Countreys of his Maiesties obedience, and likewise in the fouraignty of Sedan and Raicourt. To begin in regard of the Prouinces of Poitou, Xaintonge, Angoumois, Bretagne, Anjou, Touraine, and Berry on the day that the present Articles shall be ratified by his Maiestie, of whole will the said Prince shall be satisfied by the thirtieth of this moneth. And in regard of other remote Prouinces, this suspension should begin the day of the publication thereof, and end the first day of March following, whereof the Prince should at the same time aduertise such as commanded in any places for him. 4. That his Maiestie should be humbly intreated to send speedy commandment for the publication of the said suspension of Armes: and that in the meane time all prisoners taken on either side after the thirtieth day of this present moneth to be set at libertie. 5. That no fortification should be made during this suspension in any towns or places, taken since the first of September last; nor any souldier leauied within the Realme. 6. And to hinder alteration by neareness of the Armies: it was agreed, That his Maiesties troopes should retire beyond the Riuer of Vienne, and not approach within eight Leagues of Loudun. Butts for the Garisons which might be held necessarie for the safety of the townes and places on this side the riuers of Vienne, and Clain, which might giue some cause of jealousy, there should be a list giuen vnto the Prince of the numbers which should be employed. 7. The like Article was concluded touching the Princes Armie which should not approach within sixe leagues of Poitiers. 8. That the Prince might lodge some troopes in Loudun and thereabouts for the safety of the conference. 9. That the troopes might retire if they pleased, hauing leaue from their Generals in all safety, so as they aduertised the Governours of places where they past, and did not march about twenty together. This Accord was confirmed by the Kings Decree. Signed the 22 of January.

A strange accident at Tours in the Council Chamber.

The falling of Saint Michaels Bridge at Paris.

Great mortality upon the Kings returne from Bourdeaux.

gambles consumed during the suspension of Armes.

After this, the King came to Tours, during the extremity of the cold, where on the nine and twentieth day the Council being assembled, the Floote of the Chamber began to shake, so as many Noblemen and great Personages fell with it, in the which the Earls of Soissons, the Duke of Elspemon, with many Noblemen were hurt. The Queens Mother was on the other side of the Chamber, conferring with the Cancellor, and some other Counsellors of State and fell not, which gaue great content to all the Court.

This newes being brought to Paris increased their sorrow, for the same night of the 29 day: the Riuer of Seine hauing bene frozen, there coming a thawe, the Ice brake and caried away many boates laden with Wood, Corne, Wine, Salt and other Merchandize of a very great value; a part of Saint Michaels bridge fell into the water, which caused great losse, but none drowned but one Maid-servant: the other moiety of this bridge fell in July following, so as they were forced to make another of wood towards the Auguins, whilst they built the other of stone.

The season of the yeare was violently cold, during the Kings passage from Bourdeaux to Tours; whereof they write extraordinary things. That betwene Poitiers and Chastellerault, there were Coachmen seene to fall downe dead from their Coaches; that there died for many groomes and seruants to Princes and Noblemen, that being at Tours they were forced to make new traines, and such as escaped, some lost an eare, some fingers, some toes which were frozen off. That in the Regiment of the guards which consisted of three thousand men, there died aboue a third part as well of cold, as of burning Feuers. That without any combat there was dead in the Kings Armie, and the Princes aboue 10000 souldiers, which had so infected the Countrey from Bloys to Ancenis (which is 50 leagues) as there died afterwards aboue 10000 other persons, and of the best families. The King lost at Tours his Schoolemaster, the Queens her Physician, and Deles a Councillor of State, with diuers others left this life.

The conference was now beginning at Loudun; yet the suspension of Armes was not generally obserued. In Guienne, La Force and Grammont continued the warre one against another; and the Duke of Vendomes troopes committed great Acts of Hostility. Many Townes of Anjou, Maine, Perche, and Britanie were forced to contribute money vnto them. Whereupon the Court of Parliament at Rennes (seeing him unwilling to discharge his troopes) made a Decree against him, giuing leaue to the countrey people to set vpon them. This made him to write a Letter vnto the King, which gaue their Maiesties no great content, but made them coniecture, that the Prince (notwithstanding all his protestations)

A testations had some secret intelligence with the Duke of Vendome, who should play the Newter during the conference, and by that means obtaine by force the advantages they desired. Upon this occasion his Maiestie did three things. First, he caused many of his troopes to passe the Riuer of Loire, hearing that the Duke of Vendome was gone towards Britanie with his troopes. Secondly, he caused eight Cannons to be drawne out of Paris with munition, and conducted to Orleans to be employed as occasion should serue; and thirdly, his Maiestie sent an Herald to the Duke of Vendome, who found him in the Castle of Chantocé in Anjou on the eighteenth of February. He was conducted into his Castle by two of his guard, coming to the gate, he took his coat of Armes, and so went into the Dukes Chamber, who was accompanied by many Gentlemen and others. The Duke hauing his hat in his hand, and the Herald requested he said vnto him:

To you Caesar of Vendome: I command you by the Kings Sovereign Lord your Master and mine, and all your adherents, that presently you lay downe Armes, and dismisse the troopes which you haue leauied, and come vnto his Maiestie; and all which which asist you to retire to their Houses; and for want hereof I pronounce you Rebels, and guilty of Treason, and as such an one to be punished by force of Armes: To whom the Duke made answer, I am a most humble servant to the Master whom you serue, I will confesse with these Gentlemen which doe me the honour to asist me, and then give you my resolution.

After dinner he said vnto him, That he was a most humble servant to the King, and that the Armes which he had taken were signed with the Prince of Condés intentions, to reuenge the death of the deceased King his Father: to which end he would employ his life, goods and friends.

This Declaration stayed the Kings troopes from further proceeding; vntill the conference at Loudun, which began on the tenth of February, according to the decree made at Fontenay. There came for the King, the Countesse of Soissons, the Duke of Neuers, the Marshall of Brillac, Monsieur de Villers, President Thun, and Monsieur de Vich Counsellors of State. For the Prince besides himselfe, there were, the Prince of the Month, the Duke of Longueville, the Dukes of Longueville, Myenne, and Enghienburg, with the Marshall of Bouillon. Soon after came the Dukes of Rohan, Sully, Tremouille, and the Earls of Candale, St. Thomas Edmunds Ambassador for his Maiestie of Great Britaine assisted also, and the Assembly of Nismes was transferred to Rochel. The Prince presented thirty Articles, whereby it was coniectured that the peace could not be so soon concluded; and therefore the truce was prolonged till the 15 of March. In the meane time the Duke of Vendome came to the Conference to be comprehended in the Treatie, and present his complaints.

The Kings Deputies had given answer in writing to the thirty Articles; but for that there was some conelation touching three which were suspended, the truce was againe prolonged vnto the 15 of April: the chiefe question being about the raising of the Citadell of Amiens towards the towne. But in the mid the Kings Councill gaue the Prince to understand, that the King would not raise the Citadell razed, and that the Marshall d'Ancre would deliuer it into his Maiesties hands, to giue the gouernment to someone that should not be suspect vnto the Duke of Longueville, Gouernour of Picardy. The interests, advantages, and assurances which the Prince and his associates desired; and the contentments which they had secretly demanded, caused a new prolongation of the Truce, vntill the 25 of April, during the which the private Articles were often sent to Tours: in the end the King caused the Castle of Chyront to be deliuered vnto the Prince. They promise him the Tower of Bolarges, and Berry, with 1500000 Franks for the charges of his Armie, for the satisfying whereof, there were impositions raised vnto the Salt, and other Merchandize.

Some held this peace to be dearly bought by the King, and that a warre had bin more profitable and honorable: but the Estate of the Kings affaires being considered, it was resolved to giue the Prince what he should require for his content. There was no speech now but of a Peace, the Court was full of ioy, & the Princes drinke to the Kings and Queens health, and protest to doe their best endeours for the entertainment of the Duke of peace.

But in the meane time the Prince was dangerously sick at Loudun. The Maifestie sent to visit him, and the truce was prolonged vntill the 15 of May, as well by reason of the

and that this iust feare had caused them to arme, without doing any act of Hostilitie. This report made, they held it not fit for their Maiesties dignitie to send againe to the Duke of Rohan and his associates, but to hold them as iuror enemies against the Kings seruice, and the publicke peace: That they should prouide for the Government of Bearne, and other places which the Marquis of La Force held; and that they should make a Declaration against all them of the Reformed Religion which had taken armes.

The townes
vpon the way
to Bayonne, affured to the
King.

The King sent to the Gouvernors of Tartas, Aeqs, and Montmarfan (three townes which are lying in the way to Bayonne) to assure them to his seruice: The Gouvernors of these three townes desired their Maiesties by their Letters, that they would not doubt of their fidelity, nor of the inhabitants deuotion: which made them iudge that the Princes partisans hauing no retreat, the passage for Madam would be safe: the Earle of Grammont, Gouvernor of Bayonne, hauing also sent to assure their Maiesties that he would ferue them in this voyage with 200 horse, and 1000 foot.

Madams departure to Bayonne.

After the Espoufals, it was resolved that Madam should part on the one and twentieth day, being conducted by the Duke of Guise, who also had the command of the army, which consisted of 4000 foot, 1200 horse, and foure Cannon; besides the Earle of Grammonts Forces which should meet with them. Vpon this resolution Madam takes leaue of the King and Queene, of the Princesses and the whole Court, where there was much weeping for her departure: The King conducted her half a League out of the towne: the Queene betooke her to her chamber very heavy for the Ladies departure, where she remained in private two dayes. The Lady arriued at Bayonne the second of Nouember without any disturbance; whereof they presently aduertised their Maiesties.

In the meane time the Marshall D'Ancre lay not still in Picardy, hauing leauied an army of 3500 foot, and 600 700 horse: He caused two Forts to bee built neere vnto Corbie, where Ruberpre commanded with two Regiments, which much annoyed the towne of Amiens.

Exploits of the Marshall
D'Ancre.

In Clermont Maraucourt commanded for the Princes, with a Regiment of eight Companies, which did much oppresse the neighbour Provinces by their leauying of taxes. This made the Marshall resolute to take this towne from the Princes: whereupon he sent Nerseus with certaine Companies of horse and foot, to force the bafe towne by Petard, who coming neere vnto Clermont, found that the enterprise was discovered; yet he resolved to go on, and in the end tooke the bafe towne, where they barricaded themselves, attending the Marshall D'Ancre with the rest of his troops and artillerie, who being come, and his artillerie planted, the besieged yielded by composition, and retired to Noyon.

During these ciuill combustions, the poore Peasants were wonderfully oppressed by the souldiers, and forced to pay their taxes double, by the receipts which were erected by the Princes in the Provinces of Picardy, the Ile of France, Champagne, Auxerre, Berry, Touraine, Poitou, and part of Anjou, sending out their garifons to take the richest Peasants in euery Parish, whom they kept prisoners vntill they had paid the tax of the whole Village.

Monsieur de Plessis Gouvernor of Saumur (continuing in his Maiesties obedience) made a Decree, by the which hee commanded the Parishes to set vpon those rebels which sought to leaue the Kings money, forbidding all Gentlemen to assist them, vpon paine to be made liable to taxes.

Let vs returne now to Bayonne. On the sixt of Nouember, Madam the Kings sister came to Saint Iohn de Luz, and at the same time the Catholicke King with the Infanta arriued at Fontarabie. The ruer of Bidasso or Margari makes a diuision of France from Spaine, at a place called Andajo which is a League from Fontarabie, and two from Saint Iohn de Luz. There the exchange was made betweene the two Princesses. But I cannot insitt vpon the particularities, which were very stately: hauing a very copious subiect to treat of.

The Kings de-
ceit against them at the Religion.

The Assembly at Nismes, thinking that they of the religion in Guienne, should ioine their Forces with the Earle of Saint Paul, sent Letters to their Churches, to encourage them to take armes and to ioine with the Prince. Whereupon the King made a Declaration against them of the Religion, with this Prouiso, That if within one month after the publi-

A publication thereof, they make declaration in the Registers of the Bailiwicks where they remained: That they would desist from all enterprises, and doe him faithfull seruice, and in no sort assist or fauour those which shall persist in their rebellion; and deliuer vp such places as they had surprisid: He then tooke them into his protection, forbidding all his subjects to wrong them in word or deed, by reason of that which had past. But if after the time expired, they still continued in their rebellion, either in carrying armes, or assisting and fauouring them that doe: he would haue them punished as guilty of treason, and troublers of the publicke peace and that the townes and communalities which should adhere vnto them, should lose all their liberties and priuiledges which had beene granted vnto them.

The Kings Espouse being entred into the Realme, he wrote vnto her in these tearmes: The Kings first Letter to the Queene his Spouse, Madam, Hauing no meanes according vnto my desire, to meet you at the entry of my Realme, for to put you in possession thereof, as of my affection to loue and serue you: I send Luynes vnto you, to salute you in my name, and to tell you that I expect you with impatience, to offer you both the one and the other: I pray you receiue him fauourably, and beleue what he shall say vnto you.

The Queene mother did also write vnto her, to assure her of her affection, in tearmes of a good mother, and a great Princeesse.

Madam my Daughter, The King my Son, hauing made choice of Monsieur de Luynes, the Queens Letter, as one of his most confident seruants, to congratulate your happy entry into his Kingdome, and to let you know with what passion and desire you are expected by him: I would not lose the opportunity to let you know, that I participate in the same desire to see you, for the comfort I shall receiue in mine owne particular, and to confirme by mouth the cordiall loue I beare you: I pray you beleue what hee shall deliuer on my behalfe.

The Seigneur de Luynes met with the Queene at Bayonne, and was receiued with as honourable a reception as could be desired, to shew the loue and affection shee bare vnto the King, in his person, whom she knew was much beloved of his Maiestie.

On the 21 of Nouember, the King with his whole Court went out of Bourdeaux to meet with the Queene his Spouse, three leagues without the towne, where she was receiued in wonderfull great state: after which the Nuptials were celebrated in the Cathedrall Church.

During their stay at Bourdeaux, there happened an accident which much troubled their Maiesties, and gaue a great affront to the Parliament of Bourdeaux, by an eminent person. A Gentleman called Hault Chastel, a prisoner at that time in the Towne, being condemned to lose his head for many foule crimes, there was great sute made vnto the King for his pardon, and a Lieutenant of the Guards was sent vnto the prison, to stay the execution. Hereupon the Court sent Deputies to their Maiesties and the Chancellor, to enforce them of the fact; so as they had commandement to doe iustice, and the Guards were commanded to retire: whereupon they meant to execute him that evening: but a Iesuit which had him in confession, said, that he had so many crimes vpon his conscience, as it would require three houres to admonish him, and therefore they must deferre it till the next day; neither could the Executioner be found, they being both corrupted to make this delay. The Court being risen, the Cardinal of Sourdis came presently on horse backe, booted, and his Almoner before him with a Crosse, accompanied with thirty or forty Gentlemen of note, whom hee had not acquainted with his intent; and holding a paper in his hand, coming neere the Palace, he cried out, A Pardon, a Pardon, God saue the King: but he found the Palace gate shut, the which he commanded to be forced by such as were about him; the like he did to the prison; where finding the Keeper, hee would haue forced him to deliuer the keyes; who vpon his refusal was slaine, his keyes being taken away, Hault Chastel was drawne out of a hole and set at liberty, conducted to the Riuer, and put into a boat. The Cardinal also retired himselfe by water, to a house of his a league from the towne.

Vpon this violence the whole Court went vnto his Maiestie, to make complaint of this attempt, and to beseech him that vntill this affront were repaired, the adherents punished, and the condemned man restored, they might bee dispensed withall from doing any act of iustice to any of his Maiesties subjects.

The King did let them vnderstand, that his pleasure was they should proceed against the Cardinal and his adherents, by the viall formes, for the repairing of such a crime, and that he would countenance them by his authority: but he would also haue them continue in doing iustice to priuate persons: whereupon warrants were giuen out for the apprehending of the party and many of the complices. Thus you heare the History of a new spirit, who going among prisoners, raised one from death, and put to death one that was liuing, whereby in the Kings prefence he abused his name and authority, to commit a violence vnworthy the thoughts of a man of his quality. Hereupon the Court made a decree, enioyning all the inhabitants of the towne, and others which had sene the said force and murder, and which knew the persons which had committed or assisted it, to come and depose the truth, and reueale their knowledge to the Commissaries deputed by the Court, and vpon their refusal to bee punished as authors and fauorers of the said crime of treason, and enemies to the King. In like manner they made another decree for the apprehending of the Cardinall, and diuers others mentioned therein.

The Duke of Guise made General of the Kings armies.

Articles concluded betweene the Princes and the Assembly at Nismes.

On the 27 of Nouember, there were two actions past worthy of obseruation, the one was in the Councell at Bourdeaux, whereas the King made the Duke of Guise Lieutenant general of both his armies, which he meant to draw into one, giuing him all power & authority by his Letters Patents, to lead and conduct his troops in his absence. The other was at Sanfay in Poictou, whereas the Prince of Conde and the Deputies of the Assemblies at Nismes signed their Accord, whereof the chiefe Articles were: 1. To vnite themselves, and to demand an answer to the first Article of the third Estate: and to make an exact search for all those which had participated in the murder of the deceased King. 2. To hinder the reception of the Councell of Trent. 3. To prevent the inconueniences which might happen vnto the Estate, by the accomplishment of the alliances with Spaine. 4. To procure a new Councell of State about the King. 5. Not to lay downe armes before the King had granted the demands of them of the Religion. 6. To provide that they of the religion which had taken armes might bee restored to their goods, places, and pensions. 7. Not to giue care vnto a peace without a common consent. 8. That there should be a correspondency of Councell betweene the Prince and the Assembly at Nismes. 9. That the direction of all money leauied in the townes which were held by them of the Religion, and the disposing of their armies should be managed by the Assembly at Nismes. 10. That there should bee a prouision made of new places of safety in those Prouinces where those of the Religion had no retreat. 11. To allow free exercise of the same Religion in the cities and townes held by the Princes. 12. That prouision should bee made for them of the Religion which were fled from their houses.

Men spake diuersly of this accord: some said, that the Prince made himselfe in effect protector of them of the Religion, although he had not taken the title, for that King Henry the Great had in his life time abhorred it, and was watchfull they should haue no other protector but himselfe or his successors: he knew the importance of this protection better than any one of his Realme, and said that it tended onely, to make an Estate within the Estate.

Some on the other side said, that the Prince had put himselfe vnder the protection of them of the Religion: that he had bound himselfe to serue them well, and not to make any peace before the King had granted them that which had beene often reiected. That they finding the necessity the Prince had of their succours, and to make his retreat during the winter into their townes of safety, they had forced him to accept of any conditions they pleased.

These armies in Poictou.

Both the Armies are now in Poictou, where the poore people are much oppressed, and the King was dayly expected with the other Armie, lead by the Duke of Guise: so as it seemed all their quarrels should be decided by Armes in Poictou. In the meane time the Prince hauing taken Tonnyay-Charante, he visited Saint Iohn D'Angely, Rochel, and some other Townes where he was receiued with much respect.

Many feignd persuade the Prince to demand a peace of the King.

In the most violent heate of warre, there are alwaies some men of qualitie which imploy themselves to make ouertures of peace. There were some Noblemen of either religion desiring to draw the Prince thereunto, and spake vnto him, as of their owne motion, but they preuailed not. Men doe sometimes seeme to reiect that which they desire most, and

A and whereof they haue most need; either to preserve their reputation, or get the better composition. Some write that the Prince pissing neere to Chastellerault, a Capuchin letting him to vnderstand the disorders and violences which his Souldiers committed: I am more grieved (said he) then any man in France; but I haue beene forced to haue recourse to Armes for my safety. The Duke of Neuers seemed to haue continued a Newer in his Towne of Neuers, and yet it is reported that hee had fauoured their passage of the Riuer of Loire, and fortified their Armie with some part of the troopes which hee had raised vnder the Kings Commissions. Yet hee did not openly declare himselfe for them; but went from Neuers about the midle of Nouember towards Bourdeaux, where he arrived about the beginning of December, as well to salute the Queene, as also to beseech the King to giue him leaue to conferre with the Prince, and to dispose him & the rest to demand a peace of his Maiestie: with which designe their Maiesties were well pleased. He had a great interest in these Princes, for he was a deare friend vnto the Prince, and the Marshall of Bouillon, the Duke of Longueville was his Sisters sonne; and the Duke of Mayen his wiues brother.

Some write that at the same instant Sir Thomas Edmunds Ambassador Leiger for his Maiestie of Great Britaine residing in Court, told their Maiesties that the King his Master would neuer aduow the Princes taking of Armes. That the Marquis of Boniuert being sent into England by the said Prince to negotiate for succours of men and money, hee had for his answer; that His Maiestie would neuer goe against the peace, alliance, & good neighbourhood which was betweene the two Kings and Realmes of France and England. That the King his Master, hauing beene alwayes carefull to maintaine peace in his owne Kingdomes, hee could not but desire the same in the Estates of neighbour Kings his allies, whereunto he would giue his best assistance. That hee had receiued commandement from the King his Master to acquaint his Maiestie therewith, and had charge to repaire vnto the Prince, to dispose him to demand a peace: The which the King tooke in good part.

It is written that the poorer sort of them of the Religion had their braines so troubled with an imaginary persecution, as it was bruted in many good Townes of France, that vpon the first alteration they would set fire on their houses, and come forth with their Armes to sell their liues dearely. The wisdom of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, seeking to prevent the causes in time, decreed that they of the reformed Religion should bring their Armes into the Towne-house, to take away all subiect of sedition and trouble, and to free many from feare which grew through their owne weakenesse, or some bad designe. Vpon this Decree, the two Ministers of Bourdeaux desired to retire themselves, and aduised others to doe the like. Two Aduocates called Saint Angell, and L'Auergnac, professing the said Religion, presented a Petition to the Parliament, to the end those Ministers might be inioyned to continue the exercise at Begle: which was decreed accordingly, vpon paine to be punished as Troublers of the publique peace: and the Iurats had charge to haue a care that they of the Religion might goe and come safely. Notwithstanding this Decree the two Ministers retired from Bourdeaux: The one to Tonneix, where the Duke of Rohan remained; and the other to Rochel.

Let vs now see what passed in Champagne after the Princes had left it about the end of October. The Marquis of Vieuxville the Kings Lieutenant in that Prouince about Rheims, and the Seigneur of Dandelot, being also Lieutenant towards Langres, hauing leauied some troopes of horse and foot: the Marquis went and tooke Neuchastell: and finding that Mery did much annoy the riuer of Seine, and the inhabitants of Trois, (who desired to be freed) he came thither with his troopes, and treated with the inhabitants, who promised to furnish him with foure Cannons, & powder for five hundred shot, with eight or nine hundred good men. The Seigneur of Poitrincourt, (being at his House neere to Mery, and aduersed of the Marquis his enterprize) gathered together his friends, and with some souldiers of the Regiment of Nauarre, which were in Garison at Nogent and Bray, hee went on the fift of December and lodged in the base Towne of Mery, where hee found no resistance, for that Lamet the Gouverneur kept no guard there.

The same day the Marquis arriued with his troopes and Cannon before the high towne where after the eighth shot, the besieged demanded composition, which was granted and 1615 and they departed the next day with their Armes and baggage. Some write that Poirincourt court hauing a designe to make himselfe Gouverneur of Mery (as hee had bene during the League) seeing that the Marquis of Vieville as the Kings Licutenant in that Prouince would place one of his owne; he resolved that night with his friends, to make himselfe Master of Mery in the morning. You must vnderstand that betwene the base Towne and the high there was a little frame of water, which at that time might bee easily waded through. Neither were there any walles betwene the two Townes but onely Baricadoes.

Poirincourt At the same time when as the Seigneur of Reaux, appointed by the Marquis, entred into Mery to effect the capitulation, and Lamet with his men on horsebacke ready to depart; Poirincourt couered with a Target, hauing a naked sword in his left hand, and a Pistoll in his right, and followed by his friends, past the water, and entered into the towne by the Baricadoes, crying out, God saue the King and Poirincourt, and at the same time hee caused the souldiers of the Regiment of Nauarre to enter by the gate, thinking they would haue seconded him; which they did not, but stood still in battell in one of the streets without mouing, which saved their liues. The Marquis his troope seeing this attempt, and that they cryed, kill, kill, did likewise aduance with the like noise, so as the skirmish grew hot, in the which Poirincourt was slaine, with some hundred of his followers, and his sonne was taken prisoner. These bee the effects of ciuill combustions; where we haue seene an old Capitaine, who after imploiment at Sea, and ha- C uing bene present at diuers goodly actions, comes to die neere vnto his owne house.

Ruberpre thrust
out of Corbie
by his Sergeant
Major.

The Marquis hauing left a Garison in Mery, returned his Cannon to Troys. After which, the Seigneur of Dandelot came likewise to Troys to borrow their foure Cannons, with the which hee tooke the Castles of Brienne, with the townes of Rosnay, Pougy, and others.

Ruberpre you haue heard, had left the Kings seruice to follow the Duke of Longueuille, and the Princes. About the end of this year Le Heaume his Sergeant Maior, (whom the Marshall of Bouillon had recommended vnto him, being of the reformed Religion) hauing intelligence with Helincourt, and other Captaines, hee met Ruberpre in the open street, and told him, that he had intelligence with the Marshall D'Ancre, so as hee might D stay no longer in Corbie, whereupon he led him to the gate, and thrust him out of the Towne, where he continued foure houres, shaking of an Ague, without money, and not knowing whither he might safely retire himselfe. Le Heaume and Helincourt hauing assured Corbie, and seized vpon that which did belong to Ruberpre, they sent him one of his horses, with some money, to retire where he pleased. You may easily iudge how hee was perplexed, fearing to fall into their hands, which kept the Marshalls forts. Being in this distress, hee tooke his way towards Soissons, where the Princeesse Dowager of Conde, and the Duchesse, mother to the Duke of Longueuille remained. Afterwards Helincourt did also expell Le Heaume out of Corbie.

The Cheual-
lier of Ven-
dome comes
to Rome.

This year the King had resolved to send a solemne embassage to Rome, to yeeld his E siall obedience vnto his Holinesse.

The Cheuallier of Vendome, Grand Prior of Tholouse, was chosen to execute this charge in the Kings name: hauing bene five yeares at Malta, hee receiued commandment from the King to returne into France, and to passe by Rome; there to performe the said obedience, where his reception and entry was with very great state, and done in three seuerall dayes; that is to say, the day of his first entry, where he was met by the Dukes of Brachiano, Santo Iemini and Country; the Prince of Sulmone the Popes Nephew, with an infinite number of Cardinals, Prelates, and Noblemen, being himselfe followed by many Noblemen and Knights of Malta of the French Nation: and this was performed on the second of September. On the fourth hee made his second entry into Rome in State: F and two dayes after, hee was conducted to the publique Consistorie, where hee performed the Ceremonie of the Kings obedience.

The Baron of
sane.

In the Kings Armiethere hapned a great disaster, namely, the Duell of the Barons of Vitry, and Montglas: their quarrell chanced vpon a slight occasion, and beganne in the presence of Monsieur de Guise, and many of the chiefe of the Armie, comming forth of the Duke of Guises Chamber. Monsieur de Montglas taking exceptions at some words which Monsieur de Vitry had spoken vnto him, hee challenged him, who thinking that he had

A had spoken in iest, gaue little regard thereto for the present. But Monsieur de Montglas still offering him the Combate; and he making many excuses and intreaties not to fight with him, as hauing bene alwayes great friends: in the end they came into the field in Xaintonge, where after some encounters, Monsieur de Montglas was slaine, to the great griefe of the chiefe Commanders of the Kings Army. His body was caried to the Castle neere Proüns in Brie.

In the meane time the Prince came from Rochel to Saint Iohn D'Angely, where at the instant request of his Maiesties Ambassador of Great Britaine, and of the Duke of Nevers, he resolved to a peace, and sent the Baron of Thiangeto his Maiesty with this Letter B following.

Sir, I haue heretofore presented vnto your Maiestie, by my most humble Remon- strances; the disorders and miseries which threatned your Realme; and haue besought you with humilitie & respect, which a faithfull subiect owes vnto his King, to diuert them by your wisdom, and to apply sic and necessary remedies in time; lest being neglected, the mischiefe grow incurable: wherein I neuer had nor will haue any other end or in- tent, then the preservation of your Estate, and the publique peace. Wherunto desir- ing to apply all my actions, and to seeke out all possible meanes to attaine therunto; for the auoyding of those miseries and calamities which a ciuill warre doth procure; I was determined before the arriual of Sir Thomas Edmunds the K. of Great Britaines C Ambassador, and of the Duke of Nevers, to doe my dutie, and satisfie the desire and re- quest of the Deputies of the Religion (assembled by your permission) to send vnto your Maiestie some man of qualitie, humbly to beseech you to giue peace vnto your Realme, so necessarie, and so much desired of all your subiects: and to take into consideration (if you please) the remonstrances presented vnto your Maiestie, by the generall Estates, the Court of Parliament and my selfe: and to that end to call into your Councell the ancient Councillors whom the deceased King your father had so profitably employed, who are not interested in the said remonstrances; and desire nothing but the good of the Realme, &c.

With this Letter there were certaine Articles presented vnto the King to treat of the D Peace, on the behalfe of the Prince of Conde, and the assembly at Nismes. 1. The Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, and they of the religion ioyned with him, desiring peace, humbly besought the King to giue it vnto his subiects. 2. That if it pleased the King to grant conference, and to send his Deputies, the Prince and they of the Assembly at Nismes will send on their behalves. 3. The Prince humbly besought the King to grant a Briefe to them of the Assembly at Nismes, to transport themselves to some place neere vnto the Court. 4. The Prince desires that the Ambassador of Great Britaine may be present to be a witnesse to this Treatie. 5. That the Countesse of Soissons, and the Duchesse of Longueuille might be also called to assise. 6. That the Prince might know the place and the persons whom his Maiestie would employ; and what should become of both Armies during the Treatie. The difficultie was vpon the second Article, touch- ing the Deputies of the generall assembly at Nismes, for they would not heare them, nor read their letters in this qualitie. In the end the Baron of Thianges told the King, that he could not returne vnto the Prince, before the Deputies of the Assembly had presented their Letters and had audience. This was granted as to Deputies of the Assembly at Nismes, and not of the generall Assembly of them of the reformed religion: so as in the beginning of this year 1616. the King being come to Roche-Foucault, they had audience and presented their Letters, which tended onely to peace.

On the 8 of Ianuary, the Duke of Nevers, and the Baron of Thianges returned to the Court being at Poitiers: and to agree vpon the time, the place, and the circum- F stances of the conference, the Marshall of Briac, and Monsieur de Villeroy deput- ed by the King, parted from Poitiers, with the Duke and Baron, to goe to Fontenay le Conte; whither the Prince had promised to come, and these following Ar- ticles were concluded. 1. That the King was pleased to enter into conference with the Prince, and all others which had ioyned with him, and assisted him of both religions. 2. That the conference should be held in the Towne of Loudun, by Commissaries de- puted from his Maiestie, to treat with the said Prince and other Lords, and should begin on the tenth of February next. 3. And that nothing might trouble so good a worke, it was

was thought good with the Kings good pleasure, to have a suspension of Armes through all the Countries of his Maiesties obedience, and likewise in the foueraignty of Sedan and Raucourt. To begin in regard of the Prouinces of Poitou, Xaintonge, Angoumois, Bretagne, Anjou, Touraine, and Berry, on the day that the present Articles shall bee ratified by his Maiestie, of whose will the said Prince shall bee satisfied by the thirtieth of this month. And in regard of other remote Prouinces, this suspension should begin the day of the publication thereof, and end the first day of March following, wherof the Prince should at the same time aduertise such as commanded in any places for him. 4. That his Maiestie should be humbly intreated to send speedy commandement for the publication of the said suspension of Armes: and that in the meane time all prisoners taken on either side, after the thirtieth day of this present month to be set at libertie. 5. That no fortification should be made during this suspension in any towns or places, taken since the first of September last; nor any souldier leauied within the Realm. 6. And to hinder alteration by nearness of the Armes: it was agreed, That his Maiesties troopes should retire beyond the Riuer of Vienne, and not approach within eight Leagues of Loudun. But as for the Garisons which might be held necessarie for the safety of the townes and places on this side the riuers of Vienne, and Clain, which might giue some cause of iea- lousie, there should be a list giuen vnto the Prince of the numbers which should bee im- ployed. 7. The like Article was concluded touching the Princes Arme which should not approach within sixe leagues of Poitiers. 8. That the Prince might lodge some troopes in Loudun and thereabouts for the safety of the conference. 9. That the troopes might retire if they pleased, hauing leaue from their Generals in all safety, so as they aduerted the Gouernors of places where they past, and did not march about twenty together. This Accord was confirmed by the Kings Decree. Signed the 23 of January.

After this, the King came to Tours, during the extremitie of the cold, where on the nine and twentieth day the Councell being assembled, the Floor of the Chamber began to sink, so as many Noblemen and great Personages fell with it, in the which the Earle of Soissons, the Duke of Elpernon, with many Noblemen were hurt. The Queene Mother was on the other side of the Chamber, conferring with the Chancellor, and some other Councellors of State and fell not, which gaue great content to all the Court.

This newes being brought to Paris increased their sorrow, for the same night of the 29 day: the Riuer of Seine hauing bene frozen; there coming a thawe, the Ice brake and caried away many boates laden with Wood, Corne, Wine, Salt and other Merchandize of a very great value; a part of Saint Michaels bridge fell into the water, which caused great losse, but none drowned but one Maid-servant: the other moiety of this bridge fell in Iuly following; so as they were forced to make another of wood towards the Augustins, whilft they built the other of stone.

The season of the yeare, was violently cold, during the Kings passage from Bourdeaux to Tours; wherof they write extraordinary things. That betwene Poitiers and Chastelleraut, there were Coachmen seene to fall downe dead from their Coaches; that there died so many groomes and seruants to Princes and Noblemen, that being at Tours they were forced to make new traines; and such as escaped, some lost an eare, some fingers, some toes which were frozen off. That in the Regiment of the guards which consisted of three thousand men, there died about a third part as well of cold, as of burning Feuers. That without any combat there was dead in the Kings Arme, and the Princes about 10000 souldiers, which had so infected the Country from Bloys to Ancenis (which is 50 leagues) as there died afterwards about 10000 other persons, and of the best families. The King lost at Tours his Schoolemaster, the Queene her Physician, and Dole a Councillor of State, with diuers others left this life.

The conference was now beginning at Loudun; yet the suspension of Armes was not generally obserued. In Guienne, La Force and Grammont continued the warre one against another; and the Duke of Vendomes troopes committed great Acts of Hostility. Many Townes of Anjou, Maine, Pearch, and Britanie were forced to contribute money vnto them. Whereupon the Court of Parliament at Rennes (seeing him vnwilling to discharge his troopes) made a Decree against him, giuing leaue to the country people to set vpon them. This made him to write a Letter vnto the King, which gaue their Maiesties no great content, but made them coniecture, that the Prince (notwithstanding all his pro- testations)

A testations) had some secret intelligence with the Duke of Vendome, who should play the Newter during the conference, and by that means obtaine by force the advantages they desired. Upon this occasion his Maiestie did three things. First, hee caused many of his troopes to passe the Riuer of Loire, hearing that the Duke of Vendome was gone to Paris with his troopes. Secondly, hee caused eight Cannons to be drawne out of Orleans to be employed as occasion should serue; and thirdly, his Maiestie sent an Herald to the Duke of Vendome, who found him in the Castle of Chantocé in Anjou on the eighteenth of February. He was conducted into his Castle by two of his guard, coming to the gate; he tooke his coat of Armes, and so went into the Dukes Chamber, who was accompanied by many Gentlemen and others. The Duke hauing his hat in his hand, and the Herald couered, he said vnto him:

To you Cesar of Vendome: I command you by the King my Soueraigne Lord your Master and mine, and all your adherents, that presently you lay downe Armes, and dismisst the troopes which you haue leauied, and come vnto his Maiestie; and all those which assist you to retire to their Houses; and for want hereof I pronounce you a Rebell, and guilty of Treason, and as such an one, shall be punished by force of Armes: To whom the Duke made answer, I am a most humble seruant to the Master whom you serue, I will confesse with these Gentlemen which doe mee the honour to assist me, and then giue you my resolution.

After dinner he said vnto him, That he was a most humble seruant to the King, and that the Armes which he had taken were iigned to the Prince of Condés intentions, to reuenge the death of the deceased King his Father; to which end he would imploy his life, goods and friends.

This Declaration stayed the Kings troopes from further proceeding; vntill the conference at Loudun; the which began on the tenth of February, according to the Treatie made at Fontenay. There came for the King, the Countesse of Soissons, the Duke of Neuers, the Marshall of Brissac, Monsieur de Villeroi, President Thou, and Monsieur de Vicq Councillors of State. For the Prince besides himselfe, there were, the Princesse his Mother, the Duchesse of Longueuille, the Dukes of Longueuille, Mayenne and Luxemburg; with the Marshall of Bouillon. Soone after came the Dukes of Rohan, Sully, Tremouille, and the Biske of Candale: Sir Thomas Edmunds Ambassador for his Maiestie of Great Britaine assisted also, and the Assembly of Nismes was transferred to Rochel. The Prince presented thirty Articles, whereby it was coniectured that the peace could not be so soon concluded, and therefore the truce was prolonged till the 15 of March. In the meane time the Duke of Vendome came to the Conference to be comprehended in the Treatie, and present his complaints.

The Kings Deputies had giuen answer in writing to the thirty Articles; but for that there was some contestation touching three which were suspended, the truce was againe prolonged vnto the 15 of Aprill: the chiefe question being about the razing of the Citadell of Amiens towards the towne; but in the end the Kings Councell gaue the Prince to vnderstand; that the King would not haue the Citadell razed, and that the Marshall D'Ancre would deliuer it into his Maiesties hands, to giue the gouernment to some one that should not be suspect vnto the Duke of Longueuille, Gouernour of Picardy. The interests, advantages, and assurances which the Prince and his associates desired; and the contentments which they had secretly demanded, caused a new prolongation of the Truce, vntill the 25 of Aprill, during the which the private Articles were often sent to Tours: in the end the King caused the Castle of Chynon to be deliuered vnto the Prince. They promise him the Tower of Bourges, and Berry, with 1500000 Franks for the charges of his Arme. For the satisfying wherof, there were impositions raised vpon the Salt, and other Merchandize.

Some held this peace to be dearly bought by the King, and that a warre had bin more profitable, and honorable: but the Estate of the Kings affaires being considered, it was resolved to giue the Prince whatsoever he should require for his content. There was no speech now but of a Peace, the Court was full of ioy, & the Princes drinke to the King and Queenes health; and protest to doe their best endeouours for the entertainment of the Edict of peace.

But in the meane time the Prince fell dangerously sick at Loudun. Their Maiesties sent to visit him, and the truce was prolonged vntill the 15 of May, as well by reason of the Princes Princes sickness, as to provide for the discharge of the Souldiers, and to draw the Articles concluded into an Edict.

Their Majesties leaving Tours to goe to Blois, the Chancellor stayed behinde with the Councell, to give order for the affaires; as soone as he came to Blois, hee found that the practices of his enemies, and of the State, had prevailed more against him then was good for France; and therefore desiring to prevent their wils, hee came vnto the Queene Mother on the eight and twentieth of April, and demanded leaue to retire from Court, the which being presently published, was very sensible to many, especially vnto the Masters of the Requests, and such as were vnder his charge.

The Chancellor delivers the Seales into the Kings hands.

On the first of May, many Councillors of State, with all the Masters of the Requests and Officers of the Chancery, came vnto his lodging to accompany him to the Castle, whither he went at eleven of the clocke, causing the seales to be carried with him. He entered into the Queene Mothers Chamber, where the King was, into whose hands he delivered the Seales; what words past is not knowne, but at his departure the King seemed to be very heavy, and the whole Court grieved for his discharge.

The next day he left Blois, and retired to his house neere to Paris, still carrying the same countenance, constancie, and equalitie which he had alwayes done. They write of him, that he was the Chancellor which had served the Kings his Masters as faithfully, and was as worthy of the places, wherewith they honored him, as any one that had gone before him. The world marvelled that slander should be so bold as to wrong a man, who had so well deserved of all the French commonwealth.

The Kings Ordinance for the pacification of the troubles.

The King being at Blois, on the fourth of May there was an Ordinance proclaimed touching the pacification of the troubles, whereby the King injoynd all his subjects of what qualitie soeuer, to live in peace, unity, and concord one with another. That all Acts of Hostilitie, leauynings of money, and payment of contributions should cease. That all Prisoners should be delivered, and all troopes bee discharged, and presently retire. There was also another Ordinance published, for the retreat of all souldiers, as well French as strangers, which had followed the Prince of Candé, during these last alterations, to the end they might retire to their houses in small troopes, by ten and ten, or twelue and twelue, at the most, in all safety; forbidding all men of any qualitie soeuer, to doe them any disturbance.

The King and Queene come to Orleans.

The King signed the Edict of peace, and the priuate Articles on the sixt of May, and parted the next day, arriuing at Orleans on the eighth, where the Queene made her entrie. The Burgesses being sixe thousand in number very well appointed and armed, met the Queene almost a league without the towne: but that which gaue the greatest grace and best pleased their Majesties was to see three hundred young Youths about the Kings age, brauely apparelled and armed, instructed by their Leaders, marching before them like souldiers.

The Queene Mother arrives at Paris.

From Orleans they went to Fontaine-bleau, and from thence the Queene Mother arrived at Paris on the 11 of May, where she was receiued by the Gouverneur, Provoist, and Sheriffs of the Citie in great state, being conducted by them through the Citie from St. Victors gate to Saint Germain; she being desirous to see her stately building at Luxemburg house, from whence she retired to the Louure.

The Kings entrie into Paris.

The King was attended at Paris on the sixteenth of May, and received with all Militarie pompe. He was on horsebacke, and the Queene in her open litter, most richly imbroidered. There came out of the Citie about fifty thousand people to see their reception: and the streets and windowes were as full also as they could be. The slander of such as desired not the alliance with Spaine, had caused many things to be spoken of the yong Queenes person: but when men saw her so faire, and resembling the King, they were all humbled.

Prisoners delivered upon the Peace.

Although the Edict and priuate Articles granted to the Prince were not yet verified in Court; yet they proceeded to the execution thereof. The President le Jay was freed from the Castle of Amboise; and the day after his coming to Paris, he went to the Palace to execute his charge. Marquis Boniuet, (who had been taken at Calais, coming out of England, and sent to the Bastile by Marshall D'Ancre) was set at libertie, and the prison doores of the Concergerie were set open for Friaize. The Dukes of Mayn and Bouillon came to Paris, and went to salute their Majesties. The Baron of La Chastre, Gouverneur

A uernour of Berry was sent for by their Majesties, to treat with him touching his gouernment: for the which the King gaue him satisfaction, and made him Marshall of France for his seruices; & they gaue recompence to the Caprains which held any places of strength in Berry to content the Prince. The D. of Vendome went to his house at Chenonceaux. The D. of Longueuille retired into Picardie, & came not to Paris. The Marshall D'Ancre left the Cittadel of Amiens, the which was giuen in charge to the D. of Montbazon, who exchanged his Lieutenantcy of Normandie for that of Picardy; and at the same instant the Marshall was made Lieutenant of Normandie. Belfont Gouverneur of the Castle of Cane left it; and Du Thier entred it for the said Marshall. The King had sent thrice for Monsieur de Vair first President in his Parliament of Prouence, to be made Keeper of the Seales, who came in the end. All the Parliaments of the Realme were much satisfied with the Kings election of a man, whose learning, vertue and integritie was so well knowne to all France. The first Act which he did in his charge was to Seale the Edict of peace, with the verifications and the particular Articles: The chiefe heads whereof I haue thought good to insert.

Articles of the Peace concluded at Loudun.

1. That the remembrance of the troubles past should be suppressed. An Iniunction to live in peace: The exercise of the Catholique religion to be restored where it had bene interrupted. A search for the death of the deceased King Henry the Great. The Publication of the Decree of the Councell of Constance, touching the safety of the life of Kings.

C. Of a Decree giuen in Parliament the second of January 1615; and of that of the Councell giuen sixe dayes after. The Duke of Vendosme and those which have followed him shall have evocation for a yeare of all the suits which they have in the Parliament at Rennes. Fifteen hundred thousand Francks to be given to the Prince for the charges of the warre.

The Kings declaration touching his oath at his Coronation.

At the end of the Generall Estates in the yeare 1613 there had beene a great dispute betweene the Deputies of the Nobility of both Religions, for that the Catholikes had concluded in their Chamber, that petition should be made unto the King, That he would preferre the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, according to the oath which he had taken at his Coronation: which was in these termes: I will endeavour with my whole power, faithfully to expell out of my jurisdiction, and the lands of my subiection, all which shall be declared Heretiques by the Church. They of the Religion made great complaints hereupon, so as the King made a Declaration, of his intent; but they not satisfied therewith, the King was intreated to make a second this yeare the twentieth of July, whereby he declared, That his intent was not in the oath which he had taken at his Coronation, to comprehend his subiects of the Religion living in his Realme vnder the benefit of his Edicts, the which he would have inuolubly observed.

A Shoemaker beaten by the Marshall D'Ancre.

On the 19 of June, a Shoemaker called Picard, Sergeant of the quarter neerer to Saint D Michaels Bridge, going into Saint Germain suburbs, was so beaten with cudgels by two Grooms, set on by the Marshall D'Ancre Gentleman of the horse, as hee was in danger of death. This action was so followed, as the parties which committed this insolency were hanged. Some said that he had beene thus intreated in revenge of that which had past at Port Bussy, the day before Palme Sunday where he was in guard, and had stayed the Marquis D'Ancre from going into the suburbs without a Passport from the towne according to the order; whereupon the Marshall was forced to returne to the Louvre. Others affirmed that this Shoemaker was much afflicted to the Princes party, and had vied no respect in this action, so as he was growne so proud, as he spake scandalously of the Marshall in all places where hee came, the which the Gentleman of the Marshals horse hearing, he could not endure, but had caused him to be beaten as a seditious Detractor.

The Earle of Aumerye set at liberty and restored to his place.

The Earle of Aumerye, having bene eleven yeares and eight moneths prisoner in the Bastile; the King caused him to be set at libertie, and gave him his sword againe; for which he yielded thanks unto their Maiesties. Their pleasures were that the Duke of Nevers should resigne unto him the place of Colonell of the light horse, which had been granted him by the imprisonment of the said Earle. What a strange alteration, to see him that was a prisoner, and neuer thought to be freed at libertie, and within three weekes to command the Kings troopes.

An Ambassador from the great Master of Malta.

About this time Don Lewis Mondes Vascoucelles Bayliffe of Acre, and extraordinary Ambassador for the great Master, and all the order of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, came from Malta to Paris. Many great personages went to meet him, and the King caused him to be lodged, defrayed and served by his Officers. On the day of his audience he came to the Louvre with two and twenty Caroches: where making an honorable relation of the great Master, and of the Knights of the Order, hee besought his Maiestie that as heire to the vertues of his predecessors, as well as of their Estates; so he would continue the effects of his love, and not suffer the Duke of Nevers to dismember the order of the holy Sepulchre from this of Ierusalem, considering their long possession, and the Donation

A Donation made by Pope Innocent the 8, with the generall consent of all Christian Kings and Princes, as well of the dignity of great Master, as of all the lands which they held in their countries. Hee also let him vnderstand, that this order of S. Iohn of Ierusalem was a Seminary of braue and experienced Captaines, and the refuge of the younger brothers of the best Houses of France, where they purchased honor, if they did surmount the hazards which they must vndergoe. Besides the Ports of the Lands which did import much the shipping which did traffique into the Levant. Moreover, he said, that by the erecting of this new Order, the French Knights should have the greatest losse, they holding the most important charges, yea, the great Masters being most commonly Frenchmen. In the end he concluded, that this new institution would be very preiudiciall to the Soueraigne, who should suffer his subiect to engage the will & affections of his Nobility, by a particular vow: shewing that Philip the 2. K. of Spaine, being moued with a holy zeale to aduance the dignitie of the great Master of the Order of the holy Sepulchre; hee no sooner heard the sensible complaints which were made unto him by the Order of Ierusalem, but he renounced his pretention, and commanded his Ambassador to moue his Holinesse to give them a confirmation of the annexion of the order of the holy Sepulchre. To whom the King answered, If my Predecessors have heretofore protected the order with their Love, I have no lesse wil to testifie my affection; so as being informed of the reason which hath been heretofore made of the Order of the holy Sepulchre, will give charge unto my Ambassador residing neere his Holinesse, to incite him on my behalfe that there may be nothing innouated. The which was presently done. In like manner the D. of Nevers wrote unto the great Master; That if he had known his pursuite had been so preiudiciall to their Order, he would neuer haue moued it.

Rothefort, a Gentleman whom the Prince of Conde affected much, came to Paris, & went to saluete their Maiesties on the Princes behalfe; telling them that hee would be sodainly there; but withall he besought the King, that the 33 Article of the Edict of Loudon, touching the inhabitants of Poictiers, who had retired themselves by reason of the tumult might be obserued. Hereupon the King sent the Marshall of Brisac thither. By the Article they were to enter into their charges, as well Militarie, as Iudicature. The common Councell of the towne intreated his Maiefty that they might not enter into their military charges. Hereupon there were many voyages made to the Prince, so as in the end the Militarie charges were excepted, and the Articles put in execution.

The Prince of Conde arrived at Paris the 20 of July: all the Princes and great men of France came thither in a manner at the same instant, amongst the which, the Dukes of Vendosme, Rohan, Sully, and Tremouille, with the Earle of Candale; the Prince of Orange, brother in law to the Prince, with Count Iohn of Nassau came to visit him. They sent Ambassadors to all the neighbour Kings, Princes and States, to aduertise them of the Peace which the King had given unto his subiects. And his Maiefty of Great Britaine sent an extraordinary Embassage by the Lord Hays, Viscount Duncaister, and now Earle of Carleil, to his Maiefty, to congratulate his marriage, who came with many Noblemen and Knights, and a very honorable traine. He was received almost as farre as Saint Denis by the Prince of Ioinville, and many of the French Nobility. He was conducted to his first audience by the Duke of Guise, accompanied by many great Personages; during his abode in Paris he was much feasted, namely, by the Marshall of Bouillon, the D. of Nevers, the Prince of Conde, and others. But a tumult which hapned at Peronne, and the Prince of Condes detention, made an end of their feasts, and bred a great alteration in Court.

The entry which the inhabitants of Peronne gave unto the Duke of Longueuille into their towne, and to put out Faulx, a Gentleman of Gascoine, Lieutenant to the Marshall D'Ancre, Gouverneur in particular of Peronne, Roy, and Mont-Didier, and what followed was the Leauin of the third ciuill warre. The Marshall D'Ancre being made Gouverneur of these townes in the yeare 1610, he made Faulx his Lieutenant in Peronne; who lodged in the Castle; and the Garison in the towne, who had for Captaine Rame Basqueuille, who had in his company 150 souldiers. In Iuly there was a brute dispersed, that the Marshall with his Lieutenant Faulx, would lodge 1000 men in Garison there, of those which should come out of the Cittadell of Amiens: that they would tyrannize ouer them, with their wives and children, and ruine their towne. They seeme amazed, and send to aduertise the Marshall D'Ancre, who was then going to his gouernment in Normandy. But withall they aduertised the Duke of Longueuille of their affection, intreating him to favour their request vnto the King, for the entertainment of that which the deceased King A Henry had promised them when they left the league: That they should have no Governour but one of the Country a good Catholique. The Duke sent them word hee would see them shortly, perswading them not to suffer any Garison to enter. The chiefe Magistrates were willing to receive the Duke, whereunto their Governour opposed, protesting that he would maintaine the Marshalls authoritie with the hazard of his life, and not to suffer the Duke to enter into the towne. Whereupon they resolved to send to Court, to aduertise his Maiestie, and the Prince of Conde: but before their Deputies departed, they resolved to summon Fauls to shew the commission he had to refuse the entry of the towne vnto the Duke of Longueuille; which summons Fauls derided. So the Deputies departed. B Soone after they held an Assembly in the towne, where it was concluded, not to suffer any Gentlemen or Souldiers, friends vnto the Governour Fauls, to enter into Peronne, vntill their Deputies were returned from Court. After many things which past that I must omit, the Duke of Longueuille entred into Peronne, with great applause of the chiefe Magistrates.

The Duke of Longueuille enters Peronne

The Castle is yielded vnto him.

Monsieur Mangot sent to the Duke of Longueuille.

Fauls lost his goods at Peronne, and was imprisoned at Rouen.

On the sixteenth of August, Monsieur Mangot, a Secretarie of State, was sent with Letters from the King to the Duke of Longueuille, but hee arrived not before the Duke was Master of the Castle, and had given it in guard to the Baron of Bernieules; the which was done by the souldiers who were perswaded to yeeld: the Captaine and other Commanders being resolved to defend it, and to attend the Kings troopes which were coming from Paris vnder the leading of the Earle of Auvergne. Monsieur Mangot, having presented his Letters, he said vnto the Duke, That euery man blamed and condemned that which had bene done at Peronne, both by him and the Inhabitants. To whom the Duke answered, That there had not been any thing done against his Maiesties service; but only to suppress the contempt which Fauls and Rames had made of him and of his quality, as Governour General of the Province, contrary to his Maiesties expresse will and intention, and the Treatie of Loudoun. Moreover, he assured himselfe, that this King would not take it ill, his service being no way interested, nor the generall of the State, it only concerning him, and the Marshall D'Ancre in particular, who would not acknowledge him in his qualitie of Governour General, and that he hoped his Maiestie would not make himselfe a party in private quarrels, as hee had formerly most humbly besought him by his Letters.

The same day Fauls with his wife and family were thrust out of Peronne about fixe of the clocke in the evening; having thus lost his goods and fortune: thinking to goe and excuse himselfe to the Marshall D'Ancre, he was committed to prison at Rouen vpon this Maximie; That the Captaine which hath the guard of a strong place importing the State, and suffers it to be lost, should lose his life; yet afterwards he was set at liberty.

The Prince being returned to Paris, there was a councill held touching the businesse at Peronne. It was held that they should not aggravate any thing: and that matters might be reconciled, the Marshall of Bouillon was sent to Peronne to that effect; who vpon his returne vnto their Maiesties, reported, that the Duke of Longueuille, & those of the town besought the King to giue them leave to name three Gentlemen of the Country, one of the which his Maiestie should chooseth to be their Governour; or that he would confirm the Baron of Bernieules, whom the Duke had already put into the Castle. This demand did nothing please their Maiesties, thinking it a blemish to the Soueraignty. The Earle of Auvergne approaching with his light-horse, and part of the Regiment of the Kings guard, thought to lodge in Mount Saint Quintin neere vnto Peronne: but hee found that the Duke of Longueuille assisted by many of his friends and souldiers, which had bene sent vnto him, had seized vpon the place, and made it with a strong Garison. The inhabitants of Peronne were then annoyed not only with the Dukes Garison within the Towne, but also with the Earles troopes which lay about it.

A resolution to seize vpon the Prince of Conde.

Vpon these combustions there was a resolution taken in the Queenes Cabinet to seize vpon the Prince of Conde; person; it being giuen out that hee was the author of these Broiles; that a greater designe would burst forth, and that they meant to seize vpon their Maiesties persons. Wherefore they perswaded the Queene Mother, that if she would haue her selfe assure the Kings person, she should lay hold on the Prince, vnder whose name & authority this conspiracy was plotted. Some write that shee refused to this remedy with griefe, & distressed in heart the pernicious counells which had ruined this

A this great Prince, and had thrust him headlong into these miserable designs, which forced the King to intreat him lesse worthily then his qualitie required, and that for her particular she desired.

The execution of this resolution was on the first of December; the Prince coming to the Louure to assist in Councell. The day before in the evening, the Queene Mother had sent commandement to the Marshalls of France, the Campe-Master of the Regiment of the guards, to the Collonell of the Swisses, and to the Captaines of light-horse to attend the King the next morning. All came, and the Queene saw the Prince enter into the Councell Chamber. Monsieur de Themines had received commandement to haue his two sonnes still by him, and to giue order that a dozen of his people whom he did best trust, should walke in the Court to be employed vpon occasion. D'Elbene, Lieutenant to the Duke of Anjou company of light-horse, had the like charge. They draw their people together, and were led into a Chamber where they found the King and Queene alone: the King came to euery one of them a Halbard, saying, I doe not giue you these Armes to offend any man, if you doe not see that Themines and D'Elbene are forced to draw their swords, and that there is resistance made to the execution of my command. All hauing promised to live and dye in the fidelitie which they ought him, they were brought into a low Hall, whether the Prince should be brought as soone as he was arrested. All the Captaines which were in guard about the Louure were commanded to stand at their guard. The Baron of C Thiangs who walked in the Court; and seeing this stirring, hee coniectured there was some designe: and for that there was none of the Princes in the Louure but the Prince of Conde, he doubted of some enterprize against his Person, which made him goe to the Councell chamber doore, where were many Councillors of State.

The Queene Mother who was ready to execute this great designe, had a watchfull eye to all occurrents: she sent a Gentleman to the Councell chamber doore to see what became of the Prince. The Baron of Thiangs seeing him come, said vnto him, you come to call the Prince vnto the Queene. To whom he answered, pardon me, Sir, I haue some businesse with a person who is there within, but I feare me he will not come out so soon. Wherefore I will leave my Lackey here, to desire him that I may haue the honour to D speake with him before hee goe from the Louure. Hereupon Thiangs became the lesse suspicious: yet he stayed at the Councell chamber doore, vntill the Prince came forth, and drawing neere vnto him told him in his eare the ialousie which hee had. But the Prince little regarding this aduice, passed along through the Swissers Hall, with the keeper of the Seales, the Marshall of Brisac, and the President Jannin, and so entered all four into the Queenes Chamber, where the King was leaning in the window with many Lords about him. The Queene was in her Cabinet. The King turning vnto him as he entered, said, Good morrow Monsieur le Prince, I am going a hunting, will you make one? To whom hee answered, Your Maiestie, if you please will excuse me: Hereunto the King replied, I will goe tell the Queene my mother that I goe to hunt the Roobucke E after I haue heard Masse. Adieu Monsieur le Prince.

The Kings Speech to the Prince of Conde

The King being entred into the Queenes Cabinet, Themines came with his two sonnes out of an entry, who approaching neere vnto the Prince, said:

My Lord the King being aduertised that you giue eare to many Counsels, contrarie to his service, and that they will make you embrace designs ruinous to the Estate, and to your owne condition, hee hath commanded mee to seize vpon your person, to keepe you from falling into these accidents: and at the same time his two sonnes came on either side the Prince, who said to the Seigneur de Themines: Me? He answered, I obey my Lord. Then said the Prince, You know my qualitie: Themines. I know the respect I owe you; but I know also the obedience I owe vnto the King. Hereupon the Prince desired to speake vnto the King, and F to iustifie himselfe before their Maiesties. Themines said vnto him, My Lord, let us see whether the King hath commanded me to conduct you. The Prince offering to retire backe, and turning towards the Noblemen which were present, said, Is there no man here for mee? but they stood gazing at this confection, like transformed Statues; they were amazed to see the first Prince of the blood thus arrested; but knew not the cause. Then Themines said vnto him, My Lord, here is no place to make resistance. The Prince seeing himselfe prest to goe out of the Chamber, desired againe to speake with their Maiesties, for hee had no will to goe forth, vntill that Themines had assured assured him, that neither he nor any other had charge to wrong him. In the end suffering himselfe to be led into a Hall which was prepared for him : and seeing D'Elbene (whom he loued not) with so many men with Halberts, he said, Alas I am dead, for he had a great apprehension of death, the which D'Elbene pacified, saying, That all they whom hee saw there were Gentlemen and no murderers, who had not any other commandement from the King but to guard him. He spake not any word against their Maiesties, but stood long silent, seeming much grieved for the change of his liberty into captiuitie.

The Princes flee
from Paris.

At the same instant all the guards were set vpon the approaches of the Louure, and they which were walking in the Court were put forth. The newes hereof was soone brought vnto the Princes his associates. They were sodainly disperfed like a Cove of Partridges before the Hawke; they apprehended the danger, but were ignorant of the cause. They which were sent to seize vpon the Duke of Vendosme, found that in coming to the Louure he had bene aduertised, and was escaped by Saint Honories suburbs, posting towards La Fere (a towne which belonged vnto him, as the inheritance of the Dukes of Vendosme) so as they could not ouertake him. The Marquis of Cœuure, gouernour of Laon, Vncle by the mothers side to the Duke of Vendosme, went to aduertise the Duke of Mayen of the Princes arrest. Hereupon there was no other talke but of going to horsebacke, all flee away in small troopes. They goe and meet the Marshall of Bouillon nere vnto Charenton, being gone forth that morning to the preaching. At the rising of the Palace, President le Jay remembring Amboise, desired rather to take the fresh aire of the fields by Saint Anthones gate, then to remaine in Paris.

The Princesse
Dowager of Conde flees to mouer the people.

The newes of this arrest being brought to Conde House, in the Suburbs of Saint Germain, where the Princes Mother remained, the presently tooke her Caroe and went to our Ladies Bridge, thinking to moue the people, some of the Princes Gentlemen did the like, crying, To Armes my masters of Paris, the Marshall D'Ancre hath caused the Prince of Conde, the first Prince of the Blood to be slaine, To Armes good Frenchmen to Armes. But there were very few which made any shew to stir: which the Princesse seeing, she returned to her lodging, where many Noble men, and Captaines came to take aduice whether they should arme and goe directly to the Louure for the Princes deliuerie. It was propounded, that there might be some Burgeses well affected would ioyne with them, and so together they might make an attempt. You may doe it said one of them: but consider that the Magistrates of Paris, with the common people will bee for their Maiesties, and then what shall become of vs, when as the Kings guards shall hinder our approach to the Louure, and at our backes they shall draw the chaines: before wee goe to this dangerous attempt, it shall be good to twetene the multitude with the spoile of the Marshall D'Ancre lodging, and thereby breed a desire in them to follow vs.

The Marshall
D'Ancre house
spoiled.

This aduice was allowed, and presently executed. The Marshalls House was neere vnto the Palace, which the Queene was building, and Conde house was in the same street. Some of the Princes household seruants, hauing encouraged certaine Mafons and other labourers which wrought in the Queenes buildings. They goe and breake open the gates, with such fury, as the Porter and other seruants were glad to saue themselves by the Garden. They went into the Hals and Chambers; some cast goods out at the windowes, others filled their pockets with gold, siluer, and what they found most precious. The first which caried any thing into the Citie, serued as Trumpets to aduertise the multitude that the Marshall D'Ancre lodging was vpon spoile.

In the afternoone Monsieur de Lioncourt, Gouernour of Paris, with the Knight of the Watch came thither with their Archers, thinking to stay this Spoile, but they found some of the Princes people armed with their Pistols, and encouraging the multitude, and one of them flew Adonville with a shot: whereupon the Gouernour retired. The multitude was so great, and so greedy of Spoile, as they hurt one another, yea, some were crueltie in pieces with that was throwne from above. All good men trembled at this action, and detested their counsell which had taught the people the way to spoile.

de Lioncourt retired
to Paris.

In the meane time the Duke of Mayen and the Marshall of Bouillons troopes encreased, marching towards Picardie. The Duke with some others were of opinion to returne to Paris, and to ioyne with them of their faction, but the Marshall de Bouillon was of another opinion, saying, Our proceffe cannot be decided but when the doores are open, they that

As haue bene accustomed to iudge when the doores are shut let them goe to Paris, if they desire to creep vnder there, I hold that the way to Soissons is the safest for vs.

The Prouost of Merchants hauing bene at the Louure to know the Kings pleasure, he vnderstood that the Prince was onely in custody, the which was presently made knowne to all the quarters where many had shut vp their shops, commanding all the Coronels and Captaines to see the peace maintained, and to forbid them to arme but vpon commandement. The Duke of Guise being at his house, was presently aduertised of this accident: He sent the Prince of Ioinville his brother vnto their Maiesties, to know the cause; and soone after, Monsieur de Pralin came from the King vnto the Duke, who about foure of the clocke in the afternoone retired out of Paris, with the Prince his brother, following the Duke of Mayen their Cousin towards Soissons.

The Duke of Guise, and the Prince his brother retire from Court.

During these actions, Monsieur Themines, his sonnes, and D'Elbene, entertained the Prince: they asked him if he would eate, but he refused it; yet in the end he was content so as his officers might bring it: whereupon it was agreed, that one should come and serue him, and nor depart; and that his officers should prepare his diet and bring it to the chamber doore. Monsieur de Luyues came to visit him from the King, and La Motte from the Queene mother. He demanded if the Marshall of Bouillon were taken, and spake many things of him. The Queene mother hearing that Rouffort (a Gentleman whom the Prince affected much, and whom he had made Gouernour of the Castle of Chynon) was come thither, with an intent to hold it by strength, and to draw together the friends of that partie; he caused the Prince to signe Letters and to adresse them to such as hee had put into Chynon and the Tower of Bourges, that they should resigne those places into the hands of those the King should ordaine: which hee promised to doe, and afterwards performed.

The King and Queene lend to visit the Prince.

Night hauing caused them to stay their spoile in the Marshall D'Ancre house, hauing left nothing but the rafters, Iron, and some Lead, they came in troopes to make an end, and carie away all, which was a fearfull sight. About nine of the clocke, this rascall rable fell vpon the house of Corbinnell the Marshalls Secretary, the which within an houre and a halfe they emptied of all the goods, siluer, plate, or whatsoever was portable. They threatened the neighbour houses, and they were consulting to goe into the Citie, and to doe as much to the Colledge of Marmoutier, where the Abbot (brother to the Marshall D'Ancre wife) was lodged: This aduice was caried to the Louure. They of the Suburbs of Saint Germaine were presently commanded to arme: the Lieutenant Criminall with his Sergeants to goe into Saint Iames street, and Monsieur de Creguy to the Marshall D'Ancre house, with the three Companies, which should be relieved from their Guard at the Louure, which he effected accordingly. These spoilers saw themselves presently shut vp betwene the Kings Guards and the inhabitants of the suburbs who were in armes; yet they thought it good to giue them a free passage, with commandement to retire, and not to returne any more, vpon paine of punishment; for they desired to pacifie and not to exasperate things.

The Marshalls
Secretary house
spoiled.

Thus from Thursday till Friday at noone, the Marshall D'Ancre house and his Secretaries were spoiled and ruined, so as there remained nothing but foure bare wals, without couering. The losse was very great in pictures, guildings, marbles, apparell, linnen, mouebles, tapistrie, metalls of gold and siluer, plate, with many goodly curiosities, which great men haue in their cabinets: all which did nothing profit them which were the authors. There was an intent to make criminall searches by the ordinary Iustice; but it was thought best to proceed ciuilly and by way of excommunication. There were some Curats which so detested this act, as many of the petty theeves brought what they had stolne to the Commissarie of the Quarter, or cast it into a Waggon which was appointed to that end.

Their Maiesties seeing themselves ill assisted by their ordinary Guards, they sent commandement to the Earle of Auvergne, who lay about Peronne, to returne speedily with his troopes to Paris: the which he did. The long and faithfull seruices of braue Cheualiers haue for their reward honors and great military charges. So the King knowing the good and faithfull seruices which the Seigneurs of Themines and Montigny had done vnto the Estate, he made them Marshalls of France. In the meane time they prepared a Chamber, the windowes barred with Iron, about the great Hall in the Louure for the

The French Church shall be conferred in her rights and liberties. The King shall not suffer anything to be done against his authority concerning the Council of Trent. The Castle of LeCours shall be put into the hands of an Exempt of the guard, until the difference between the Seigneurs of Fontenailles and D'Auquin be judged by the King. Villemereau a Councillor of the Parliament, and Le Maître, Master of Accompts, shall be readmitted to their Offices. The Ministers of the Religion shall enjoy those exemptions which have been granted unto them. The inhabitants of Millaw shall enjoy the effects of the abolitions heretofore granted. The Lady D'Audoux, and the Siegneur of Saint Foy, shall be discharged of that which hath past at Belstat. The Siegneur of Aradon shall be reestablished Gouverneur in Vannes. The charge of great Master of the Artillery confirmed in his authority, notwithstanding the Declaration made in favour of the Siegneur de Bors. Cugnot the Provinciall Receiver of Tiches in Burgundy shall be discharged of one and twenty thousand Franckes, which Mont de Mayen hath received of him. The Commission for the razing of the Castle of Tigny in Anjou revoked. The Duke of Vendosme and those which have followed him shall have evocation for a year of all the suits which they have in the Parliament at Rennes. Fifteen hundred thousand Francks to be given to the Prince for the charges of the warre.

At the end of the General Estates in the year 1615 there had been a great dispute between the Deputies of the Nobility of both Religions; for that the Catholics had concluded in their Chamber, that petition should be made unto the King, That he would preserue the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, according to the oath which he had taken at his Coronation: which was in these termes: I will endeavor with my whole power, faithfully to expell out of my jurisdiction, and the lands of my jurisdiction, all such as shall be declared Heretiques by the Church. They of the Religion made great complaints hereupon, so as the King made a Declaration, of his intent; but they not satisfied therewith, the King was intreated to make a second this year, the twentieth of July, whereby he declared, That his intent was not in the oath which he had taken at his Coronation, to comprehend his subjects of the Religion living in his Realme under the benefit of his Edicts, the which he would have innocently observed.

On the 19 of June, a Shoemaker called Pierre, Sergeant of the water, neerer Saint Michaels Bridge, going into Saint Germain suburbs, was to be beaten with cudgels by two Grosmen, set on by the Marshall D'Ancre Gentleman of the household, who was in danger of death. This action was so followed, as the parties which committed this insolency were enlarged. Some said that he had been thus intreated in revenge of that which had past at Port Buffy, the day before Palmesunday when he was in guard, and had killed the Marquis D'Ancre from going into the suburbs without a Passport from the Countess, according to a such order; whereupon the Marshall was forced to returne to the Duke, others affirmed that this Shoemaker was much distressed to the Princes party, and had been more specifically intreated, so as he was growne so proud, as he spoke scandalously of the Marshall in all places where he came, the which this Gentleman of the Marshalls household hearing, could not endure, but had caused him to be beaten as a seditious Detraitor.

The Earle of Auvergne having bene eleven years and eight months prisoner in the Bastile, the King caused him to be set at liberty, and gave him his sword againe, for which he thanked him with their Maesties. Their pleasures were that the Duke of Nevers should resigne unto him the place of Colonell of the light horse, which had bene given him by the imprisonment of the said Earle. What a strange alteration, so he him was a prisoner, and never thought to be freed at liberty, and within three weeks to overcome and kill Kings prisoners.

About this time en Louis, Monsieur de Flandres Bayle of Acre, and extraordinary Ambassador for the great Master, and all the Order of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, came from Malta to Paris. Many great personages went to meet him, and the King caused him to be lodged, decayed and served by his Officers. On the day of his audience he came to the Louvre with two and twenty Carouches, where making an honorable relation of the great Master, and of the Kingdoms of the Order, he brought his Maistie to the houses of his predecessors, as well as of their Estates, so he would demonstrate the cause of his house, and not suffer the Duke of Nevers to withdraw the order of the holy Sepulchre from this of Ierusalem, considering their long possession, and the

Donation

A Donation made by Papa Innocent the 8, with the general consent of all Christian Kings and Princes, as well of the dignity of great Master, as of all the lands which they held in their countries. He also let him understand, that this order of S. Iohn of Ierusalem was a Secretary of State and experienced Captaines, and the refuge of the younger brothers of the best Houses of France, where they purchased honor, if they did surmount the hazards which they must undergoe. Besides the Ports of the Ilands which did import much the shipping which did traffique into the Levant, Morguer, he said, that by the erecting of this new Order, the French Knights should have the greatest losse, they holding the most important charges, yea, the great Masters being most commonly Frenchmen. In the end he concluded, that this new institution would be very prejudiciall to the Souveraigne, who should suffer his subject to engage the will & affections of his Nobility, by a particular vow: shewing that Philip the 2. K. of Spaine, being moved with a holy zeale to advance the dignity of the great Master of the Order of the holy Sepulchre; hee no sooner heard the sensible complaints which were made unto him by the Order of Ierusalem, but he renounced his pretention, and commanded his Ambassador to move his Holinesse to give them a confirmation of the annexion of the order of the holy Sepulchre. To whom the King answered, If my Predecessors have heretofore provided the order with their Love, I have no less will to testify my affection, so as being informed of the union which hath bene heretofore made of the Order of the holy Sepulchre, I will give charge unto my Ambassador residing neere his Holinesse, to treat him on my behalfe that there may be nothing innovated. The which was presently done. In like manner the D. of Nevers wrote unto the great Master, That if he had known his purpose had been so prejudiciall to their Order, he would never have moved it.

Before a Gentleman whom the Prince of Conde affected much, came to Paris, & went to the King, on the Princes behalf; telling them that hee would bee sojourning there but withall he thought the King, that the 33 Article of the Edict of Loudun, touching the inhabitants of Poitiers, who had retired themselves by reason of the tumult might be observed. Hereupon the King sent the Marshall of Brisac thither. By the Article they were to enter into their charges, as well Militarie, as Iudicature. The common Councill of the towne intreated his Maistie that they might not enter into their military charges. Hereupon there were many voyages made to the Prince, so as in the end the Militarie charges were excepted, and the Articles put in execution.

The Prince of Conde arrived at Paris the 20 of July: all the Princes and great men of France came thither in a manner at the same instant, amongst the which the Dukes of Vendosme, Rohan, Sully, and Tremouille, with the Earle of Candale, the Prince of Orange brother in law to the Prince, with Count Jehan of Nassau came to visit him. They sent Ambassadors to all the neighbour Kings, Princes and States, to advertise them of the Peace which the King had given unto his subjects. And his Maistie of Great Brittain sent an extraordinary Embassage by the Lord Rays, Viscount of Auster, and now Earle of Caileil, to his Maistie to congratulate his marriages; who came with many Noblemen and Knights, and a very honorable traine. He was received almost as farre as Saint Denis by the Prince of Ioinville, and many of the French Nobility. He was conducted to his first audience by the Duke of Guise, accompanied by many great Personages; during his abode in Paris he was much frequented, namely by the Marshall of Bouillon, the D. of Nevers, the Prince of Conde, and others. A tumult which happened at Peronne, and the Prince of Condes detention, made an end of their feasts, and bred a great alteration in Court.

The fury which the inhabitants of Peronne gave unto the Duke of Longueville, and his town, and to put out Faulx the Gentleman of Gaucourt, Lieutenant to the Marshall D'Ancre, Gouverneur in particular of Peronne, Rob, and Mont Didier, and when Faulx was the Equin of the third Quillistre. The Marshall D'Ancre being made Governor of these townes in the year 1610, he made Faulx his Lieutenant in Peronne, and lodged in the Castle, and the Garrison in the towne, who had for Captaine Robert de Guiseville, who had in his company 30 soldiers. In Iuly there was a brute disseminated, that the Marshall with his Lieutenants Faulx, would lodge 3000 men in Guiseville, of which some should come out of the Citadel of Amiens; that they would tyrannize over them, kill with their wives and children, and burn their towne. They were amazed, and sent to the Marshall, and he answered them, saying, that he was going to his government, and that he would not they should misse the Duke of Longueville of their protection, and that he would favour their request vnto the King for the entertainment of that which the deceased King Henry had promised them when they left the league: That they should have no Governor but one of the Country a good Catholique. The Duke sent them word hee would see them shortly, perswading them not to suffer any Garison to enter. The chiefe Magistrates were willing to receive the Duke, whereunto their Governour opposed, protesting that he would maintaine the Marshalls authority with the hazard of his life, and not to suffer the Duke to enter into the towne. Whereupon they resolved to send to Court, to aduertise his Maiestie and the Prince of Conde: but before their Deputies departed, they resolved to summon Fauols to shew the commission he had to refuse the entry of the towne vnto the Duke of Longueuille, which summons Fauols derided. So the Deputies departed. B Soone after they held an Assembly in the towne, where it was concluded, not to suffer any Gentlemen or Souldiers, friends vnto the Governour Fauols, to enter into Peronne, vntill their Deputies were returned from Court. After many things which past that I must omit, the Duke of Longueuille entred into Peronne, with great applause of the chiefe Magistrates.

The Duke of Longueuille enters Peronne
The Castle is yielded vnto him.

Monseigneur de Montmorency sent to the Duke of Longueuille.

Fauols lost his goods at Peronne, and was imprisoned at Rouen.

On the sixteenth of August, Monsieur Montgoy, a Secretarie of State, was sent with Letters from the King to the Duke of Longueuille, but hee arrived not before the Duke was Master of the Castle, and had given it in guard to the Baron of Bernieules, the which was done by the souldiers who were perswaded to yield: the Captaine and other Commanders being resolved to defend it, and to attend the Kings troopes which were coming from Paris vnder the leading of the Earle of Auvergne. Monsieur Montgoy, having presented his Letters, he said vnto the Duke, That euery man blamed and condemned that which had beene done at Peronne, both by him and the Inhabitants. To whom the Duke answered, That there had not been any thing done against his Maiesties service, but only to suppress the contempt which Fauols and Rames had made of him and of his quality, as Governour General of the Province, contrary to his Maiesties expresse will and indication, and the Treatie of London. Moreover, he assured himselfe, that the King would not take it ill, his service being no way interessed, nor the generall of the State, it only concerning him, and the Marshall D'Ancre in particular, who would not acknowledge him in his quality of Governour General, and that he hoped his Maiestie would not make him selfe a party in private quarrels, as hee had formerly most humbly besought him by his Letters.

The same day Fauols with his wife and family were thrust out of Peronne about fixe of the clocke in the evening, hauing thus lost his goods and fortune: thinking to goe and excuse himselfe to the Marshall D'Ancre, he was committed to prison at Rouen vpon this Murther: That the Captaine which hath the guard of a strong place importing the State, and suffers it to be lost, should lose his life, yet afterwards he was set at liberty.

The Prince being returned to Paris, there was a councill held touching the businesse at Peronne. It was held that they should not aggravate any thing: and that matters might be reconciled, the Marshall of Bouillon was sent to Peronne to that effect: who vpon his returne vnto their Maiesties, reported, that the Duke of Longueuille & those of the town brought the King to giue them league to name three Gentlemen of the Country, one of the which his Maiestie should chooe to be their Governour, or that he would confirm the Baron of Bernieules, whom the Duke had already put into the Castle. This demand did not please their Maiesties, thinking it a blemish to the Souerainety. The Earle of Auvergne approaching with his light-horse, and part of the Regiment of the Kings guard, thought to lodge in Mount Saint Quintin neere vnto Peronne: but hee found that the Duke of Longueuille assisted by many of his friends and souldiers, which had beene sent vnto him had taken vpon the place, and made it with a strong Garison. The inhabitants of Peronne, were then annoyed not only with the Dukes Garison within the towne, but also with the Earles troopes which lay about it.

A resolution to seize vpon the Prince of Conde.

Upon these combustions there was a resolution taken in the Queenes Cabinet to seize vpon the Prince of Conde's person, it being giuen out that hee was the author of these Broiles, that a greater designe would burst forth, and that they meant to seize vpon their Maiesties person. Wherefore they perswaded the Queene Mother, that if she should see her selfe in danger the Kings person, she should lay hold on the Prince, vnder the colour of her authority this contray was plotted. Some write that these resolutions were made with griefe, & detested in heart the pernicious counsells which had caused this

A this great Prince, and had thrust him headlong into these miserable designs, which forced the King to intreat him lesse worthily then his qualitie required, and that for her particular the desired.

The execution of this resolution was on the first of December, the Prince coming to the Louure to assist in Councill. The day before in the evening, the Queene Mother had sent commandment to the Marshalls of France, the Campe-Master of the Regiment of the guards, to the Collonell of the Swisses, and to the Captaines of light-horse to attend the King the next morning. All came, and the Queene saw the Prince enter into the Councill Chamber. Monsieur de Themines had received commandment to haue his two sonnes still by him, and to giue order that a dozen of his people whom he did best trust, should walke in the Court to be employed vpon occasion. D'Elbene, Lieutenant to the Duke of Anious company of light-horse, had the like charge. They draw their people together, and were led into a Chamber where they found the King and Queene alone: the King gaue to euery one of them a Halbard, saying, I doe not giue you these Armes to offend any man, if you doe not see that Themines and D'Elbene are forced to draw their swords, and that there is resistance made to the execution of my command. All hauing promised to lue and dye in the fidelitie which they ought him, they were brought into a low Hall, whither the Prince should be brought as soone as hee was arrested. All the Captaines which were in guard about the Louure were commanded to stand at their guard. The Baron of Thianges who walked in the Court, and seeing this stirring, hee coniectured there was some designe: and for that there was none of the Princes in the Louure but the Prince of Conde, he doubted of some enterprize against his Person, which made him goe to the Councill chamber doore, where were many Councillors of State.

The Queene Mother who was ready to execute this great designe, had a watchfull eye to all occurrents: she sent a Gentleman to the Councill chamber doore to see what became of the Prince, The Baron of Thianges seeing him come, said vnto him, you come to call the Prince vnto the Queene. To whom he answered, pardon me, Sir, I haue some businesse with a person who is there within, but I feare me he will not come out so soon. Wherefore I will leave my Lackey here, to tell him that I may haue the honour to speake with him before hee goe from the Louure. Hereupon Thianges became the lesse suspicious; yet he stayed at the Councill chamber doore, vntill the Prince came forth, and drawing neere vnto him told him in his eare the ieaousie which hee had. But the Prince little regarding this aduice, passed along through the Swisses Hall, with the keeper of the Seales, the Marshall of Brisac, and the President Iannin, and so entered all foure into the Queenes Chamber, where the King was leaning in the window with many Lords about him. The Queene was in her Cabinet. The King turning vnto him as hee entered, said, Good morrow Monsieur le Prince, I am going a hunting, will you make one? To whom hee answered, Your Maiestie, if you please will excuse me: Hereunto the King replied, I will goe tell the Queene my mother that I goe to hunt the Roobucke. After I haue heard Masse. Adieu Monsieur le Prince.

The King being entred into the Queenes Cabinet, Themines came with his two sonnes out of an entry, who approaching neere vnto the Prince, said: My Lord the King being aduertised that you giue eare to many Counsells, contrary to his service, and that they will make you embrace designs ruinous to the Estate, and to your owne condition, hee hath commanded me to seize vpon your person, to keepe you from falling into these accidents: and at the same time his two sonnes came on either side the Prince, who said to the Seigneure de Themines Me? He answered, I am your Lord. Then said the Prince, You know my qualitie? Themines I know I respect I owe you, but I know also the obedience I owe vnto the King. Hereupon the Prince desired to speake vnto the King, and to iustifie himselfe before their Maiesties. Themines said vnto him, My Lord, let us goe whither the King hath commanded me to conduict you. The Prince offering to retire backe, and turning towards the Noblemen which were present, said, Is there no man heere for mee? but they stood gazing at this contestation, like transformed Statues; they were amazed to see the first Prince of the blood thus arrested, but knew not the cause. Then Themines said vnto him, My Lord, heere is no place to make resistance. The Prince seeing himselfe prest to goe out of the Chamber, desired againe to speake with their Maiesties, for hee had no will to goe forth, vntill that Themines had assured him, that neither he nor any other had charge to wrong him. In the end suffering A himselfe to be led into a Hall which was prepared for him : and seeing D'Elbene (whom he loved not) with so many men with Halberts, he said, Alas I am dead, for he had a great apprehension of death, the which D'Elbene pacified, saying, That all they whom hee saw there were Gentlemen and no murderers, who had not any other commandement from the King but to guard him. He spake not any word against their Maiesties, but stood long silent, seeming much grieved for the change of his liberty into captiuitie.

from Paris.

At the same instant all the guards were set vpon the approaches of the Louure, and they which were walking in the Court were put forth. The newes hercof was soone brought vnto the Princes his associates. They were sodainly dispersed like a Cove of Partridges before the Hawke; they apprehended the danger, but were ignorant of the cause. B They which were sent to seize vpon the Duke of Vendosme, found that in coming to the Louure he had bene aduertised, and was escaped by Saint Honories suburbs, posting towards La Fere (a towne which belonged vnto him, as the inheritance of the Dukes of Vendosme) so as they could not overtake him. The Marquis of Cœuure, gouverneur of Laon, vnde by the mothers side to the Duke of Vendosme, went to aduertise the D. of Mayen of the Princes arrest. Hereupon there was no other talke but of going to horsebacke, all flee away in small troops. They goe and meet the Marshall of Bouillon neere vnto Charenton, being gone forth that morning to the preaching. At the rising of the Palace, President le Jay remembering Amboise, desired rather to take the fresh aire of the fields by Saint Anthonies gate, then to remaine in Paris. C

The Princesse
Dowager of Condé seeks to moue the people.

The newes of this arrest being brought to Conde House, in the Suburbs of Saint Germain, where the Princes Mother remained, she presently tooke her Caroe and went to our Ladies Bridge, thinking to moue the people, some of the Princes Gentlemen did the like, crying, To Armes my masters of Paris, the Marshall D'Ancre hath caused the Prince of Conde, the first Prince of the Blood to be slaine, To Armes good Frenchmen to Armes. But there were very few which made any shew to stir: which the Princesse seeing, she returned to her lodging, where many Noble men, and Captaines came to take aduice whether they should arme and goe directly to the Louure for the Princes deliuerie. It was propounded, that there might be some Burgesse well affected would ioyne with them, and so together they might make an attempt. You may doe it said one of them : but consider that the Magistrats of Paris, with the common people will bee for their Maiesties, and then what shall become of vs, when as the Kings guards shall hinder our approach to the Louure, and at our backes they shall draw the chaines : before wee goe to this dangerous attempt, it shall be good to sweeten the multitude with the spoile of the Marshall D'Ancre's lodging, and thereby breed a desire in them to follow vs. D

The Marshall
D'Ancre's house
spoiled.

This aduice was allowed, and presently executed. The Marshalls House was neere vnto the Palace, which the Queene was building, and Conde house was in the same street. Some of the Princes household seruants, hauing encouraged certaine Mafons and other labourers which wrought in the Queenes buildings. They goe and breake open E the gates, with such fury, as the Porter and other seruants were glad to saue themselves by the Garden. They went into the Halls and Chambers; some cast goods out at the windows, others filled their pockets with gold, siluer, and what they found most precious. The first which caried any thing into the Citie, serued as Trumpets to aduertise the multitude that the Marshall D'Ancre's lodging was vpon spoile.

In the afternoone Monsieur de Lioncourt, Gouverneur of Paris, with the Knight of the Watch came thither with their Archers, thinking to stay this Spoile, but they found some of the Princes people armed with their Pistols, and encouraging the multitude, and one of them slew Adonville with a shot : whereupon the Gouverneur retired. The multitude was so great, and so greedy of Spoile, as they hurt one another, yea, some were cruell in pieces with that was throwne from aboue. All good men trembled at this action, and detested their counsell which had taught the people the way to spoile.

The Marshall
de Bouillon returned to return
to Paris.

In the meane time the Duke of Mayen and the Marshall of Bouillons troops encreased, marching towards Picardie. The Duke with some others were of opinion to returne to Paris, and to ioyne with them of their faction, but the Marshall of Bouillon was of another opinion, saying, Our proceffe cannot be decided but when the doores are open, they that have

A have bene accustomed to iudge when the doores are shut let them goe to Paris, if they desire to copped up there, I hold that the way to Soissons is the safest for us.

The Prouost of Merchants hauing bene at the Louure to know the Kings pleasure, he vnderstood that the Prince was onely in custody, the which was presently made knowne to all the quarters where many had shut vp their shops, commanding all the Coronels and Captaines to see the peace maintained, and to forbid them to arme but vpon commandement. The Duke of Guise being at his house, was presently aduertised of this accident : He sent the Prince of Ioinville his brother vnto their Maiesties, to know the cause, and soone after, Monsieur de Pralin came from the King vnto the Duke, who about foure B of the clocke in the afternoone retired out of Paris, with the Prince his brother, following the Duke of Mayen their Cousin towards Soissons.

The Duke of Guise, and the Prince his brother retire from Court.

During these actions, Monsieur Themines, his sonnes, and D'Elbene, entertained the Prince : they asked him if he would eate, but he refused it; yet in the end he was content so as his officers might bring it : whereupon it was agreed, that one should come and serue him, and not depart; and that his officers should prepare his diet and bring it to the chamber doore. Monsieur de Luynes came to visit him from the King, and La Motte from the Queene mother. He demanded if the Marshall of Bouillon were taken, and spake many things of him. The Queene mother hearing that Rochefort (a Gentleman whom the Prince affected much, and whom he had made Gouverneur of the Castle of Chynon) was C gone thither, with an intent to hold it by strength, and to draw together the friends of that partie, she caused the Prince to signe Letters and to adresse them to such as hee had put into Chynon and the Tower of Bourges, that they should resigne those places into the hands of those the King should ordaine : which hee promised to doe, and afterwards performed.

The King and
visit the Prince.

Night hauing caused them to stay their spoile in the Marshall D'Ancre's house, ha- D ling left nothing but the rapiers, Iron, and some Lead, they came in troops to make an end, and carie away all, which was a fearfull sight. About nine of the clocke, this rascall rable fell vpon the house of Carbinell the Marshals Secretary, the which within an houre and a halfe they emptied of all the goods, siluer, plate, or whatsoever was portable. They D threatened the neighbour houses, and they were consulting to goe into the City, and to doe as much to the Colledge of Marmoutier, where the Abbot (brother to the Marshall D'Ancre's wife) was lodged : This aduice was caried to the Louure. They of the Suburbs of Saint Germaine were presently commanded to arme : the Lieutenant Criminall with his Sergeants to goe into Saint Iames street, and Monsieur de Creguy to the Marshall D'An- cres house, with the three Companies, which should be relieved from their Guard at the Louure, which he effected accordingly. These spoilers saw themselves presently shut vp betwene the Kings Guards and the inhabitants of the suburbs who were in armes; yet they thought it good to giue them a free passage, with commandement to retire, and not to returne any more, vpon paine of punishment; for they desired to pacifie and not to ex- E asperate things.

The Marshals
Secretarys house
spoiled.

Thus from Thursday till Friday at noone, the Marshall D'Ancre's house and his Secre- taries were spoiled and ruined, so as there remained nothing but foure bare walls, without covering. The losse was very great in pictures, guildings, marbles, apparell, linnen, moueables, tapistrie, mettals of gold and siluer, plate, with many goodly curiosities, which great men haue in their cabinets : all which did nothing profit them which were the au- thors. There was an intent to make criminall searches by the ordinary Iustice ; but it was thought best to proceed ciuilly and by way of excommunication. There were some Cu- rars which so detested this act, as many of the petty theeves brought what they had stolne to the Commiffarie of the Quarter, or cast it into a Waggon which was appointed to F that end.

Their Maiesties seeing themselves ill assisted by their ordinary Guards, they sent com- mandement to the Earle of Auvergne, who lay about Peronne, to returne speedily with his troops to Paris : the which he did. The long and faithfull seruices of braue Cheual- liers haue for their reward honors and great military charges. So the King knowing the good and faithfull seruices which the Seigneurs of Themines and Montigny had done vnto the Estate, he made them Marshalls of France. In the meane time they prepared a Chamber, the windows barred with Iron, about the great Hall in the Louure for the

the Princes lodging, whither hee was conducted the third of September.

The Duke of Guise being at Soissons, wrote vnto the King, and the Duke of Neuers from Charleville, they desiring to be certified of the cause why the Prince had bene stayed. The Duke of Guise wrote in this manner :

The Duke of Guise's Letter
to the King.

Sir : I haue receiued from Monsieur d'Aumont the Letter which it pleased your Maietie to write vnto me, and haue heard the credit which you haue giuen him, testifying the continuance of the assurance which it pleaseth your Maieftie to haue of the fidelity of my seruice, the which I will continue without any exception. Hearing of the Princes " detension, I sent my brother the Prince of Ioinville to know the cause, the which I could not, neither by him nor any other that came vnto me: holding this businesse of such consequence, as if the grounds be not very cleere, and the proofes infallible, they may in-uolue in the like proceedings your best seruants, as I am and will alwayes be : and knowing the departure of Monsieur de Mayen, he gaue me occasion to come to this place, where I most humbly beseech your Maieftie that I may know what the Prince hath committed against his dutie and your seruice ; to the end I may haue meanes to enforme your ser-uants, and to inuite them to continue their seruice vnto your Maiefty, and to free them from the impressions which they may take, being ingaged by bad Counsellors in some prejudiciall action. I will euer rest your most humble and most obedient subiect and seruant, Charles of Lorraine Duke of Guise.

The Duke of Neuers Letter
to the King.

The Duke of Neuers wrote in another style in these tearmes : Sir, When I came vnto this frontier, to take my way directly towards the Emperors Court, according to the commandement and commission I had from your Maieftie, I receiued the Letter wherewith it pleased you to honour mee : by the which I vnderstand of the arrest which hath bene made of the Princes person, vpon an aduice which you sent mee word was giuen you, that some meaning to attempt against your person, and that of the Queene mother, desired also the Prince to ioyne with them in that bad designe : I must confesse these newes bred a great amazement in me, considering the good disposition wherein I left the affaires, which made me hope to see a peace firmly settled : in the negotiation whereof, hauing had the honor to be one of those which was employed, to giue the assurance which was necessary to such a treaty : I held my selfe more bound then any other, to desire the entertainment thereof : so as if since the treaty any one be found culpable to haue attempted against your Maieftie, they can neuer haue a greater enemy then my selfe. But in like manner I thinke it necessary as well for your Maiefties seruice, as the satisfaction of the publicke, and the content of all good men; that this businesse may bee speedily manifested, and that the truth may be knowne both within and without the Realme. In the meane time I will delay my journey for a season, and giue all necessary order for the towns of this Prouince, according to the commandement which you haue giuen me, wherein I will not faile, but will alwayes remaine your most affectionate and faithfull seruant, Charles of Gonzague of Cleues.

The Kings resolution to raise three armies.

This Letter did not much please, but doubled the ialousies which they had of the Dukes cariage. Yet the King was willing that all men should know wherefore he had detained the Prince of Conde, not by particular Letters, but by a Declaration verified in Parliament, sitting himselfe in his seat of Iustice. And in regard that the Princes and Noblemen were retired to Soissons, and that such as the Prince of Conde had put into the places in Berry, and in Chynon in Touraine, seemed to haue a will to take armes, it was resolved in Councell to leauy three armies, the one to bee led by the Earle of Au-uergne towards Soissons ; the other by the Marshall of Montigny for Berry ; and the third by the Marshall of Sourre to goe into Touraine : But these armies could not bee raised without mony, and the Kings Treasurie had bene exhausted during the second ci-uill warres, wherefore they had recourse vnto extraordinary meanes : among the which, as lesse burthensome, it was decreed that an Edict should bee made touching the sale of many Offices.

The Kings Declaration touching the Princes detension.

The Kings comming to Parliament was appointed on the 7 of September : all things were made ready according to the vsuall manner, and the King came vnto the Palace about 10 of the clocke, with the like state hee had bene accustomed in such actions ; the particularities as well thereof as of the Kings sitting in the seat of Iustice, I must omit, to auoid tediousnesse.

After

1616

A After some short speeches made by the keeper of the Seales by the Kings commandement, and the first President, he caused a Declaration to be read concerning the seizure of the Prince of Conde, and the Princes and Noblemen which were retired : wherein he said that he was forced to publish vnto the world the iust complaints which he made, as well against his Cousin the Prince of Conde, as the Princes, Noblemen, and others, which did adhere vnto the pernicious designes which had bene practised against his person and state : That they had lately risen vp in armes, vnder colour to hinder the most honorable alliance which he could make in all Christendome, and to reforme his Estate by the ruine thereof : That by the treaty of Loudun, he had granted vnto his Cousin whatsoeuer hee
B demanded ; and had not onely left vnto him the Government of Berry, but did redeeme all places of strength which were within the Prouince : That hee had giuen him great summes of money, either by way of gratification, or for the dismissing of his troops :
That the charges of this war and of the treaty amounted to about twenty millions : That two millions to content his cousin the Duke of Longueville, he had drawne out of Picardy and the Cittadell of Amiens such as commanded there, to place one who was pleasing vnto him : that he had giuen vnto the Prince what part he desired in the managing of the State, and especially the direction of the Treasurie : that notwithstanding the abundance of his graces and fauours, they could not restraîne their disordered wils, who found no rest but in the trouble of the Estate, and put all their hope in his ruine. Moreover, he complained, that C both before and since the Princes arrival there had bene many nightly Assemblies in his City of Paris and elsewhere, at the which there assisted diuers Princes and great perfonages, yea and some of his Officers, whereof some of them were since retired, iustifying their crime by their flight.

Complaints for the seizure of Perthuis.

After which he said that they had practised to debauch his people, and to moue them to sedition, and to winne the Colonels, Captaines, and such as had charge of Armes, vpon diuers pretences : That they had seized vpon the towne and castle of Perthuis, the resolutions whereof had bene taken nere his person, and although he had great reason to be incensed for this excesse, yet he had accommodated himselfe to all the propositions which had bene made to reconcile the businesse quietly : That notwithstanding his bounty and indulgence, they had drawne four companies of foot into the towne ; the which did so much distaste all such as had any respect vnto his authority, that a Princesse very neerly allied to those which were interested in that action, moued with compassion of their fortunes, had giuen advertisement to the Queene his mother, of the designes of the vnder-takers, and that they should haue a care of themselves, for that their Counsellors tended to seize vpon his person and the Queene mothers, and so to cation themselves throughout all the Prouinces : the horror whereof had bene so great in the hearts of some of them, that euen his cousin the Prince before his detension had ingenuously confessed to the Queene mother, that hee had assisted at the said Councell ; and that in truth they had cause to suspect him : adding withall, that they were bound to him as much as to their owne fathers : That one of the greatest of the Realme had bene at one of the said Coun-cels (as he confessed to the Queene mother) in which they treated of the seizure of his person, and the government of the State, with many other advertisements to the like effect. That the Ambassadors of foraigne Princes had giuen him advertisement by writing, and perswaded him to be careful of his person : That they leauied men in all parts of the Realme, without commission or pretext : That for these and many other considerations, he had resolved to prevent this imminent danger, and to assure himselfe of the person of his said cousin, whom he had lodged nere vnto him in his castle of the Loure, with as honorable viage as could be desired in such a case. In the end by his Declaration he confirmed the treaty of Loudun, with a pardon to all those which were culpable and had assented themselves, if they came within sixtens dayes, and demanded it, but to be sent only These are the reasons suggested in the Kings Declaration for the Princes detension. I will not presume to examine the truth of them, but will leave it to the iudicious Reader but how better, it was verified by the Court of Parliament.

That they meant to seize vpon the King and Queene mother.

and what would be the consequence

The King being desirous to suppress all causes of further alteration, sent his Ambassadors of Bouille and Charuilly to Soissons, being aduised that the Duke of Longueville, the Duke of Vendosme, and Mayen, the Marshall of Bouillon, and the Marquis of Chastellain, should meet with the three brethren of Guise, to confere of the meanes to pacifie these com-bustions.

buſſions. On the 14 of September, there was a Proclamation made, commanding all Gentlemen and others of what qualitie ſoeuer, belonging vnto the Prince of Conde or the Dukes of Vendome, Mayen and Bouillon, to depart out of the Citie and ſuburbs of Paris within 24. houres: forbidding all the inhabitants to lodge them or aſſiſt them with any victuals, vpon paine of confiscation of all their goods; except ſuch as ſhall make proteſtation to liue and dye in the Kings obedience, and vnder the authority of his commandements, and that had relinquished all intelligence with the ſaid Prince and Dukes. The King prepares for peace on the one ſide, and for warre on the other, in caſe hee bee not obeyed. He ſendeth into Swiſſerland to makeleauies. Foure field-pieces and two culuerins, with their munition, are drawne out of Paris to goe to Meaux: The Earle of Auergne parted the next day, and makes it the rendezuous for the Kings army. They put garriſons into the townes vpon the riuier of Marne: Vaubecourt was put into Regiment of Loraines, was lodged about Chaalons; and D'Elbene was put into Eſpernay.

The King prepares to armes.

The Duke of Neuers reſuſed carry into Chaalons. The contents of this letter to the King.

During theſe preparations to warre, there was a new cauſe of diſcontent giuen to the Duke of Neuers. Being at Rhems he ſent Marſhes vnto the King with Letters dated the fifteenth of September, complaining that they had reſuſed him the gates of Chaalons, one of the chiefe townes of his Government. He complained by his Letters, that hauing receiued commandement from his Maieſtie to take order for the frontiers of that Province, and to viſit the other places of his government: hee vnderſtood that commandement had bene giuen vnto the inhabitants of Chaalons to reſuſe him entrie into their town, if he ſhould preſent himſelfe, the which he ſaid did much amaze him, conſidering the contrariety of two diſpatches; by the one vnto himſelfe, he did aſſure him hee would commit vnto him the conduct of his army; and by the other hee deprived him of the exerciſe of his charge: the which had made him to examine himſelfe whether his actions had giuen any iuſt cauſe of offence to his Maieſtie: then making a long repetition of his ſeruices, he concluded in theſe termes: I find, Sir, with much griefe, that my ſeruices haue bene waiged by thoſe which now giue your Maieſtie counſell, and who are afraid that my good endeuours about the peace might procure me that happineſſe which they deſire to diſprize me of, fearing to encounter their loſſe in peace by the diſcouerie of their violent counſels, and pernicious deſignes. This onely conſideration in my opinion hath made them to doe me this affront, your Maieſtie will pardon me if I call it ſo, being ſo aſſured of mine innocencie: the which I hope God will in time make knowen vnto you, when you ſhall pleaſe to take the paines to enforme your ſelfe more particularly of theſe affaires, and of thoſe which are your true and faithfull ſeruiants, amongst the which I think my ſelfe to hold one of the firſt ranks, as being alwayes your moſt humble and obedient ſubiect and ſeruant, the Duke of Neuers.

The newes in Court were very variable, one day peace, another day warre. The Seigneurs of Boiſſie and Chanvallon deputed from the King, being come to Soiffons, the three brethren of Guiſe vnderſtood by them the intentions of their Maieſties, vnto which they conformed themſelues. Then they began to treat with the Dukes of Vendome and Mayen, the Marſhall of Bouillon, Marquis of Cœuvres, and others, of the meanes to preſerue the peace in France. The ſeaſon of Winter which approached, the intelligences of the Princes out of frame, by the detention of their Head, the ſmall preparations which they then had for warre; and the King on the contrary being in armes and ready to ſet vpon them; were the principall cauſes which made them make choice of peace. Finally, the Princes and thoſe which were whited vnto them in Soiffons, propounded thirteenth Articles, which the duke of Guiſe returning to Paris on the 24. of September, preſented vnto their Maieſties, he being receiued by them with much content. That night the Prince was conueyed to the Baſtile. The duke of Guiſe returned to Soiffons to acquaint the Princes with his Maieſties pleaſure, who came back again on Michaelmas day, & the day after, the King reſolued in Counſell touching the Princes demands, which were as followeth.

The Prince sent to the Baſtile.

The Princes demands.

I. That the treaty of Loudun, with all the private Articles, ſhould be obſerved & ſpeedily put in execution: as wel in that which concerns the Prince of Conde as other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, and all others which were comprehended therein: and if he pleaſed the King, that the ſieges of the towne and caſtle of Chyſnon, and the towne of Bourges might be raiſed, and they which commanded in thoſe places, maintained in their charges.

A. Anſ: His Maieſties intention is, To entertaine the treaty of Loudun, and to cauſe it to be ſaithfully executed: but touching the Prince of Conde, hee reſolueth that to himſelfe, to diſpoſe, as hereafter ſhall be thought fit for the good of his ſervice.

II. That the Declaration which is ſhall pleaſe his Maieſtie to grant vnto the ſaid Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crowne, and others, ſhall be publiſhed in all the Parliaments of the Realme, and other inferior Courts as hath bene accuſtomed, and to that end Letters ſhould be ſent vnto the Parliament.

Anſ: Granted.

III. That the ſumme of 100000 crownes promiſed by the Treaty of Loudun, and ſigned vpon the impositions of the Riuers (which haue not bene eſtabliſhed) ſhall be ſupplied, without ſcalties, ceasing, for that the ſaid Princes haue aduanced the money for the diſmiſſing of their troops.

Anſ: It hath bene ſaſſified by the firſt Article. And if the Aſſignation be not good, it ſhall be otherwiſe provided.

IV. That the garriſons in ſuch places as the Duke of de Mayen holds, ſhall bee encreaſed with 200 foot, and the companies of men armes and light horſe, entertained according to the treaty of Loudun, to be put in garriſon in ſuch places as the Duke de Mayen ſhould thinke fit for the Kings ſervice.

Anſ: His Maieſty grants to the Duke de Mayen the ſumme whereunto the payment of the ſaid 200 foot may amount, for the three months remaining of this year, and for the next year following, as for the companies of men at armes and light horſe, they ſhall be entertained as hath bene concluded by the ſaid Treaty. And the ſaid companies of men at armes ſhall be paid two quarters of the preſent year, and three of the year following, and after that manner ſucceſſively.

V. That the payment of penſions, offices, and appointments, and the entertainment of the garriſons and companies of horſe of the Duke of Mayen, ſhall bee aſſigned vpon the generall receiue of Soiffons, and of the taxes, cuſtomes, and imposts of the ſaid generality, by the accuſtomed order of the Treauſure, and that for this preſent year, and the next following.

Anſ: His Maieſtie cannot particularly aſſeſſe any requite for the payment contained in the ſaid Article: but will ſee that it ſhall be ſo provided for as the Duke of Mayen ſhall haue cauſe of contentment.

D Article: That the ſumme of 100000 crownes, granted heretofore to the ſaid Duke for the fortification of ſuch places as he holds, may be continued for two years.

Anſ: In ſetting downe the eſtate of the fortification, his Maieſtie will haue regard vnto the ſeruiſes hee hath done in this preſent Article.

VI. That the commiſſion to aſſemble the States of Britanie this preſent year, ſhall bee ſent to the Duke of Vendome, according to the promiſe which was made vnto him at Loudun.

Anſ: The expeditions for the ſaid Aſſembly being already ſent, his Maieſtie cannot alter any thing for this year, but as ſoon as the Duke of Vendome ſhall come to receive his Maieſties commandements, hee will ſhew him all cauſes of contentment, and grant him the ſaid ſumme of the ſaid ſeruiſes for the next year.

VII. That the Duke of Vendome may haue an aſſignation of 30000 pounds Sterling, which was promiſed him by the treaty of Loudun, in recompence of his Government of Matines: offering in lieu thereof to giue out the place.

Anſ: The Duke de Vendome being with his Maieſty, it ſhall bee aduiſed vpon what hee ſhall thinke the ſervice of the Aſſembly of States ſhall require.

VIII. That the company of light horſe of the ſaid Duke ſhall ſerue vnder the ſaid Duke of Vendome ſhall appoint them, and hold moſt expedient for the Kings ſervice.

Anſ: The ſaid companies of light horſe were created as all ſubjects, to ſerue vnder ſuch company as ſhall bee directed by the directions and commandements of his Maieſty touching the ſaid company, ſhall all be aduiſed to the ſaid Duke of Conſtant.

X. His Maieſtie, if he pleaſe, ſhall ordaine the entertainment of 100 foot, to be put in garriſon in the towne of La Perre.

Anſ: His Maieſty hath granted vnto the ſaid Duke de Mayen the ſumme whereunto the payment of 200 foot men may amount, for the three months remaining of the year, and for the next year following, to be paid like wiſe by the ſaid Duke of Mayen.

XI. His

XI. His Maieſtie ſhall command, if he pleaſe, the razing of the fortiſications at Blau-ner and Donarvenez, in the execution of the treaties of Saint Manchould and Loudon.

Anſw: By the ſayd Treaties his Maieſties not bound to take any fortiſications made by his commandement, nor taketh not from him the liberty of making ſuch fortiſications as he ſhall thinke fit for his ſervice.

XII. That the garriſons newly put into townes and places, ſhall be caſhiered, and the ſaid places continue as they were before the detention of the Prince of Conde. And the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, moſt humbly beſeech his Maieſty to take into his conſideration, whether it bee fit for his ſervice to hold till his new leaued ſervice on foot.

Anſw: His Maieſtie meanes not to entertaine any other garriſons then ſhall be neceſſary for the aſſurance of places. And for his army, his Maieſtie hauing taken the aduiſe of the Princes and Noblemen about him, will ordaine what ſhall be beſt for his ſervice.

XIII. That there be giuen vnto the ſaid Princes, Lords, and Officers, a copie of the ſayd Declaration.

Anſw: Granted.

Theſe Anſwers were ſent to Soiffons, the which were thus vnder-written: We haue received the Articles and Anſwers above mentioned, by Monſieur de Boiſſie, by the expreſſe commandement of the King, and to obey his will. Made at Soiffons the 6 of October. 1616.

After this, they treated at Paris for the pacifying of the alteration which had bene at Peronne, where it was concluded, that he whom the Duke of Longueville had put into the Caſtle, ſhould reſigne it vnto the Viſcount of Blencourt, whom the King had advanced to that government: and that it ſhould be at the Dukes diſpoſition to put whom he thought fit into the Caſtle of Harfleur for his Maieſties ſervice. And thus all things were pacified touching the action of Peronne. After which the King made a Declaration vpon the Articles granted to the Princes: ſhewing that (vpon his proper motion, full power, and royall authority, with the aduiſe of the Queene his mother, and the Princes and Lords of his Council) neither by any generall or particular words contained in his former declaration concerning the Princes detention, he diſtinctly meant to comprehend the ſaid Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, Lords, Officers of ſoueraigne Courts, or other perſons of what quality and condition ſoeuer, which went out of Paris on the day of the arreſt and detention of the Prince, and ſince vpon that occaſion, which had made knowne vnto him their good intentions, and the reſolutions that they haue euer had to remaine in his Maieſties obedience: but would that they ſhould enjoy his graces, fauours, rewards, honors, and governments, and to exerciſe their charges as they did before, notwithstanding any interdiction and Letters patents granted to the contrary: and alſo is pleaſed that his Edict lately made at Loudon ſhould be obſerved, and that his ſubiects comprehend in the general, particular, and ſecret Articles granted in fauour of that Edict, ſhould enjoy the effect of the ſame. After this, there was a declaration made to confirme that which had bene concluded touching the buſineſſe at Peronne.

The ſixt of the Articles which the Princes reſiſt vnto Soiffons preſented vnto the King, importeth, That the ſieges before the towne and caſtle of Chynon, and ſtreets of Bourges, might be ſieged, and ſieges which commanded in theſe places maintained and kept in their charges. But the King vpon this ſixt Article, reſiſted vnto himſelfe to ordaine what hee ſhould afterwards thinke ſuſt for the good of his ſervice. Therefore he ſent the Marſhall of Montigny with Letters vnto Bourges to eſtabliſh him Governor of Berry in the abſence of the Prince, who arriued there on the 6 of September, and on the morrow ſummoned La Lande who cometh ſetled in Tower of Bourges, to deliuer it vnto the King. La Lande reſiſted ſixty dayes ſpace to aduerſe the Marſhall who had placed him there, which was returned him vpon condition that the ſaid Marſhall might inuene himſelfe before the ſaid Tower, which he did, and beſides, ſet up his gabions, and planted his peeces ready for battery. After ten dayes, La Lande reſuſing to yeeld vnto the Tower, the Marſhall of Montigny reſolved to beaſt him out, and to that end the tenth day about ſix of the clock at night, being aſſiſted by many of the Gentlemen of the Countrey, and inhabitants of Bourges, he made an ouerture in a wall, and brake downe the garden gate of the Tower, and from thence at fixe o'clock in the morning, made a breach in the Tower that one man might paſſe, which La Lande ſeeing, he alſo ſhot ſoure volleys of Cannon from the top

A top of this Tower cleare away the ſeigne, and then ſeized to ſurvey, which being executed, the compoſition was, That he ſhould compoſe himſelfe with his ſubiects, with their ſtates and baggage, without carrying, withdrawing, or any motion of ſuch things belonging to the ſaid Tower. As while after, the inhabitants of Bourges, ſent to preſſch his Maieſty that this Tower might be razed: But the King for ſeruaſe, ſent himſelfe to the ſaid his Governor to command therein, and to ſee that he ſhould be ſatisfied and ſetled.

So ſoon after the ſiege of Rochefort, which was ſet on foot, Chynon being ſieged, two hundred horſe, ſoure hundred foot, and ſix hundred of carrel, among other things, were dred ſeized: ſeeing himſelfe almoſt beſieged by the Marſhall of Montigny, and that eight Cannons were coming from the Tower, he reſolved to obey the Letters which were ſent ſeized him from the Prince his maſter. They ſaie, that he would not accept of any recompence for his coming forth, but retired home to his owne houſe, and ſo was made Governor of the towne and caſtle of Chynon by the King.

There remained yet to reconcile the difference betweene Monſieur d'Efpernon and the Rochellers, which was the detention of the Prince. The Rochellers offered by their legates confirmed (as they ſay) by many Kings to haue exemption from governors in the Towne and Countrey of Rochel, in which they compile the Countrey. And the Duke of Efpernon ſeized in the Countrey being Governor for the King in Xaintonge and Aulins.
Now vpon the common beute of the Princes detention at Paris, the Rochellers ſent ſome G to ſeize vpon a Caſtle called Rochefort, which is in the Countrey of Aulins, and vpon the Duke of Cobrente, where they placed ſeaſons, the Duke of Efpernon bering heretofore ſeized vpon his Government, and reſolved to make the Rochellers know that there was no other Governor but himſelfe in the Countrey of Aulins. Hereupon he ſent his troops, and came out of Angoumois into Aulins, where he put ſtrong garriſon into the Caſtle of Surgeres, which is but ſoure leagues from Rochel. In briefe, it ſeemed by the leauies made on both parties, that they would come to armies, but they proceeded not, either party publiſhing his preſent ſentences in writing.

Vpon complaint made vnto the King of the Duke of Efpernon, carrying his Maieſty for ſpecially one Captaine Bourgeois, with two Archers, to command them of Rochel D to deliuer the Caſtle of Rochefort into his hands: who haue deliuered his charge vnto the Major and Towne, and ſhewed his Commiſſion and private inſtructions, whereby he had charge to goe vnto the Duke of Efpernon, and to command him in the Kings name to retire his ſouldiers from Toney, charre, and other places. The Rochellers obeyed preſently, but they let him vnderſtand that ſince their firſt complaint, the Duke of Efper-non had ſeized vpon the Caſtle of Surgeres, an extraordinary paſſage to bring all commodities to Rochel. That ſeeing the Kings pleaſure was, that the Duke of Efpernon ſhould retire all his men of warre, it was reaſon he ſhould withdraw them, which he had put into the Caſtle of Surgeres; they entreated Captaine Bourgeois to make the like Remonſtrances to the Duke of Efpernon, and to perſwade him to performe as much as his

E Maieſty had commanded the Rochellers: Which being ſound and reaſonable, hee went preſently to Rochefort, which was deliuered into his hands without delay. Whereupon he went to the Duke of Efpernon, being at Xaintes, to acquaint him with the Kings commandement, from whom hee returned to Rochel on the ninth of October, telling that hee would not obey, nor retire his men from Toney, charre, nor Surgeres.
That he had no commandement vnto withdraw them out of the Champion Countrey, and ſo ſent any place where hee lodged them: Moreover that he was Governor of the Countrey of Aulins, and that he would take poſſeſſion of his Government: That what he had done at Surgeres was as a Governor, and that he would enter into all the Government he had.

F Vpon this report, the Duke of Rochefort to his Maieſty to beſeech him to ſee the violence of the Duke of Efpernon, but ſeeing that hee augmented his garriſon at Sur-geres, brought in muſition and victuals, and called them to labour daily at the fortiſications, they grew jealous that he would not be ſo ſatisfied, but it might be ſee world tempt againſt their towne, whereupon they began to aſſure the ſubiects of all their friends ſo reſpect the Dukes violence, to haue the King obeyed, and to defend themſelves.
The Duke of Efpernon challenge was held vniuſt, pretending that during the reign of Henry the third (when few things were denied him) he had ioynd to his government of Xainxonge that of the towne of Rochel, and the Countrey of Aulins: whereof they of A. Rochel had better knowledge, neither did hee ever attempte to take possession of the government of the towne or countrey: against the which his pretention they had priviledges more ancient then his pretended priviledges: the which being confirmed by all predecedent Kings, the said towne of Rochel was freed from all governors and garisons.

The King being aduertised of these alterations by the Deputies of Rochel, he let them understand by his Letters, that he was resolved to send Monsieur de Sully Counsellor of State to settle the differences betweene the Duke of Elspenon and them, touching the Castles of Rochefort and Surgeres, and in the meane time hee enjoyned them not to attempt any thing which might aggravate this businesse, giving the like commandment B to the Duke of Elspenon. But after much contestation, the Rochellers retired their men out of the castle of Rochefort which was razed, and the Duke of Elspenon abandoned the Castle of Surgeres.

These matters being past, there was a calme peace throughout all the Prouinces of France: There was no speech but of Adventurers which refused to passe the Alpes to see the warres which grew hot betweene the Sauiyard and Spaniard in Piedmont, and the Duchy of Millaine.

The Princes retired to Soissons, had in their twelfth Article entreated the King to take into consideration whether it were expedient for his service to maintain an army newly raised: but a part was dismissed, and the rest were lodged in diuers garisons of Champagne, vnder the command of Monsieur de Pralins. The Duke of Nevers going sometimes C to visit the Marshall of Bouillon at Sedan, made the King to send some troops to that frontier. They sayd that there was some new designe. That the Marshall of Bouillon desired to manage this warre, and that the Duke of Vendosme being in La Fere, had drawne certaine armies from Sedan: Finally, there was no speech in Court but of practices within and without the Kingdome.

In November the Duke of Nevers wrote vnto the King, making great complaints against the Marquis of Vicuville Governor of Rheims, for that hee would not suffer the Duchesse his wife to enter into the town, who came thither in her Litter great with child, attended onely by her Gentlewomen and Officers, but was forced to lodge in the Suburbs, and could not haue the use of her bed and baggage, which was entered an house before into the towne: That this action was an affront and a discourtesie done vnto his wife. Some say, the Duke of Nevers had no cause to complaine of the Marquis of Vicuville, in regard of the Kings ialousie, having forbidden them of Chalons to receive the Duke into their towne, and that the Marquis had written vnto the Duchesse of Nevers, that he was very fary he was forced to entreat her to give him time to expect the Kings answer touching her passage or the Dukes through Rheims, the which he attended within two houres: which shewed that he had no priuate interest, but that he obeyed the Kings pleasure.

The same day the Duke of Nevers had sent vnto the King, he dispatched Capitaine F. S. to seize vpon the Castle of Sii in Rethelois, belonging vnto the said Marquis, which he did. The Duke gaue charge to his Proctor generall in the Duchy of Rethel, to make an information of that which had past at the refusal which the Marquis had made vnto his wife at Rheims, and to make a seizure of all his lands in the said Duchy, for that hee had not done his homage, nor paid the duties he ought since his fathers death: which was done accordingly, and a Capitaine put into the Castle of Sii to guard it. On the 21 of November Bourremon, an Exempt of the Guards, deliuered the Kings Letters to the D. of Nevers, by the which he let him understand, that what the Marquis of Vicuville had done at Rheims touching Madame de Nevers entry into the towne, was by his commandment: That the Duke should deliuer the Castle of Sii into the hands of Bourremon, and that if he would not withdraw those which were within it, he had given order to aduance some troops to force obedience. The Duke made answer, that the Souldiers which were in Sii by his command had abandoned it, and that if there were any guard at that present, it was by order of the Iustice at the request of his Proctor generall. Bourremon transports himselfe to Sii, he summons Capitaine Perrache to depart: who answers, that he was appointed there by the Iustice, which he taking for a refusal, made a verbal proceesse, and so returned: which added, more fiewell to the fire of their ialousies, as you shall heare.

The

A The Marshall D'Aure and his wife, to the end they might absolutely dispose of the affaires of the Kingdome, had counselled the Queene mother to change and displace the ancient Officers of the Crowne, and Ministers of State which serued the King, to bring in such as they pleased: continuing still their designs, on the foure and twentieth of November they caused the Seales to be taken from Monsieur du Vair, which were given to Monsieur Mangot: the Bishop of Luçon was made Secretary of State in the place of the Seigneurs of Villeroi and Pisieux: and Barbin had the generall controll of the Treasure, which President Jannin had exercised. These changes did astonish many vpon a report that the said Marshall and his wife had a desire not only to change all the Kings Council, B but also many principall Officers of Soueraigne Courts. There were many discourses written touching this dismission, which were full of vturh, wherefore they caused to be printed this following Answer which Monsieur du Vair made vnto two Councillors of the Parliament, whom they had deputed vnto him, before they would verifie the Letters of Prouision for Monsieur Mangot.

He answered, That he held it a great fauour that the Court would send vnto him before the verification of the Letters of his successor, Keeper of the Seales of France: The which he receiued rather as a testimony of that companies loue, then for any need they had of any further consent from him. For that wherefoeuer they should see this commandment from the King, they might instantly presuppose a ready and absolute obedience on his part. That he thought the whole course of his life should be a sufficient warrant of this belief, both to them and all others which had knowne him. That there were many in that honourable company with whom he had serued the King and State faithfully and courageously, in the most dangerous and miserable times that euer threatened this Monarchy with ruine. That hee had bene sent from them to the extremities of the Realme, to the administration of the most desolate Prouintie in France, gaped after by strangers, full of quarrels, seditions, and diuisions. That after twenty yeares hee had left it so peaceable, so obedient, and so wealthy, as it had no reason to enuy any other. That neither at the death of the deceased King Henry his good Master, nor in the two troubles which haue followed and afflicted this Estate, there had bene no alteration, neither had D any man offered to fall from his obedience. That he had had the honour to see strangers from all the extremities of Europe, Asia, and Africa, at the feet of Iustice, who had returned from them, blessing the name of their Kings, and commending the lawes of France. After which he had bene called to the greatest charge of the Realme, beyond his merit and desire, whereof he had thrice excused himselfe, beseeching their Maiesties to cast their eyes vpon some one whose age and strength were more able to beare so great a burthen, and whose spirit might more easily apply it selfe to a courtly life. They refused him this grace, and by an absolute command forced his obedience, to make knowne by experience that he had iudged better of himselfe then any other, for after sixe moneths, his manners and his proceedings in the execution of that charge, had been found so disproportionable E and vnfit for the age, as they could not endure them: whereupon their Maiesties required the Seales of him againe, which he more willingly gaue vp then hee had receiued them. They haue committed them, sayd he, to a personage of much more vertue and desert, by whose administration he hoped France should receive rest and remedy of those calamities which threatened it. In which hee could doe no lesse then greatly praise their goodnesse and wisdom, to haue at once provided for their affaires and eased him. And so his intent was to retire himselfe, to pray vnto God for the prosperitie of their Maiesties, as hauing no other meanes to serue them: yet contented enough if hee may continue in their fauours: Which he said, because he was aduertised that certaine persons (as malicious as cunning and ill affected towards him) had written a Discourse in his name full F of words which they beleued might incense their Maiesties against him. Whereupon he besought the Court to assist him in the discourry of the authors, and to interpose the severity of Iustice for their punishment.

Hauing nothing then remaining after five and thirty yeares seruite and so much paines and labour, but the honour to haue serued well and faithfully, and caused others to obey, no man should imagine that hee would vpon this subiect blemish the glory of his obedience, and not submit himselfe to the wills of his Masters, what preiudice soeuer hee might receive. Wherefore hee entreated them to make report vnto the Court, who had done him the honour to send them : That he neither hath nor neuer will haue any other will then that of their Maiesties : That hee will be euer content with what it shall please them to ordaine in any thing which did concerne him, and in any condition whatsoever : Hee did wish with all his heart the encrease of their power and establishment of their felicity. And touching their company, seeing he had now no society with it, to thank them personally for the honour they had done him, and to witness the loue he beares them; the memory of his name assures him, that thinking thereof sometimes, they will finde that neuer any man entred into the charge which he now leaues, that hath more desired to preferre the authority which the lawes of State giues it, and the respect which their integrities deserue.

The Baron of Neuetaine by Quemadec Governor of Fougères.

The Baron of Quemadec Governor of Fougères, going to the Estates of Britanie which were held at Rennes, slew the Baron of Neuet, and then left the towne with his traine, and retired to Fougères; the quarrell grew for precedence, which did much trouble these Estates. The Marshall of Brisac, the Kings Lieutenant in Britanie, who had been sent to hold this Assembly, drew his friends and some forces together to besiege him in the Castle of Fougères, drawing Cannon out of Saint Malo : Quemadec on the other side (although he was beloued of the inhabitants of Fougères) hauing some good friends to assist him, had well strengthened the place : But the King hauing heard of this trouble, sent three Exempts of his guard one after another, vnto Fougères; the last with a commandment vnto Quemadec, to yeeld vp the Towne and Castle into his hands. C So Quemadec was counselled to leaue the Castle, and yeeld vnto the time, which he did, and his wife afterwards gaue vp the guard of the place into the Exempts hands, according to his commission.

Vertau Treasurer generall of France, put out of Chaalons.

The last of Nouember, Vertau, Treasurer generall of France in the generality of Chaalons, was put out of the towne by the commandment of Monsieur de Pralin, the Kings Lieutenant in the Gouvernement of Champagne. The occasion hereof was, for that on the six and twentieth of Nouember the said Vertau being come to Chaalons, the Earle of Tresmes, who was Gouverneur, being aduertised thereof, complained vnto Monsieur de Pralin, and vnto the body of the towne, of some words which the said Vertau had vied of him, such bitter words, as hee could doe no lesse, if he met with him, but to endanger D his life. Hereupon Monsieur de Pralin, to hinder all sinister accidents, sent for Vertau, and said vnto him, I must tell you that the Earle of Tresmes hath bene with me, and hath made great complaints of you, I feare if he encounter you in the streets he will doe you some affront: wherefore I would entreat you to absent your selfe; and if you will not doe it willingly, I will enforce you: for I haue no desire that any new accident should happen in this towne, there being too many in the Prouince. Vertau hearing him say he would put him out by force, grew obstinate, saying, That he would not commit such an error, being the Kings officer, to goe voluntarily out of Chaalons, without his Maiesties expresse commandement. Hereupon Monsieur de Pralin replied, You shall not goe out of your selfe, but I will write presently vnto the King of what hath past, and you shall carie the Letter: if his pleasure bee E you shall remaine in this towne, you may returne, it imports not me; I onely feare they will doe you some displeasure.

In the meane time the Earle of Tresmes hauing solicited the Townesmen to put Vertau out of Chaalons, the Licutenant of the towne, accompanied with tenne or twelue of the Councell, went to enforce Monsieur de Pralin that Vertau was still in his chamber, after whose departure there past many words betwene him and Vertau, and the Licutenant of the Queene mothers company, who perswaded him to goe out of the Towne: but they could not preuaile, onely he said he would depart the third of Nouember to make his visitations in the Election of Espernay. The next day Monsieur de Pralin meeting Vertau neere vnto the Towne-house, they fell into such contestation, as hee caused F him to be caried by three of his followers out of the gates into the suburbs, where the next day he tooke poste to make his complaints vnto the King.

The Marshall of Bouillon Letter to the King.

Norwithstanding the Kings Declaration vnto the Princes in September last, yet still there remained some ialousies: Marshall of Bouillon seemed discontented, as appeared by his Letters to their Maiesties, which were published to the world, whereunto was annexed the Kings answer. The Marshall in his Letter to the King complained, That hauing bene alwayes an humble seruant vnto his Maiesty, as hee had witnessed by

A by his Declaration the last of September: he had hoped that he should haue tasted the effects of his fauour by the execution of the Trearie of Loudun, especially for the protection of his souerainety of Sedan: That hitherto he had tasted no fruits, but contrariwise they fought to misconstrue his actions, and to giue bad impressions vnto his Maiesty, for that he provided carefully for the safety of a place of such importance, to the end he might preferre himselfe and his for his Maiesties seruice, and the good of France, in whose protection it had continued aboue sixscore yeares, and to take from his neighbours the desire they had to attempt against it, and by that meanes to encrease their limits (with his ruine) vpon the frontiers of his Realme, whereof they made apparent show, B there being no kind of bad visage but they suffered, which came vnto that place through the Archdukes countries, or by rigorous prohibitions, the passage being stoppt, contrary to the common liberty of commerce: That it seemed his Maiesties Ambassadors did contribute, yea were the chiefe motives, being well informed of the bad offices they did him daily in diuers places: That this gaue him iust cause of distrust, seeing himselfe also enuironed with great Forces, and extraordinary garisons, the which they had lately without any apparent necessity, caused to aduance to his frontiers of Champagne, with an intent to annoy him rather then to assist him if he were in necessity; whereupon hee humbly besought his Maiesty to provide for it by his wisdom and authority, according to his royall protection; and to giue him leaue to vse those lawfull meanes which Nature al- C lows to every man for his owne defence. He also wrote a Letter to the Queene mother to the same effect.

The King made answer vnto this Letter: That there had bene nothing done in his Prouince of Champagne but by his commandment: neither had hee done any thing to the prejudice of the treaty of Loudun, nor of his declaration of the last of September: but that he himselfe and the Duke of Neuers by their departures, haue bene the first which haue broken that treaty: That they had sent into Holland, and diuers places of Germany to discontinue his affaires: To haue bought vp great quantity of armes, and passed them ouer with many souldiers vnto Sedan: That they were his actions, and not the interpretations giuen him, which bred his distrust and discontentments: That if his Am- D bassadors haue not yeelded vnto his desires, but rather haue bene contrary, they had done but their dutie: That they haue not bene matters of commerce, but acts of hostility, which seemed to tend to some other designe then the safeguard of his place, seeing he hath not bene assailed either by any of his or any other to his knowledge: that his ialousie was the more augmented by hearing of the leaues in Champagne, and forces put into many of his places, and that by night; so as many of the inhabitants of the towne of S. Mane should were glad to abandon the same, for that they were affectioned to his seruice: that these reasons had made him resolute to send forces into Champagne to prevent the enterprises which might be made against his authority, and the quiet of his subjects; and to see execution done vpon the commissions which hee had sent to enforce E against the breach of his ordinances: that he was content to giue them respite which had erred, hauing no other end but to reduce every man to his duty, wherein hee had vied greater moderation then was ordinary, so as hee had no cause to complaine nor distrust, nor any pretext to couer his actions, the which hee would haue him to forbear: And whereas he desired to haue leaue to vse the lawfull meanes which Nature did allow him; he wished him to explaine himselfe more intelligibly, and in the meane time he did aduertise him, that the lawfull meanes which he could expect to preferre himselfe, were to ad- dress himselfe vnto his Maiesty, from whom hee must attend the preservation of that which he enioyed by the grace and bounty of the deceased King, in carying himselfe as he ought to doe; whereof he doubted not, &c.

F In December this yeare there was a resolution to change the Prince of Condes Guards, the causes were onely knowne to their Maiesties, but the execution was after this manner: They gaue Fouze (who had the guard of the Bastile ever since the deceased Seigneur of Chasteauvieux had bene made Capitaine and Gouverneur) to vnderstand, that it was resolved to change all the Princes Guard, asking his opinion by what meanes they might bring Du Thier (who commanded the Queene Mothers Light Horse) with twelue of his companie to effect it. Fouze made answer, That it was easie to bee done, if they came one by one without armes armes to aske for him, where they should have entry to speake with him, and hee would bring them into his Cabinet of armes, where they might furnish themselves. As for du Thier, he might come to visit him and dine with him. This enterprise was held easie, and they were admitted into the Bastile. Pouze shuts them into his Cabinet, and gives each of them a petronell: du Thier dines with him: about three a clocke in the afternoon, they told Conté (who had the chiefe charge of the Princes guard) that there was one to speake with him from the Queene mother: comming downe, one of Pouze his people, who attended expressly in the court, told him, that the party which asked for him was in the other court without the draw-bridge; who going thither found not any one; and comming backe, the bridge was drawne vp, so as he was out of the Bastile and knew not whom to speake vnto. In the meane time du Thier with his companions came forth well armed: they went to the Princes chamber, assuring themselves of his guards, and of Conté his servant. In the beginning the Prince was troubled; du Thier told him he had no cause. After many speeches the Prince said vnto him, Their Maiesties haue twice done me the honor in changing my guards, to acquaint me with their pleasure: doe me this fauour as to tell them that I beseech them to doe the like now. Thus the Prince had a new guard, and Pouze went vp to the battlements of the Bastile, telling Conté (who was without the draw-bridge) that he desired him to goe vnto the Loure, where he should vnderstand their Maiesties pleasure, & that he had done nothing but by their commandement: after which, Conté retired, and they put the old guards and his seruants out of the Bastile. There yet remained thirty or forty French souldiers, with their Captaine, in the Bulwark which lookes towards the fields, but Pouze commanded him to goe and speake with the Queene mother, who returning presently drew forth his souldiers, in whose place they put so many Swisses who were daily changed.

Saint Manchould yielded
to the King.

Their Maiesties were then discontented with the Duke of Neuers, for that he had put 500 souldiers into Saint Manchould, for by this meanes he covered Mezieres and Sedan; held a great part of the Country in subiection, stopped the passage to Verdun and Loraine, and made shew that he would approach to Chaalons, which is but six leagues from S. Manchould: whereupon Monsieur de Pralin, who commanded the Kings forces in Champagne, had commandement to recouer Saint Manchould: and the President Comartin D Iudge of the army, was sent to make their process, which should bee found armed in Champagne without the Kings commission.

On the 26 of December, Bouconville who commanded in the Castle of Saint Manchould, thinking that Monsieur de Pralin had bene gone towards Rethel, he sees him with 1000 men betwene the Castle and the Towne, who presently summons him by trumpet to come and speake with him. On the other side, the commanders of the Duke of Neuers garison which were within the towne, seeing the Kings troops at their gates, would haue perswaded the inhabitants to take armes; but they made answer, they could not doe it, being the Kings subiects. Hereupon they grew amazed, and Bouconville entred into treaty, where in the end it was concluded, that he should remaine still Gouernour of the Castle, vpon promise to continue faithfull in his Maiesties seruice. There were 600 Swisses put into the town, and the Duke of Neuers men departed with their baggage, and were conducted to Rethel, and the inhabitants of Saint Manchould were well pleased to see themselves thus freed.

The warre resued in Sauoy.

The warres beganne againe in Italy betwene the King of Spaine and the Duke of Sauoy: Don Pedro de Toledo being made Gouernour of Millane, not onely kept the army still on foot, (saying, that he was not bound to disarme by the treatie of Alte) but leauied great Forces, and made extraordinary preparations. The Venetians grew iealous for that they were then in warre against the Archduke Ferdinand of Gertz, a prince of the House of Austria. The Duke of Sauoy stood vpon his guard: He sent his complaints against the King of Spaine, to the Pope, the French King, the King of Great Britaine, and the Venetians, who had signed the treaty of Alte, and promised to assist him, if hee should invade his Estates. He sent the Marshall D'Aligueres, to summon him to effect the seventh article of the said Treaty: the Marshall vpon these summons goes to Turin, where the D. of Sauoy gaue him a royal reception: hauing long flayed there to enforme himself of the truth of the Dukes iealousies, & finding that Piedmont had need of a speedy & powerfull reliefe, he returned into France to make a great leauy of horse and foot, and to draw the

A the Duke of Nemours who was at Nici, to aduance the leauy which hee made for the Duke of Sauoy.

During these preparations to Warre, the Pope sent Cardinall Ludouici, and the French King, the Baron of Bèthunes, to mediate a peace betwene them: many propositions were made, but in the meane time the Duke of Sauoy, and the Duke of Nemours (being both of one house) fell at iarre, being both in Armes: the Duke of Nemours having intelligence with the Spaniard, but being weakly assisted by them, and in some extremities, by the mediation of Monsieur le Grand, Gouernour of Bourgundy, and some other Councillors of State, who had commandement from the French King, to make a reconciliation B between two kinsmen so nearely allied in blood in the end a peace was concluded betwene them to their great contents; wherby the Duke of Sauoy had no enemy remaining this yeare but the Spaniard.

A peace betweene the Duke of Sauoy, and the Duke of Nemours.

To conclude this yeare we must make mention of the death of a memorable man: Charles de Harlay, who had bene first President of the Parliament at Paris: Much was written of his life and death, to preserve his happy memorie, and to serue for an example to those who may and ought administer iustice religiously. This great permage was borne in the yeare 1536, at the age of two and twenty, he was made Councillor in Parliament, at 36 President: and at 46 K. Henry the third made him first President; by the decaile of Christopher de Thou, wherein he continued vntill the yeare 1611, that age & sickness took C from him all habilitie to labour for the publike. His fidelitie and affection to the Kings and Crowne, hath bene much commended by the world; vpon the words which hee spake the day of the Baricadoes to the head of the league in the Palace garden: It is great pity said he, when the servant chaſeth away the Maſter, My soule is for God, my heart for the King, and my body in the hands of violence to dispose of me as they please. His constancy was admired in the Prison of the Bastile, speaking to such as had him in guard: My time is not yet come, but when it happens we shall speake together and neere. And when they told him that he would bee prevented, and that they would take his life from him, hee replied; I haue neither head nor life, which I preferre before the loss I owe vnto God, theſe vice which I owe vnto the King, and the good which I desire to my Country. Finally, his man- D ners, his commendable actions; his reuerend grauitie; his briefe and succinct speaking; his hands which neuer feared but to hold the ballance of the soueraigne iustice of France, and to be as a sword, to preserve the good, and to punish the wicked; his eyes which neuer regarded the condition and qualitie of parties; and his teares which could neuer heare flatterie, haue purchased him the Title of the most excellent and worthiest man that euer sat vpon the seat of iustice in his time.

The Marſhalls
reply to the Kings Letter.

The iealousies begonne the last yeere increased dayly. In the beginning of the yeare, the Marshall of Bouillon made a reply vnto the Kings answer. By the which hee excuseth the visits betwixt the Duke of Neuers and him, in regard of the nearnesse of their Houses, hauing seene no declaration against him which might diuert him. That hee did not E thinke in so doing, to haue giuen any iust cause of distrust, nor to contradict the treatie of Loudun, as it seemes his Maiestie would inferre by his Letters, vntill that all ciuill societie were interdicted amongst his subiects, and reputed for a crime. Neither had hee found that hee had attempted any thing against the respect which was due to his Maiesties authoritie within his Gouernment, nor obserued in his words or actions any thing but fidelity and affection to his seruice. That touching the surmises they had of his intelligences in Holland and Germany; he said, that his Maiestie might easily informe himselfe of the truth, by the Princes and Estates of Germanie, and the Low-Countries, who were strictly allied vnto his Crowne, whereby he should finde that the alliance he had with the said Princes, had neuer made him desire any thing from them, but the onely continuance of F their friendship, the which also his enemies would draw into suspition. That whereas hee had bene charged to buy Armes, and draw many souldiers into Sedan: and that it had bene verified by Letters which he had written to some of his Ambassadors; his answer was, that if they were produced they would verifie the truth: which was, that in the beginning of Nouember, he had written to Monsieur Pericard, Ambassador for his Maiestie at Brussels, to vnderstand from him, if since the Declaration made the last of September there had bene any commandement from his Maiestie, to hinder the passage through the Archdukes Countries for those which came into his Territories, and to me-

left them, and ill intreat them, as they did then, and haue since continued : desiring to A know if it were with his Maiesties priuie and command ; if not, he intreated him to employ the authoritie of his charge to hinder it hereafter, seeing it concerned the publique good, and his Maiesties seruice. That if he had informed any other thing to his Maiesty, he would accuse him openly of slander and falshood whereof he could conuince him by his owne Letters. That if for the preferuacion of his place, against the enterprizes of strangers, he had beene forced to doe as his enemies had suggested ; he did not thinke he should incur any blame with his Maiesty, neither could they take it for any act of hostilitie. And yet they should not finde any other Garisons in his places, then those which had been accustomed for the guard thereof, and which his Maiesty had giuen him hope to entertaine. B That whereas they would maliciously perfwade his Maiesty that many Souldiers had gone out of Sedan, and were lodged in diuers places of his Realme ; hee said it was so grosse, as he could not thinke that any man would be so indiscreet, as to maintaine so manifest an imposture, which might be easily verified. Touching the Baron of Peche, he had no knowledge of his businesse in the Towne of Leige when he was murdered ; neither could it be iustified that he had euer employed him in any sort whatsoever. That hee humbly besought his Maiesty to let him vnderstand his pleasure what hee should expect touching the protection of Sedan, seeing that the designes which strangers haue provided against it, continued, and bound him to provide in time for his safety. And touching the explaining of himselfe, for that which hee had formerly written touching the lawfull C meanes to defend himselfe ; he said, that nature teacheth euery man to preserve his owne, and bindes him to leaue it to his posteritie. That if any one seeke to oppresse him by violence ; if he be in subiection, he hath recourse to his Soueraigne, who is to protect him from all oppression : if he be onely in protection, hee addresseth himselfe to him which hath promised it, who comming to abandon him, hee vsesh such meanes as hee may finde elsewhere, to oppose a iust defence, to an vnjust violence. That he had the happinesse to be borne his subiect, and in that qualitie could not but attend from his Maiesty alone the preferuacion of that which he held in France by succession from his Ancestors. That hee had also the honour to be vnder the protection of his Crowne, by reason of the Soueraignie of Sedan, and the places depending ; hauing bin alwayes confirmed since Charles D the eighth, and religiously entertained by Kings his predecessors, hoping that his Maiesty would not breake it now in fauour of his neighbours, which neither loue France, nor the greatnesse of his Estate, and suffer him to want meanes to preserve it for his seruice, as he was bound. He concludes, that the necessitie of his preferuacion, made him to beseech his Maiesty, That hee would be pleased he might use the meanes which nature allowes euery man for his owne defense. If he were assaulted, hee would oppose the assistance of all his subiects and friends, and of those whom the interest of blood bound naturally vnto him, and that he would not omit any thing to defend himselfe, yet without doing any thing which might preiudice the seruice which he ought vnto his Maiesty and France, by the Treatie of his protection, or to the duty of a faithfull subiect vnto his country, &c.

The Duke de Maye writes to the King.

The King answers.

After this, there came a Letter vnto the King from the Duke of Mayenne, sent by the Baron of Linieres, by which he complained of enterprizes made against his life, and the places of his Government. He besought his Maiesty, to cause exemplary iustice to be done vpon one whose name was Yagere, who had been corrupted with money to vndertake that wicked designe to kill him. He complains also of the Ministers which were about him. To whom the King made answer: That the preferuacion of his subiects was so deare vnto him, and especially of those which were of his ranke, that if hee did contribute as much for his part, as the King would for the punishment of the crime, hee should without doubt receiue all the contentment he could desire. That hee would easily beleue it when he saw that his Parliament, (which doth iustice to all the world, and hath the interest of the Peeres in singular recommendation) takes knowledge thereof. And that with so much care, as they haue already ordained that the cause shall bee examined and iudged in the place where you are ; to the end that being found culpable, hee may receiue the iust punishment due vnto the enormitie of so detestable an attempt. The which would be undoubtedly executed if he would, there being no meanes to auoid it but his flight, which he might prevent being in his power, causing him to bee safely conducted to Paris, where hee would not onely see him punished as he deserved ; but all others which had been

A been the instigators of so pernicious a designe. That he would neither suffer any enterprises to be made against the places which his subiects and seruants kept for him ; nor against their liues. And therefore containing himselfe within the bounds of his duty, hee might assure himselfe that nothing should preiudice the townes hee held more safely, then his authoritie. In the end, he conuinceth him to second the protestation of his innocencie with so good effects, as he might not be grieved to haue troubled the profitable designes he had for the Realme.

On the seventeenth of Ianuary following, the King made a Declaration against the Duke of Neuers, the which was verified in Parliament. Where, after a long repetition of all the supposed crimes and disobediences of the said Duke ; in the end it concludes, that for the causes therein mentioned, after view of the informations taken by his Commisaries, and other his Officers in the Prouince of Champagne, with the aduice of the Queene Mother, and his councill of State, he declared the said Duke and all which did assist him in his disobedience, false from all honors, dignities, offices, governments, pensions, priuiledges, and prerogatiues, which they had from him or his predecessors ; all which he did instantly reuoke : declaring the said Duke and all his adherents, disobedient, rebels, troublers of the publique peace, and guilty of Treason ; if within fiftene dayes after publication thereof made in his Court of Parliament, the said Duke did not acknowledge his fault, and come vnto him to performe effectually, and personally, that whereunto hee was bound by duty, and discharge the Garisons which had beene placed by him or his adherents, without order or Commission from his Maiesty : And in regard of Gentlemen, and other his subiects ; if within the said time they did not present themselves vnto the preiudicial Court where they had their residence, to make their Declarations, and did not abstaine from all actions, and enterprises, preiudiciall to his authoritie and seruice, and to his ordinances and Declarations. But in so doing, the said Duke & all that had assisted him, should be free from punishment, and receiued into his good grace and fauour.

In the beginning of this year, newes came to Court that many Souldiers trooped together in the Countie Thymersay, Perche, Mayen, and vpon the frontiers of Normandie, which ioynes vpon those Prouinces, countenanced as well by the Nobility : who had openly caried themselves for the Princes in the second ciuill warre, as by others who had behaued themselves as Newters. But the King to prevent such practices, sent the Earle of Auvergne thither with two Cannons, and foure thousand souldiers, who assured all those Countie by the Garisons which he put into diuers places.

Troopers in Perche, Mayen, and Normandie for the Princes.

The Duchesse of Neuers parting from Rethelois, crost Champagne, and came into Nyuernois, where she began to leaue souldiers for the Kings seruice (as shee said) vnder husbands authoritie. And the Marshall of Bouillons Lady went this winter from Sedan to Tours, and from thence to Turenne, which ministred a great subiect of lealouise.

In the end of the month, the Dukes of Neuers, Vendosme, Mayenne : the Marshall of Bouillon ; the Marquis of Cœuure, President Le Iay, and other Noblemen of their party, made a kinde of an Assembly at Soissons, where they resolved to make open warres, to seize vpon the Kings reuenues ; and to fortifie those Towns and Castles which they held in their Governments. They also sent into diuers parts both within and without the Realme. The Duke of Neuers Letter in answer of the Kings declaration made against the said Duke, was drawne in this assembly at Soissons the last of Ianuary : and the Remonstrances of the said Dukes and Marshall, which aymed directly at the Marshall D'Ancre and his wife.

An Assembly of the Princes at Soissons.

The D. of Neuers, vpon the Kings declaration, wrote vnto his Maiesty, assuring him, that he would let him see by infallible proofes, the vntruth of all the disobediences mentioned in the said declaration : by the which they pretended to make him guilty, with such spleene, as euén his thoughts and intentions were not freed from crime, in the iudgement of those passionate spirits. But the testimonie of my conscience (said he) shall for this time suffice, vntill it shall please God (who is the soueraigne iudge) to giue you more knowledge of the truth, and my integritie : the which I hope your Maiesty shall know plainly to the confusion of slander, when it shall please you to heare mee ; and that I may iustifie my selfe in your presence, or if you thinke it good in the Court of Peeres, who are my naturall Iudges, in regard of the ranke and dignity, which by birth I haue the honour to hold within your Realme. To this end, Sir, I am come to this place, place, being ready to attend your Maiestie, to yeeld you all obedience, and the humble A service which I owe you, and to discharge the fouldiers which I have put into my houses to defend them, and to prevent the secret enterprizes which are daily practised; whereof the president of those which have bene executed giue me iust cause of distrust. But for that, Sir, the whole power of the government of your Estate, is now in the hands of the Marshall D'Ancres and his Partisans, whom he hath drawne neere vnto your Maiestie, and into your Councils, to the end he may doe all things at his pleasure, and be sole Arbitrator of the life, goods, honours, and dignities of your subiects, hauing to that end dimitt your ancient Councellers, and taken away the Seales from Monsieur du Vair for his integrity.

 Being also apparent, that he makes your authoritie serue as an instrument to my ruine, abulging (with vnderfull contempt, and insupportable audaciousnesse) your Maiesties B name, to exercise the violence of his passions, as well vpon mee, as all others whom hee thinks may be an obstacle to his vnstable couetousnesse, and ambitious desires; vltimally, when your Realme an absolute power, to dispose, establish, and change all things at his pleasure; all things being possible vnto him, although vniust, so as he may doe it by corruption or force, treading vnder foot the Lawes and Magistrates. And for that no man can haue any assurance, seeing that the publique faith hath bene violated, by the infraction of the treatie of Loudun; I most humbly beseech your Maiestie, to giue me necessarie assurances both for my person and houses, and to prouide by your authoritie, that the Marshall D'Ancres, nor his partisans may hereafter take any knowledge of that which C concerns mee, they hauing no other end but my ruine; to the end iustice may be done me by indifferent iudges, and not passionate. That it would please you to call the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and ancient Officers of your Crowne and Councillors of State, whom your deceased father employed in his greatest affaires, to whose iudgement bee it in your presence, or in the said Court of Peeres, I will alwayes submit my selfe most willingly;
 according to the lawes and accustomed formes of your Realme, to make my innocencie knowne; and the integrity of my actions, to the confusion of those who through malice and slander haue disguised them to your Maiestie. I presume that out of your bounty you will not deny me the securitie which all your subiects ought to expect from your Maiestie, if it please you to consider, that if the Marshall D'Ancres had power to force you against D your owne intention, to violate the publique faith, hauing now by the meanes of his partisans, the hand, the Seale, & the Treasure of your Maiestie, with your forces and Armies at his disposition; he will haue power enough to oppress my innocencie, and make you approoue my ruine, and to signe my condemnation against your will: whereunto I thought it not fit to expose my selfe, remaining your most humble obedient subiect and seruant: Neuers.

The King
 makes a declaration against the Princes.

The Remonstrance of the Princes.

In February following, the King made a Declaration against the Dukes of Vendosme and Mayenne, the Marshall of Bouillon, the Marquis of Cœure, President Le Jay, and all others which did assist them: conformable to that which he had made against the D.
 of Neuers, and of the same Tenour, and therefore I doe forbear to make any more mention thereof.

After this Declaration, the Princes made a Remonstrance vnto the King: in the which after their humble submission made, and assurances of their fidelities and service to his Maiestie; They said, We know well that the mischief is concealed from you by them which doe it, who labour to make them odious to your Maiestie which complain. And the miserie of France is such; that hauing the whole power of your Estate in their hands, they make you to hold your most faithfull seruants for enemies. But the violence of their tyrannical behaviour is come to that excess, as it can not be suffered. The complaint thereof is generall, euery one sees and feels the miserable effects, and their practices can no longer hinder the voice and grievance of the people from sounding in your eares, to moue your compassion for their ease, and your iustice against the Authors of so many calamities, which all men know, and publicly detest. It is the Marshall of Ancres, Sir, and his wife, with his adherents, who by their couetousnesse are the sole cause of the miseries which we feele: of the disorders which we see, and of worse which we feare.
 He hath by his practices since the death of the deceased King, drawne vnto himselfe the whole administration of the Realme: hee hath made himselfe Master of your counsels; of your Armies, & of your Forts. He hath suppress the lawful liberty of the remonstrances of 1617

A of your Parliaments. Hee hath caused your chiefe Officers to be imprisoned; and is the cause of the violence done to the first Prince of the bloody house, by this audacious aduer, violated the publique faith of the Treatie of Loudun: of the obsequium whereof depended the peace and tranquillitie of your State. We humbly beseech your Maiestie to take the Duke of Neuers into your protection; against the extraordinary proceedings which haue bene made vpon false pretences and slanders; he being a Prince of one of the most illustrious Houses of your Realme, who loves his Countrey, hath no other zeale but your service; and doth not acknowledge any other lawfull authoritie but yours. He hath complained of some wrongs done vnto him by a private person his vassall; and that in contempt of the dignitie of his charge, they haue not allowed him the free exercise of his government. He hath prosecuted the execution of some feudall rights in his lands, by the ordinarie course of iustice. And not to suffer that to be lost, which his Predecessors had left him by succession, seeing severall enterprizes ready to be executed vpon his houses, he hath provided as he ought to defend them, vnder your authoritie; and for your service; and these things so necessarie, are imputed vnto him for a crime of Rebellion.
 To the end, Sir, that we be not reproached to haue bene so little affected vnto your Maiestie, so vngratefull to our Countrey, and so vnfaithfull to our selues and our possession, as to hold our peace; seeing the prodigious fauour of this stranger giuing the governments of your places, disappointing the ancient and chiefe Officers of your Commons and Parliaments, wresting from them Titles of Honour, which their age, vertue, and merit had purchased; to put into their places his creatures, vnworthy persons without experience for the conduct of an Estate, and men borne to seruilude: We beseech your Maiestie to prouide by conuenient meanes for the disorders of your Estate; to cause the treatie of Loudun to be observed, and to call into your Councils the Princes of your blood; with the other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, ancient Officers of the Crowne, & Coun-cellors of State, whom the deceased King had employed during his reigne. We shall then haue the happinesse to yeeld you with all safety the humble service and obedience which we owe you, as your most humble, most faithfull and obedient subiects and seruants Caspar de Vendosme, Henry de Lorraine, Henry de la Tour.

D After this, the King made another declaration to satisfy his subiects touching their Contributions. Although (said he) that the Rebellion of the Dukes of Neuers, Vendosme, Mayen and Bouillon, authors of the Letters which had bene brought vnto his Maie-stie from Soissons, the tenth and fourteenth of this month of February, made them vnderstand of any answer, yet for the desire he had to satisfy himselfe in satisfying the publique, he had resolved to continue till such might haue received any bad impression by their practices: and to let the world know, that vnder pretence of their particular preservation, and the good of the State, they haue no other end but to seek their greater by his ruine. These two Letters (he said) which contained many points, might be reduced to two chiefe heads. The one is to perswade, that there is no safety neere the King, E whereby they would inferre, that they cannot obey the commandments which his Maie-stie makes them to come vnto him. The other is to blamish the Government of his Estate: the which they did, accusing it of violence and iniustice, and threatening this Monarchy with an inuincible subversion; thereby (vnder colour to preferre it) to moue the people to fauour the resolutions which they had taken to make warre against their Prince. To these two points there was a long answer made by the Kings commandement, and signed by him on the 13. of February. To the first, he said that Kings are assured Sanctuaries for those which acknowledge them, and repent them of their faults: that their word is inuiolable, and their faith the most assured signe of a Royaltie. That to thinke otherwise were a crime. Touching the second, he said he did not wonder if they (whose F disobedience was so great) blamed those to whom he had committed part of his affaires, and whose integrity and sinceritie was so well knowne vnto him, that they taxed any whom his Maiestie employed, and who carried themselves courageously for the mainetenance of his authority, and the feeling of his affaires. The which (he said) appeared plainly in that they now commended and desired those whom they blamed being in Court, and of whose dismission they themselves were the cause.

An accord being made as you haue heard, betweene the Duke of Neuers and the Coffe, and entered the Lands of the Prince of the Massin, which is divided from Picardie by a little River called Eche. Don Tedy de Fyde Gouverneur of Millan sent his Horse which would fall upon the Prince of Massin, offered him more to put into his Townes than the Prince offering that he drew in Spaniards, he should not so easily get them forth; and so he had no need. Finally, Massin being incited by the Prince of Piedmont, was forced to open his gates. Then he went with his Regent which after some resistance was taken by assault and the Castle yielded by the Prince of Massin, who was within it. After this, he wrote and showed the Spaniards lying in their Trenches, which he forced, and Don Tedy de Fyde Gouverneur of the Castle of Millan, with many others, which was about Guardella, and Guardabuzon. The Marshall D'Esquiers passing into Piedmont with seven or eight thousand horse, and foot, joined with the Duke of Savoy, Arvis, and upon the second of February went to besiege Saint-Damien, which after a short siege, they took. After which he recovered other places. The taking of Townes and Forts from Princes and Noblemen which were under the protection of Spaine, caused many (which feared the like danger) to seek their posteriors from France. Amongst the which, Anthony de Grimaldi Baron Bueil obtained Letters of Protection from the French King and Ordre of France for to use his Wife, Family, Successors, Goods, Lands, Seignories and Subjecs.

And he is now returned to France. The King being advertised that there were many Townes in Thymeris, Perche, Mayen and other adjacent Prouinces, which belonged unto the Princes and others which did adhere unto their party, and that there were many Gentlemen in those Countries, who attended but a command from the Princes to go to the frontiers, to go to the frontiers, and to cross the Kings affairs in those parts, where the said Princes might annoy his Maiestie in three places at once. First, in Perche, and those Countries which are between the Rivers of Seine and Loire. Secondly, in Nyuenois towards the head of the River of Loire, where they held two Bridges, Dohert and Neuers. And thirdly, in the countries of Soissons, Laon, and Reims, where between the Rivers of Aisne, Oyle, and Meuze, they held the Townes of Laon, Coufay, Richcourt and other places, upon the River of Aisne, the Townes of Soissons, Chateau, Parisien, and Reims. In the County of Noyon, Chauny and La Fert. Upon Meuze, Meziens, Dauchtry, and Soissons in the country of Vallois, the Castle of Piesfort, and in Tirache, upon the frontiers of Champagne, Chateau, where the Seigneur of Harcourt was Gouverneur. Their Maiesties resolved first to assure those places which might annoy them between the Rivers of Seine and Loire. They sent for the Baron of Melau, Gouverneur of the royaume of Verneuil, he sent his wife, by whom he had commandment to deliver it into the Kings hands, which after some delay he performed. And Longueval a follower of the Marshall D'Ancre was put in his place, for that the Towne is in the Government of Normandy.

The Earle of Ancre, by the Kings commandment, went into those parts with three thousand horse and foot about the end of January, putting garisons into divers places for the Kings, namely into Senoches in Thymeris, Chateau-neuf, La Rocheau Villand, La Loupe, and Nogent le Rotrou. From thence he came to Mantz, where he was received with great honour, and some Gentlemen came unto him, making protestation to remaine most humble subiects and obedient to their Maiesties commandment. They which were in the Castle of Parisien for the Marquis of Camure, began to runne into the government of the Ile of France, taking the ordinary Coaches which went from Normandy and Picardy to Paris, and carrying away the passengers prisoners. Thus the warre began. A part of the Earle of Candales company who was for the King, was defeated by the Duke of Vendomes horse; and Vaubecourt charged some Carabins of the Duke of Neuers troops in there were many discords published against the Marshall D'Ancre upon these alterations, and some were put in prison upon divers subiects. It was affirmed that the Gibbets which had bene set up in the publique places of Paris, were so high such as should speake against the Marshall D'Ancre. Others said, that they were by a Decree of the Court, to hang such without any forme of Justice which had bene banished for their thefts, and yet robbed nightly in Paris, whereof there had bene great complaints.

Their Maiesties resolved to raise three Armies: the one under the command of the Marshall

A Marshall of Montigny to goe into Nyuenois. The other under the Earle of Auvergne, to set upon those Townes which the Princes held in the Ile of France. And the third was to be commanded by the Duke of Guise, assisted by the Marshall of Themines, to goe into Champagne against the Duke of Neuers. Having drawne his forces together, hee incited the Castle of Richcourt on the first of March. The Duke of Neuers had put Captaine Fesmes into it with three score souldiers, who the first three dayes defended it gallantly; but the Artillery being planted, and having made two hundred shot, hee demanded composition, the which was granted, and hee and his souldiers departed with their drums beating, and matches light, and then the Castle was dismantled. After this Rozoy was also yeilded.

Richcourt
yeilded and

The fire of Civil Warre did not onely flame in diuers Prouinces of France; but the Princes also thundred out their complaints against the Authors of all those miseries, as they said. They published a solemne declaration, and protestation, for the restoring of the Kings authoritie, and preferuation of the Realme, against the conspiracy and tyrannie (as they termed it) of the Marshall D'Ancre and his adherents.

Protestation of the Princes
against the Marshall
D'Ancre.

They said that by the Treatie of Loudon, they promised vnto themselves a serious reformation of all disorders, by the obseruation of the Lawes. And when as the said Princes were at Court, without requiring any other assurance then the publique faith, and the inuolable word which Sir Thomas Edmonds, Ambassador for the King of Great Brittain, the Countesse of Soissons, and the Duke of Neuers had given them, on the behalfe of the King and Queene Mother: the hope and assured peace, made them forget the miseries of warre, every one containing himselfe in his dutie, and the respect due vnto the Lawes. But this good disposition, was interrupted and crost by the pernicious counsell of the Marshall D'Ancre, and his adherents; who finding no safety in the setting of Justice, hee resolved to make tryall of his power, by violating the publique faith, thereby to plunge the Realme into new troubles, and combustions, having attempted by the most horrible conspiracie which can be imagined against the person of the first Prince of the blood, and of other Princes, Dukes, Peeres and chiefe Officers of the Crowne, to oppress them all together with the State, who hee thought would be an obstacle to his ambitious designs.

And to give colour to so audacious an enterprize, they vsed false accusations; and vpon pretext of the said Princes absence which were retired from Paris, they published by their instruments, that they had a designe to attempt against the persons of the King and Queene Mother, and that they sought to perswade the Prince to ioyne with them; whereupon his Maiestie had bene aduised to assure himselfe of his person. And to give some satisfaction to the world, they caused the King to goe in person to his Court of Parliament, to publish a declaration, by the which the Prince and the other Princes and Officers of the Crowne were declared guilty of treason.

That being ashamed of such an vnjust course against innocent persons, finding that their frauds beganne to bee discovered, and that the Princes had refused to represent vnto the King the iust causes of their absence, and to let him see the falsehood of the slanders and bad impressions which those conspirators had given of their fidelitie and the sinceritie of their intentions. To prevent the which, they caused a declaration to bee published contrary to that of the last of September, by the which the King better informed, declares that he holds them for his good, faithful, and affectionate subiects and seruants; not consenting nor participating with the facts contained in the former declaration; and that his meaning was the treatie of Loudon should be executed; lying by this meanes (but very vnjustly) all the accusation vpon the Prince, to make him onely culpable: they haue let the world see that it was onely a pretext and a testimony of their passion, but no proove of any crime. That haue failed of the execution which they pretended (the which fell only vpon the Princes person,) they had still continued their bad intents, employing both poison and sword but in vaine, and that the declaration made the last of September, and the Treatie of Loudon had bene but a pretext to deceive them, if they would haue suffered themselves againe to bee surprized by their disloyaltie and treachery. That after the conference at Soissons,

1617 and the Declaration of September, they had continued their enterprises; kept the A field with their troops; leav'd new Regiments; drawne Suiffers into France without any apparant necessity, to oppress the said Princes; and to execute the designs of the Marshall D'Ancre, whose intent was to kindle a new warre in France. And for that the season of the year was not fit to make any open attempt, they lodg'd their troops in all places, which might give any jealousy to the Princes; who lay still without any alteration, although they had no power in their Governments; nor were paid that which was due unto them, as well for their pensions, as the entertainment of their Garisons established long before for the safety of the said places.

That knowing how much the mediation of the Duke of Nevers, had prevailed at the conclusion of the Treaty of Loudon; by the assurances which hee gave on the behalfe of the King and Queene mother; and apprehending that a Prince of his qualitie, would have a iust feeling of their disloyaltie, and the breach which they had made of the publique faith; they drew their Maiesties into jealousy of his fidelitie, and by insolent and extraordinary proceedings, fought to draw him to resolutions contrarie to his dutie and intentions; to the end they might have some pretext to make him culpable. Notwithstanding hee had suffered all patiently, untill they had executed some enterprises vpon his houses; attempted against his person, and imprisoned his friends and seruants, whose faith they could not corrupt. Then C necessary bound him to augment his Garisons; to preferue himselfe, Saint Manchould giuing him iust cause of distrust.

This transported them with such fury, as they presently caused a declaration to be published on the seuenteenth of Ianuary: by the which vpon false and slanderous pretexts, hee was declared guilty; if within fiftene dayes hee came not to his Maiestie; whose commandments hee had beene alwayes ready to obey. That coming to Soissons to that end, hee had besought his Maiestie by Letters within the time prescribed, to giue him indifferent iudges; not suspect nor passionate, with necessarie assistances for his person and Houses; seeing there was no free access vnto his Maiestie, for that the Marshall D'Ancre and his adherents, had caused the publique faith to be broken; as you may read more at large in his Letter.

That the Dukes of Vendosme, Mayenne, and Bouillon, had by their Remonstrance besought his Maiestie not to suffer the innocencie of the Duke of Nevers to bee oppressed, by the violence and iniurie of the Marshall D'Ancre. But the Bishop of Ligon, Secretarie of State, with Mangot and Barbin (confident Ministers of the Marshall D'Ancre's tyrannie) had suppress these Letters and Remonstrances, to the end they might not come to the Kings knowledge, abusing his name and authoritie with wonderful contempt, to oppress his good and faithfull seruants. That on the thirteenth of February they had published a Declaration: by the which the said Dukes and diuers others were declared guilty of Treason; and at the same instant they vsed all acts of hostilitie against them and their seruants; to make them thereby irreconcilable, and to bring matters to the extremitie of warre. That besides all the above-mentioned indignities and causes of mistrust, they had attempted against the life of the Duke of Mayen, which was discovered, being ready to be executed; that the proofes were manifest and verified in the Processe. That the murderer had beene practised with money, and sent to that end to Soissons, by Dissonis a creature to the Marshall D'Ancre, and the ordinarie executioner of his violencies.

That notwithstanding all these iust causes of distrust, which had forced the said Princes to fortifie their places; to leaue men, and to entertaine them with the Kings money, having no other means; to the end they might preferue them vnder his authoritie, and for his seruice, yet they were persecuted by the rigour of Armes; and they beganne to take, burne, and ruine their Houses; necessitie forcing them to oppose themselves to this oppression. That to the end hee might ferle his tyrannies in the Kings Council and neere his person, hee had caused the Seales to be taken from Monsieur du Vair; and dismissed with contempt the Kings ancient Councillors, who forth their integritie, had the testimonie of all good men, because they opposed themselves

A felues to that which they know preiudiciall and pernicious to the State, and had brought in others of his faction, pensioners to strangers, men of bale and infamous qualitie, ignorant and mercinarie; and by a new example, of a Bishop had made a Secretarie of State against the Lawes and Canoniall constitutions: Of a petty-farmer; or undertaker, a Superintendent of the Treasure; to the end he might be sole Arbitrator of all the affaires of the Kingdoms; to dispose of peace and warre, yea, of the lifand goods of priuate men; to refuse what he pleased without contradiction; and to make all things passe vnder the law of his will.

Finally, that hee had usurped vnder the Kings name (like vnto the ancient Maiores B of the Palace) an absolute authoritie within the Realme; and had not left vnto his Maiestie the iust image of the Royall Dignitie, having drawne to himselfe the whole gouerning of the State; the which hee exercised with such tyrannie, as it was not lawfull without crime to oppose their mouths to complaine. That hee findeth the libertie of the generall Estates, and Soueraine Courts; by violence or corruption, the two chief means hee vsed to oppress iudice; and reduce France to miserable seritude. That hee had beene so audacious as to make a chiefe Officer to be continually locked out of the capital Citie in view of the Parliament of Paris; and to cause him to be shut vpon the Cattle of Amboise, without any kinde of process, accusation, or proofe C of crime, imploying therein the Kings name and royall authoritie.

That his designs proceeded yet further, tending to an alteration of the State in fauour of strangers, by the ruine of the Princes of the blood of the house of Bourbon, which onely remained of the Royall race, at that time wholly at his disposall. That the King nor his brother were not safe in his hands; seeing that both hee and his wife, by an impietie and caniditie (punishable by the Lawes) had enquired of the continuance of their lives. That they had consulted with Magicians; vpon the time of their death; the which might be they had limited by their incantments and feceries; being certaint that vpon this end hee encreased Monsieur de la Physician, and the Abbot of Saint Mahe, the abominable Monster; the horror of whose D death did shew what his life was. That it was well knowne that in the Assemblie of the generall Estates, hee had sought by his partisans to haue a Law enacted; That the Princes of the blood should be no more admitted to the gouernment of the State; the which was reiecte as contrarie to the Lawes of the Realme, which admit them in this right, and exclide women and strangers. And since, seeing the Prince armed to defend the Kings authoritie, hee made vse of this occasion, to haue him declared guilty of Treason, with a Warrant to his powerfullie: The which the Court of Parliament finding vnjust and against the Lawes, obserued in the like cases; refusing to acquaint the King with the reasons why they could not verifie the Declaration, hee sent such insolent Ministers of his passions, as hee caused a false Decree to be suppressed and published, attempting by an insupportable presumption and fraud, that which neuer had beene heard of in that reuerend Company, whose resolutions had beene alwayes iust and inuolable. And when as the Officers who understood this falsehood would haue discoursed it; hee caused them to be threatened to lose their places, and to be banished from their houses.

And hee sought to make knowne that hee had no other end, but the ruine of the State, having thus divided and weakened it within; hee made in a lawfull excuse to abandon the ancient allies and confederates of the Crowne abroad; denying succours and assistance at need; which by the Treaties solemnly sworne with them, they might expect. To this end hee had caused the protection of the Soueraignie of Sedan to be refused to the Duke of Bouillon, the which had beene alwayes held necessary for Princes; by reason of the situation and strength of the places which depend thereon. That it had beene carefully kept from Charles the eighth, vntill that day, with promise of assistance, and protection against all their enemies, and had beene comprehended in the Treaties of Peace betwene France and Spaine. That Barbin had beene so audacious, so treacherous and vnfaithfull to the King and France, as to say vnto certaine persons without exception: that they must abandon this protection; and they

they had done Weafell and other places belonging to the fuccellion of the Duke of A Cleues.

For thefe reafons and others mentioned at large in their Declaration, they laid that they were affembled together, for the reftoring of the Kings authoritie, their foueraigne Prince and Lord, and the preferuation of the State; according to the duty they did owe vnto the Crowne, called therunto by the publique clamours; preffed by the violence and feeling they had of the common miferie, and the neceffitie of their priuate preferuation, againft the confpiracie and pernicious defignes of the Marfhall D'Ancre and his adherents: againft whom as troublers of the peace and tranquillitie of the Realme; breakers of the publique faith, and enemies of the State and Houfe of France, B they opposed their iuft Armes, and againft them alone. Inuiting all true-hearted Frenchmen, by the naturall bond which they owe vnto the Kings feruice; the preferuation of their Country, and their common libertie, to ioyne with them, and to affist and fauour them in their neceffarie defence.

After this, the King fent a declaration to the Court of Parliament, enioyning them to proceede againft the Dukes of Neuers, Vendofme, Mayenne, Bouillon; the Marquis of Crauure, and Prefident Le Ioy, with all rigour, and againft their memorie and pofteritie, according to the Lawes: commanding them to confiscate and vnite feaparably vnto the Crowne, the Duchies, Earledomes, Seigneuries and Lands which they held within his Realme, and Countreies of his obedience; the which was verified by C the Court.

Wce will now returne to the exploits of Warre. On the one and twentieth of March the Baron of Heurteuau was beheaded in Paris. Hee thought not to die, and could hardly refolute. They faid hee had beene accufed to haue had a defigne to furprize a place in Normandie for the Princes, and that vnderhand hee had leauied Souldiers. The King had made Proclamation throughout all France, not to leaue any Souldiers without commiffion vnder his Great Seale, vpon paine of high Treafon.

The Prouofts Marfhall likewife in many parts of France, hanged vp as many fouldiers as they found in Armes, which were not vnder Capitaines with the Kings Commiffion, which kept many at home that would haue gone to ferue the Princes; who D were alfo reported not be strong enough to keepe the field vnill their Retiers were come vnto Sedan: all which was done to hinder the fuccours of fuch as were willing to ioyne with them.

On the twelfth of March, there went fixe Cannons, and ten Companies of the Regiment of the Guard from Paris vnto the Kings Armie, commanded by the Cont D'Auuergne, which he had affembled about Creffie in Valois.

The Duke of Mayenne who was retired to Soiffons where hee prepared for a Siege, iffued out with good numbers of horfe and foote to furprize Monfieur de Robans quarter, which was in Villiers Cofterets, which to effect, hee left his foot on the foreft neere adioyning, to fauour his retreat, and with his horfe charged and forced their entry, where after they had rifled the Stables, finding the Kings people to haue taken the alarme, and ready on horfebacke to receiue them, hee retired vnder couert of the foreft, and his foot companies vnto Soiffons, with the loffe of fixe of his company, and as many prifoners.

The foure and twentieth of the laid moneth, the Caffe of Pierefont was inuefted by the Earle of Auuergne. It was commanded by Capitaine Villeneufue and the two brethren of Malortis, for the Marquis of Crauure. It was thought this Siege would haue continued three moneths: for that during the League this Caffe had endured eleven hundred Cannon fhoot without breach making. At the first, the befieged made fhew of refiftance: but feeing themfelves battered with foure Cannons (with which their defences were beaten downe, their Port broken, and fome little breach made) F they beought themfelves of compofition.

Capitaine Villeneufue came forth on the first of Aprill to falute the Earle of Auuergne; and on Sunday the fecond of the moneth, the befieged parlyed and were licensed to retire with their Armes and baggage, which they did at eight of the elocke that night.

A of Oyle to Compeigne, and from thence to the Siege of Soiffons, whither (it was faid) the King would goe: but vpon the Remonftrances and requests of the chiefe Companies and body of the Towne of Paris, (although the Collonell of his guard was already gone) it was concluded, that his Maieftie fhould ftill remaine at Paris, and not goe to the Siege. About this time newes was brought the King, that the Marfhall of Montigny had taken many places in Niuernois, and Douzibis into the Kings obedience, and that hee had seized on the perfon of the Prince of Portian, fecond Sonne to the Duke of Neuers.

The first of Aprill the King had newes of the rendring of Chateau Portian. The Duke of Guife hauing taken Richecour and Rozoy, hee went on the fifteenth of March to inueft Chateau Portian: hee planted a batterrie of foure Pieces, and diſcharged ſome Volleys of ſhot, which did not much amaze the befieged. The Seigneur of Ville aux bois being Gouverneur (feeing himſelfe befieged) gaue aduertifement to the Duke of Neuers, being at Rethel two leagues off, who prefently ſent two hundred Wallons, which entered as the batterrie began, which continued vnill fome of their Ordnance were ſpoiled; fo as the Duke of Guife was forced to ſend to Chalons and Rheims for more Cannon. The befieged were ſtill relieued with men, victuall, and munition from Rethel, by reaſon of the paſſage of the Riuier. The Duke attempting to force the Suburbs by Pettarde, and failing, he continued his batterrie, where hauing made a reaſonable breach, the ſouldiers retired into the Caſtle, and the towne was yielded by the inhabitants; and the next day the Caſtle demanded Parley, and yielded the ſame vpon certaine Articles: to the Duke: and among others, That they ſhould depart with their Armes, Baggage, Drummes beating, Matches light; and Bullets in their mouthes, and their enſignes wrapped vp.

The D. of Guife being aduertifed on the first of Aprill, that there was three hundred horſe and ſome foot of the Princes, lodged in the ſuburbs of Laon, called Vaufoulan and thereabouts, he reſolued to charge them, although it were fixe leagues off. Hee parced about fixe of the clock in the evening with foure hundred horſe, an hundred Carabins; and the Company of his guards; Hee came neere to Laon at two of the elocke after mid night; commanding ten of his Guards, twenty Carabins, and an hundred Light horſe to D laue their horſes, he gaue them charge to force the first Barricado of the ſuburbs, where they ſlew the Sentinell, and recovered the place of Armes without any refiſtance. This ſurprize by night amazed the Princes men, who retired into the Towne after ſome loſſe on either ſide.

The King being aduertifed that there were certaine Capitaines of the reformed Religion which leauied men in the country of Seuennes for the Princes, which ſhould croſſe Velay, Viuaraſ, Foreſt, and Bourbonnois, to come into Niuernois, the Seigneur of Saint Chaumont had commiſſion from the King to leaue troopes of horſe and foot in the Country of Lionois and the neighbour Prouinces, to ioyne with the Marſhall of Montignies Armie. But it was thought theſe ſuccours of Seuennes were too farre E from Neuers, and would goe to ſmoake, as they did.

The Prince of Guinille was ſent into his gouernment of Auuergne, to leaue troopes to haue an eye to the praedices which were made in the countries of Marſh, baſis Lymosin; and the neighbour Prouinces by the Duchefſe of Bouillon, who ſolicited a generall aſſembly of them of the Religion, to incite them to take Annes. And in the end of March, the King was aduertifed that many of the Religion ſent as Deputies of fixe Prouinces, had met at Roſchel, and had reſolued to hold a generall Aſſembly of all their Churches; and ſhat they would fend their Deputies to his Maieſtie ſome time. Theſe Deputies had no good answer in Court, yet notwithstanding they continued their reſolution; for the which they publiſhed certaine reaſons which I may not ſet downe in F particular.

The breaches of Chateau Portian being repaired, the Armie advanced on the eighth of Aprill towards Rethel, a great Towne, well peopled, and rich, as the Capitall of the whole Duchie, the which the Duke had manned with a ſtrong Garriſon. They made their approaches, planted their batterries; and had made a ſufficient breach, meaning to give an aſſault the next day. But the Duke of Neuers hearing in what ſtate the Towne ſtood, ſent the Seigneur of Marolles vnto the Duke of Guife, to make certaine propoſitions vnto him, to hinder the ſpoile and ruine of this Towne. The Duke of Guise gave a willing ear vnto it at fixe of the clocke at night; and gave him leave to enter into Reibel the next morning, to acquaint the souldiers with what he had charge from the Duke of Nevers; appointing him to returne by noone; and in the meane time there was a truce. At the returne of *Monsieur de Capitu*lation was made, and the towne yielded vpon very honorable conditions.

Troopes coming out of Germany.

The King receiuing aduertisement that the Reiters which came for the Princes, vpon the Marshall of Bouillons credit, were entered into Lorraine, being about 1200, with eight hundred Carabins, either of them carying two short Muskets: and that they of the Count Kingrue, which the Earle of Saint Chomberg Natleuil had leauied for the King with certaine Lands Kenets, advanced towards the frontiers; the Duke of Guise B retieued commandement to goe and receiue them; and to hinder the entry of the Princes Reiters into France.

Reasons why the King resolues to besiege Soissons.

Their Majesties resolved to besiege Soissons; for the which they pretended some reasons: For that the Duke of Mayenne after the losse of Pierrefont had no place of retreat on this side the Riuier of Aisne but Soissons. As for Noyon, Cousy, and Chauny, which are the threetownes of his Gouvernement, which hee held beyond the Riuier of Aisne, Soissons being taken, they had not beene able to resist the Kings forces; but would come and submit themselves to his obedience. To goe first and besiege one of the other three places, they should giue the Duke of Mayenne, and the other Princes meane to ioyne together in Soissons, from whence they might vpon all occasions attempt vpon the Kings Aunie, and make roades to the gates of Paris.

Soissons besieged.

The Princes being assured, that their resolution in Councell was to besiege Soissons: they fortified it with what horse and foot they could. The Duke of Vendosme sent him his Inginer with two hundred Souldiers. Finally, the Duke of Mayenne resolved to defend it with 1200 foot, and about three hundred horse. The Earle of Auvergne invested the Towne on the twelfth of April. Hee tooke his quarter on the other side of the Riuier of Aisne neere Saint Val, which they of Soissons during the League called their Citadell, being diuided from the Towne by the Riuier, and defended with three great Bastions, Trenches and halfe Moones. On the other side of the Riuier where D Soissons stands, he lodged the foot and horse; as well French as Liegeois (which were sent by the Marshall D'Ancre).

During the siege the Duke of Mayenne, with some troopes of horse and foot, went forth by night with two pieces of Ordnance, and forced one of their quarters: where they slue fifty men, disarmed the rest, and tooke many prisoners with three ensignes; then hauing burnt the quarter called Presle, they returned into the Towne; Monsieur de Mayenne carying with him Bussy Lamet, his three Ensignes, and about two hundred Souldiers, hauing lost but eight of his owne. This Militarie exploit was much commended euen by his enemies. The continuall raine had much annoyed the besiegers; yet they continued their trenches in such sort, and so restrained the besieged, as they imagined Soissons might bee taken: the Earle of Auvergne hauing planted two and twenty Cannons in diuers places; so as in all mens opinions Soissons could not hold out long.

The clouds were gathered together, and the storme ready to fall vpon the Princes, who had nothing left them but despair, and the integrity of their intentions, which they protested to be innocent. But God who holds the hearts of Kings in his hand, and gouernes the motions of these inferior Orbes at his pleasure, had resolved in his diuine Councell to crosse these great designs, and to quench the fire of these ciuill combustions, when there was least hope of quenching it: but with the ruine of the Princes; whose honors were blenished with the flourish of Edicts; their persons and liues exposed to the rigour of the lawes, and their Lands and Seigneuries confiscated and vntied to the reuenges of the Crowne. But God (I say) meaning to free France from this ciuill warre wherein it was engaged, and could not be ended but with the losse of many great personages, who had resolved (as they said) to dye in their Armes at a breach; rather then to fall vnder the tyrannie of the Marshall D'Ancre, changed the face of the affaires of France in the twinkling of an eye, by the death of the said Marshall, which hapned on the 24 of April about ten of the clocke in the morning.

A The Marshall D'Ancre being gone into Normandy, as well to finish his fortifications at Quille-boeuf, as to pursue the verification of his gift of a wood of timber trees, fought by all meanes to draw vnto him the Nobility, the Kings officers, and all such as he thought might any way assist him. Some could not loue him, others following the course of the time did adhere vnto him: whereupon the children of Rouen in counterfeiting him, said one to another, Sir loue me and I will doe you fauour: But vpon three points, that is to say, 1. The refusal he had of the verification of his gift of Timber trees, against the which Monsieur de Fleury great Master of the Waters and Forests of Normandy opposed himselfe. 2. Vpon that he fought to establish a Master of Requests intendant of the Iustice B within Rouen. And 3. Vpon a report that he meant to put one of his creatures into the old Palace at Rouen, and to repaire Saint Katherins Fort; they write that he was aduertised to beware of the Lectany, Afurore Normannorum: whereunto hee answered, I will make them ease their fingers which shall contradict my will. Whereupon being at Pontcaudemer neere to Quille-boeuf, vpon an aduice which he receiued from Paris, that he should returne speedily to Court, he tooke his journey, and leauing Rouen, past at Pont de Larche. Being arrived at Paris, his people spake openly, that he was come for two reasons; first, to remove from about his Majesty many persons in whom he did not trust, and to place others which should be confident vnto him: and secondly, to haue Letters of commandement to verifie his gift of timber.

The Marshall D'Ancre goes from Quille-boeuf to Paris.

C The King, who for the reasons specified in Letters to the Gouvernors, had made shew to be ignorant of the Marshalls designs, was againe aduertised, that passing at Pont de Larche, he had offered the Gouvernement of some places in Normandy to certaine Captaines; so as they would take an oath to befor him against all men, without this exception, saufesse I se a commandement cede from the King. They also shewed him Letters written to the Marshall by his confident, whereby he found that their designe was onely to entertaine warre in France; to continue their authority in the Gouvernement of the State which they vsurped. Kings should not doe any thing without counsell, especially in matters of consequence. The French Histories report, that King Henry the great sayd vnto his Councell, Do not make me seize on the Marshall of Biran, if you doe not hold him D worthy of death. So the King said vnto them which shewed him these Letters, Before I cause this man to be apprehended, take aduice of such, and let me know it. They deliuered their aduice vnto the King; that for the good of his Estate, he should take knowledge of his affaires. They sayd, that the voyce of the people against the said Marshall, was the best and most faithfull counsell a King could haue, to resolve himselfe in an action of that importance: and that the time and occasion seemed to fauour this artekt. At the end the King resolves, and commands the Seigneur of Vitry Capitaine of the Guards of his bodie; to seize vpon the Marshall D'Ancre, and to cause assistance in case of resistance: Finally, that he should take him alive or dead. The difficulty of the execution was, first, for the great traine of Noblemen which did still accompanie the Marshall, besides his E household seruants, with twelue of his Guard, who were souldiers of action of five and thirty or forty yeares of age, attired in his livery, and were alwayes about him, were hee in Caroch or on foot. Secondly, the place where he should be apprehended: and thirdly, to know the hour and time of his comming to the Louure. They resolved that he could not be more conueniently arrested, then betwixt the great gate of the Louure and the Court, wherethe passage is long and narrow, when they haue past the draw-bridge. The Marshall D'Ancre was lodged neere vnto the wals of the Louure without the Castle, towards the Riuier side. Some dayes were spent betwene the resolution and the execution. One day he tooke Physicke; another, he came not out of his Cabinet: so as you may easily iudge if they did not feare the enterprise had bene discovered: the dispatche had F during that time with his wife, with the question some asked him, what reception he had of the King, made many thinke that he had some aduertisement of the enterprise, but without they did beleue that it could not be executed.

The King resolves to seize vpon the Marshall D'Ancre.

On Monday the 24 of April, about ten of the clocke in the morning, the Marshall D'Ancre leauing his lodging, came on foot to the Louure, being followed after his accustomed manner: the great gate of the Louure was opened for him, and thus againe as soone as he was entered. Monsieur de Vitry (who was at the entry of the Court, with his followers and Archers which should assist him) seeing the great gate open, demanded who entered:

entred & they came and told him it was the Marshall D'Ancre: whereupon he aduanced presently (being assisted by his followers armed with Pistols) to meet him, and coming to the entry of the inner bridge, presenting his staffe, he sayd vnto him, I arrest you in the Kings name: whereat the Marshall stepping backe, as if he would resist, sayd, Me? which they who accompanied Monsieur Vitry seeing, discharged three Pistols vpon him; the one strucke through his heart, the second into his braines, and the third into his belly, so as he fell downe dead without speaking word. A Nobleman also close by him talking with him, fell downe on the other side, but was not hurt; they which did accompany him slipt away, seeing him dead. This being done, he was carryed halfe dragged into the Porters lodge: his goodly scarfe, and his rich Diamond, with whatsoever he had good about him, were soone laid hold on. The noyse of the three Pistoll shot put the whole Loure into alarme: the gates were presently shut, and they which commanded the companies of the French Guard, seized vpon all the approaches vnto the Loure. According to that which had bene resolved, there was a generall cry of God saue the King, through the whole Loure. In the meane time Monsieur de Vitry went vnto the King, and his Maiesty receiving him with a good eye, and embracing him, sayd, God giue order that the mischiefe fall on none but himselfe: therewith the King was entreated to shew himselfe at the window to the Nobility, and others which were in the Court, who desired to see him: he shewed himselfe with his hat in his hand, the which made them to renew their acclamations; so as the Noblemen which were about him were forced to cry O the King thanks to you. And this was all which past at the Marshall *D'Ancre*s death.

By the Kings commandment the Seigneurs of Villeroy, and President Lannin came presently to the Loure. Monsieur de Liancourt went to horse to take order for the City gates, and to tell the people that the King was in health, because there had bene a brute which ran through Paris like lightning, that there had bene a tumult at the Loure, in the which the King was hurt. Those which accompanied him, told every man that the Marshall D'Ancre was slain, whereat the people seemed to reioyce. Monsieur D'Ornano hauing also commandment to take some Archers & to go & aduertise the Court of Parliament, he came soone after they were risen: the Archers coming into the great Hall with their Pistols about their heads, and crying, God saue the King, it was strange to see how the multitude was amazed, every one seeking to flye out of the doores, one falling vpon another, so as they stopped the passage. Monsieur D'Ornano went to the first President, and told him what had hapned at the Loure, whereupon he went with two other Councillors to Court, where he vnderstood the Kings pleasure. As soone as the newes of the Marshall *D'Ancre*s death was knowne in the Palace Hall, there was such acclamations of ioy, as they which had lost their square caps and hats in falling, rising vp againe cryed, God be thanked we haue a peace. Monsieur Mangot came to the Loure by the Kings commandment, to deliuer the Seales into his hands. Barbin was met vpon the way, and caried backe to his house, and there guarded by certaine Archers, and afterwards committed to the For-l'Euêque. The Bishop of Luçon was commanded to keepe his lodging. The Marshall *D'Ancre*s wife was brought prisoner to the Loure, and put into the same roome where the Prince of Conde was lodged vpon his first arrest. Two of the Councill of State were appointed to take an Inventory of the Marshalls goods, and two other for Barbins: and for his papers.

The Kings Letters to the Gouernours of Provinces touching the Marshalls death.

The same day the King sent Letters to the Gouernours of Provinces, to aduertise them of the Marshall *D'Ancre*s death, and of the reasons: For that since his fathers death, the said Marshall and his wife abusing his Nomage, and the power which they had gotten with the Queene his Mother, had proiected to vsurpe all the authority, to dispose absolutely of his Estate, and to deprivate him of the meanes to take knowledge thereof: so as he had nothing remaining but the bare name of King; and that it was a capitall crime for his officers and subiects to see him in priuate, or to entertaine him with any serious discourse. That God letting him see the imminent danger of his person and State by that vnrestrained ambition, if he should haue made any shew to apprehend it; he had bene forced to dissemble his inward resolution by his exterior actions, vntill that God by his bounty should prepare him meanes and opportunity to prevent it. And withall considering that besides the danger of his person, the publicke hatred they bare to the Government of those men, had so altered and incited the minds of his Subiects, as a generall confusion

A was to be feared, if he deferred it any longer. For which iust considerations, he had commanded Monsieur de Vitry to seize vpon the said Marshall, who being wonderfully well followed, and seeking to make resistance, was there shot and slaine. That he had caused his wife and some of his instruments to be committed, and had entreated the Queene his mother to rest contented if he did hereafter hold the Helme of his owne Estate, and seeke to raise it from those extremities wherinto the bad counsell she had followed had plunged it. In the end he entreated them to giue notice of this action throughout their Governments, and of the reasons which had induced him thereunto.

The body of the Marshall being taken out of the Porters Hall, was all that afternoon in the little Tennis-court of the Loure, vntill nine of the clocke at night, that it was commanded to be buried at Saint Germans of l'Auxerois. He was wound vp in a course foule Table-cloth, tyed at both ends with a riband; he was carryed without light or prayers, but very low, there being but a Priest, the Clerke, and Graue-maker present; they laid him vnder the Organs, and his Coffin vpon him, and then plaistred vp his graue, so as there was no shew that any had bene intombed there: the next day about tenne of the clocke, about three hundred Lackayes, with a multitude of people, came to S. Germans Church, where vnderstanding the Marshall had bene interred vnder the Organs, they found meanes (whilest the Chanoins were gone in procession) to open the ground, where they tooke out the coeter of a Coffin of wood, and finding nothing within it, they thought themselves deceived of their hope: but hauing notice giuen them that the body was vnderneath it, they tooke out the Coffin, where they found it groueling; then they began to draw it out, crying, Come out Cullion: hauing vnburied him, they dragged him to the end of the new Bridge, and there hung him by the feet vpon an old gibbet: hanging thus, they cut off his nose, eares, hands, and members; others trucke him with their Swords and Staues: they pulled off hayre and beard, and after he had hung there halfe an houre, they tooke him downe, and dragged him through the streets, striking him with staues, and crying God saue the King: and if any as they passed put not off their hats, they compelled them with blowes to cry, God saue the King. Some laughed at all this, others blamed this action although they were glad of his death: Thus they dragged him to the Bastille, then drew him backe to the Vniuersity, and from thence to the Suburbs of Saint Germans, where they beganne to burne the body before his owne house with straw, and some few faggots they had snatched vp as they went along; but being angry that it burned not according to their wils, they dragged him againe to the new bridge, forcing the Merchants, which had wood vpon the Wharves, to giue them some to make an end of burning this miserable carcasse. They made all the Princesses, Ladies, and Gentlewomen which passed by to vnmaske themselves and cry, God saue the King, forcing them to giue money to buy wood: the like they did to the Princes and Noblemen. In the end seeing the bones were long before they were consumed, they cast them into the Riuer.

On Saint Markes day there was a Proclamation made by sound of Trumpet, whereby all the Marshall *D'Ancre*s seruants were enjoyned to depart out of Paris within foure and twenty houres, vpon paine of death: And the same day her Brother, who by his fauour had bene aduanced to the Archbishopspricke of Towers, the Abbey of Marmoutier, and many other Benefices, fearing the fury of the multitude, escaped by the backe gate of the Colledge where he was lodged, and retired himselfe into a Monastery. His Armes were afterwards taken downe from about the Colledge gate, and those of the Cheuallier of Vendosme set vp as Abbot of Marmoutier.

The new Councillors which had gouerned the State for the space of five moneths, were either guarded in their lodgings, or committed to prison, the King finding for all the ancient Officers of the State, who had bene displaced by the Marshall *D'Ancre*s meanes, to come vnto him, and to execute their places. The first day of Councill being the 27 of April, they which were in the Court of the Loure, seeing the Chancellor of Sillery, the Seigneurs of Villeroy and Lannin, Monsieur du Pair, Keeper of the Seales, with Chasteau-neuf, and others come forth, they blest the King, hoping that his reigne would be happy, seeing he began by the establishment of his Councill, and that he would not employ any but such as had faithfully serued the Kings and State.

The same day the Earle of Suze came to the Court, and presented vnto the King the keyes of Soissons, which the Duke of Mayen had sent. They vnderstood from him, that the Duke having received newes of the Marshalls death, that day in the evening, he gave thanks to God, being upon the Rampiers, and advertised the besiegers thereof, who joyfully received the newes: That the next day he had given entry to all those of the Kings Army that would come into Soissons: That they had generally made Bonfires: That there was now no difference among them, visiting and embracing one another lovingly: That the Duke prepared to come to serve his Majesty, with the Dukes of Nevers and Vendosme, who had entreated him to stay for them: That he was about to dismiss his troops, beseeching the King to command his Army about Soissons to retire. Upon the same day the Duke of Longueville (who in this last warre had not leaved armes, neither had he come to Court in regard of the private quarrell between him and the Marshall D'Ancre) came from Picardy to Paris, and went to salute the King. Nine dayes after he married the young Lady of Soissons.

The Queens
mother retired to Blois.

Upon the fourth of May, the Queene Mother parted from the Louvre to goe to Blois, wel attended by her servants and Guard: many Princesses and Ladies conducted her unto Burg la Roine. Some write, that the King came into her Chamber to bid her farewell, to whom he vied this speech, Madam, I come hither to take my leave of you, and to assure you that I will have a care of you as of my mother: I have desired to ease you of the paines you have taken in my affaires: It is my resolution not to suffer any one but my selfe to command within my Realme. I have given order for that which is necessary for your voyage, and commanded La Curie to accompany you: you shall hear from me at your coming to Blois: Adieu Madam. The Queene Mother having made a great obeysance unto the King, the said something unto him touching the care which he had taken of his person and affaires during her Regency, desiring him to remember her paines and travail, and that he was his Mother. Whereupon the King kissed her, and with a great reverence tooke his leave, and retired. The same day the King, Queene, and Monsieur, with a great troop of Nobles, went to Bois de Vincennes, where they continued eight dayes. The Dukes of Vendosme, Nevers, and Mayenne, came upon Ascension day thither, and did their duties to his Majesty.

The Princess came unto the
King.

De Trauvail, who had beene committed to For-<sup>r</sup> Euesque, was by the Kings commandement sent unto the Congerery of the Palace, where he was confronted with the Seigneurs of Luynes and Breffieux, and upon the tenth of May hee was broken upon the wheele, & his body burnt at the Greue, and this was his sentence: Alfonse de Trauvail, born at Grenoble, for having attempted against the life of the Queene the Kings mother, is attainted and convicted of Treason, and condemned by the Court of Parliament, to have his members broken, his body and proceffe burnt, the ashes to be cast into the winde, and his goods to be confiscate to the King. They which had knowne him, sayd, That he was a man of bad life: that having bene of the Reformed Religion, and a Soldier to the age of thirty yeares, he made himselfe a Catholicke, and then a Capuchin; but the Capuchins discovering his lewd life, had chased him away, and taken the habit from him in a Prouincial Chapter: that since, he had bene a spy in Sauoy, and unto his dying day a Bawd, a corrupter and feller of virgins: finally, that the least of his offences were a number of murders, at the which he had assisted. He commonly caried vnder his cassoche a short sword, broad, and well pointed, and had the shew of a bold yndertaker. Going to his death, he had a smiling countenance, and seemed like one that had his spirits transported, for as loone as it was read, he rose vp, and thrusting forth his arme hee said unto them, seele my pulse, and see if there bee any alteration in mee since I heard my sentence of death.

The Kings
Declaration in fauour of the Princes.

On the twelfth of May, there was a Declaration made in fauour of the Princes which had absented themselves from the King, during this last ciuill warre: Shewing that the ready obedience which the Princes and others which had assisted them, had yielded to his commandements, gaue a sufficient testimony that the only desire of their preferuation, and to prevent their ruine which was practised by the insolent, violent, and pernicious designs of the Marshall D'Ancre, had forced them to retire themselves, and so seek their safety by armes (although vnlawfull) for that the said Marshall (contrary to his intention) had made vse of his Force to oppress them: But being sufficiently informed of their good intentions towards him and his Realme, and of the desire they had to employ their

A their lides for the maintenance of his government and authority, and that they were displeased to have laboured so long, or done any act contrary to their duties: having protested that they would neuer have attempted it, if they had not beene forced to avoid the total ruine of themselves and their Families, out of his Clemency and royall bounty, entreating them favourably in pardoning their faults which they had committed. Hee declared that he held the said Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crowne, and all which had assisted them, for his good and royall Subjects and Retainers: And that he would have the remembrance of what had happened in these last alterations suppressed and abolished: Provided, that they should continue themselves within the bounds of their duty and respect, and that they should presently renounce all leagues and associations both within and without the Realme: in regard whereof he restored them to all their lands, goods, honors, dignities, charges, Estates, offices, and pensions, to enjoy them as they had formerly done.

Thus the third Ciuill warre had an end. The Kings Forces were dismissed. The Earle of Amurgen, who commanded the Army before Soissons, returned to Court the eighteenth of May, and the same day President Le Jay went to the Parliament. The Deputies of the Assembly of them of the Reformed Religion at Rochel, coming to Court, the King gaue them this answer by his Chancellor: Follow those courses which all good Subjects ought to hold in that which they desire to obtaine from their King: Prepare your Petitions and Grievances with all speed, and when as you have chosen Deputies to present them to his Majesty, dissolve your Assembly, and let every man returne into his Provinces, and the King promisseth to answer your Grievances favourably in all that shall be conformable to reason and iustice. Upon the two and twentieth of May, the King made Monſieur the Viry Marshall of France, and he was received by the Parliament of Paris, being accompanied thither by a goodly troop of Noblemen: and presently after, the Duke of Guise having discharged part of the Army, and put the rest into garrison, returned to Paris.

The Kings Forces dismiss.

The Governors and Captaines which the Marshall D'Ancre had put into the Castles and Fortresses of Caen, Quille-bouff, Alencon, Verneuil, Falaise, Pont de Larche, and other Townes of Normandy, having given over their places and charges upon their first summons, into their hands whom the King had sent with commission to that end: All France beganne to enjoy general peace, and Justice and the Lawes to haue force and authority. And the King having resolved to proceed against the memory of the Marshall D'Ancre, and against his wife and their adherents, by the ordinary course of Justice, hee gaue commandement to three Councellers of State, being Masters of the Requests, to informe against the Marshalls wife, and to examine their officers and household servants, the which hee beganne in the Louvre on the 26 of April, and on the 2 of May hee was conducted to the Bastile, where they continued their examinations; which being finished, they sent it to the Court of Parliament, who having proceeded in the proceffe, there was brought on the 11 of May to the Congerery, at which change shee was somewhat amazed, and for that they had left her but two Archers to guard her. The chiefe charges in the proceffe were collected into foure heads: The first was treason against God: The second, Treason diuine and humane mixt: The third was Treason against the King: And the fourth was the murder committed upon the person of Prouille, Sergeant Maior of Amiens. The Sentence did import, That in regard of the impieties of Concilio Conchini, in his life time Marquis D'Ancre, Marshall of France, and of Leonora Galigai his widow, their enterprises against the Kings authority and his Estate, secret negotiations with strangers, casting of Arillery, changing the Kings Armes, and setting his owne upon the said Peeces, employing the publicke Treasure to their owne private profit, and transporting it out of the Realme without the Kings permission, as also for the murder of Prouille, Sergeant Maior of Amiens, they were condemned as guilty of diuine and humane Treason, and for reparation, the memory of the said Conchini condemned for euer, and Galigai to lose her head, and her body to be burnt, and all their lands to bee incorporated to the Crowne, his house to be razed, and his kids which did not hold of the Crowne, to bee sold, and the money to be put into the Kings Coffers: Prouilles widow had 2400 pound sterling, adidged her out of his goods confiscated, one third part for her selfe, the other two parts for her children; and likewise there was to be extracted out of his confiscation 4000 pound sterling for a fine, to be employed in pious vles, the reliefe of prisoners, and other other necessities. His Secretaries Vincens Ladouici and Anthony Mananbert, were let A at liberty, with charge to prevent themselves when the Court should call for them.

Vpon the eight of Iuly, sentence of death being given against her, it was resolved she should dye the same day: in the afternoon the Porter (according to custome) brought her vp into the Chappell, where the Iudges would question her, and laid vnto her, Gowve Madam, this is the last time, you shall goe from hence this day: Shee dreamed not of death, thinking she should be only banished, so as she went reasonably well pleased from her chamber to the Chappell; where entering, and seeing they commanded her to pull off her maske, she beganne to enter into an apprehension, saying, What a world of people! for indeed the Chappell was wonderfull full. The Register coming to her, willed her to prepare her selfe to heare her sentence: they caused her to kneele downe, and as soone as she was vnderstood, And the Lord Galigai to haue her head stricke off vpon a scaffold, these stood vp and cryed out, Ay me, I am with child: so as they could not make her to heare the rest of her sentence.

The execution of the Marshall of Anvers wile.

The Executioner presently seized vpon her person, and foure Diuines came to comfort her: they also sent for some certaine Midwives and Surgeons to search her, for that she pretended to be with child, which was but counterfeite. After this, shee was conducted to the place of execution, where she spied a faine of a Gentleman belonging to the Commander of Silery, whom she called often by his name, and entreated him to tell the Chancellor and the Commander, that she prayed them to forgive her, for that she had greatly wronged and persecuted them: making him with instance, promise C not to forget her entreaty. Being vpon the Scaffold, she entreated all men to forgive her whom she had offended, telling the Register, that what she had layd against the Chancellor when she enioyed the Queene mothers fauour, was not true: After this preparing her selfe for death, her head was stricke off, and both it and the body cast into the fire and burnt.

Some haue written, That her name was Leonora Dory, and that she had taken the surname of Galigai but since her coming into France. That her Father was a Ioyner, one of those who after the manner of Florence, went vp and downe to seeke worke with his tools: That she was not foster sister to the Queene mother, as it was supposed: That at the age of tenne yeares she was taken to serue the Marquis of Struiz and the Queene mother, who was then but Princeesse of Florence, seeing her of a quicke spirit and a iouiall humour, would haue her seruice. French Pyrates in the mouth of the Riuer
of Garonne.

On the eight of Iune, the Seigneur of Bartaulf, Vice Admirall of Guienne, had a great fight at Sea with diuers Pyrates, whose names were Blanquet, Gaillard, Trechou, and Panteville, who commonly retired themselves into the Islands, and about Rochel, being resolved to make themselves masters of the mouth of Garonne, and to rob all Ships that went and came to Bourdeaux. Hauing drawne together foure Ships, and foule great Pinaces, with the which they lay in the mouth of the Riuer neere vnto Royan, where they began to molest all passengers. The Parliament of Bourdeaux being informed hereof, they sent to the Marquis of Aubeterre, Gouernor of Blay, and to Candely Gouernor of Royan, to summon them to serue the King against these Pyrates: finding them well disposed, they fought to speake with Blanquet, but could not. Whereupon they went to Rochel, where the Mayor and Sheriifes protested they were very sory that Blanquet Ships had bene rigged in their Haueu; notwithstanding, they were ready to serue the King against him and his adherents: And withall they sent one of their Sheriifes with Letters of credit both from the Towne and the Princeesse Dowager of Conde, (who was then there) to draw him to his duty, hauing in his company Laumont an Exempt of the Scottish Guard. Being aboard Blanquet Ship, Laumont commanded him to cease his exactions, and to retire himselfe speedily, deliuering him also a Letter from the first President of Bourdeaux, full of good admonitions: But Blanquet answer and his companions F was full of contempt against the King, his Iustice, and the Mayor and Sheriifes of Rochel, vsing also great threats against the towne of Bourdeaux. Laumont hauing made his report at Bourdeaux, the businesse was propounded in Parliament in the presence of the D. of Elperton and the Marshall of Roqueleure, where it was resolved, that they should speedily arme some ships to set vpon these Pyrates, and that the charge should be given to Bartaulf, Vice Admirall of Guienne. Whereupon he made choice of nine Ships and Pinaces, which being armed, manned, and victualled, they fell downe before the Towne of Blay.

A Blay. Hauing receiued directions from their Admirall, as well for the fight as for the conduct of 150 great Merchants Ships which followed them to be defended from those Pyrates, they set saile towards the Port of Royan, right against the which Blanquet lay with foure Ships and foure great Pinaces: who perceiving that they made towards them, weighed Anchor and put to Sea; the Vice Admirall still following them, vntill the night approaching, and a tempest, forced him to cast Anchor.

On the eight of Iune, the Vice Admirall hauing conducted the Merchants nine or ten Leagues into the Sea, and hearing that Blanquet with his Ships had gotten into the Riuer of Sudre, which was of hard access, and dangerous for great Ships; hee thought they could not now auoid the Combat. Whereupon he called for the Pilots, employing them which had most frequented that Riuer to make the way, when as suddenly the winde and tyde were fauourable vnto them, so as within a short space, the Pyrates discovered the Kings Fleet coming towards them with full sayles, whereupon they cut their Cables, and hoysed vp sayles to get to Sea: But Blanquet Ship, which was the first, fell presently aground, not being able to recouer the Current by reason of the violence of the winde. Three others being about a Cannon shot off had the like fortune. These bad beginnings amazed some of their Souldiers and Mariners, so as they sought to saue themselves by swimming, and in their Boats. Blanquet, on the other side (thinking that the Vice Admirall would also runne aground, or cast Anchor, for that he could not come neere him by reason of the contrary winde, and shallownesse of the water) prepared himselfe courageously to fight: and hauing giuen order for all things, hee shewed himselfe armed in the fore-castle. The Vice Admirall cast Anchor neere vnto him; there were two other Ships came within Cannon shot to set vpon the other Ships which were runne on ground, and presently the rest of the Fleet followed to charge those they found in front. The Vice Admirall set vpon Blanquet, and came within twenty paces of him, but could approach no nearer, lest he should haue runne on ground: The fight was very furious for aboute an houres space: in the end, the Vice Admirall sent a Captaine with some souldiers to board Blanquet, the which they performed resolutely, notwithstanding his great resistance; where he was taken, being hurt in the left arme with a splinter, with fixteene of his men, D where were left vnslaine, being all caried to the Vice Admirals Ship, Gaillard, one of the Pyrate Capitaines, was taken at Land flying away, and caryed backe to the Vice Admirall: All their Ships and Pinaces were taken, being abandoned by their men, onely two got to sea.

After this, the Vice Admirall returned in triumph to Bourdeaux, with his prisoners, and fix Vessels more then hee caried forth. The Court of Parliament fell presently to worke about their proceffe, and in the end Blanquet and Gaillard were broken vpon the wheele, and their heads set vpon the Towers next to the Port, and fixteene Mariners were hanged.

About this time, the Clergy of France made their ordinary assembly at the Augustins in Paris, which they vsually doe every two yeares. The Bishop of Malcon, one of the Deputies, made an Oration vnto the King on the second of Iune, in the presence of many Princes, Dukes, Councillors, and Officers of State, which comprehended two complaints. 1. He made relation of the grieuances of the Catholics of Montpellier: and 2. hee insisted vpon the restoring of the Romish religion in the Souerainity of Bearne. Touching the first, hee sayd, That the Bishop of Montpellier desiring to reforme a small Couent of Iacobins, and to bring in good men of that Order, with the approbation of their Generall, and the authority of the Court of Parliament: The inhabitants of the Towne not onely opposed themselves, but also thrust out those which liued before in the Couent. In like manner that about the same time, the Bishop hauing (according to the duty of his charge) F provided famous Preachers for the Catholics in that towne for the time of Lent, they would not suffer them to enter, notwithstanding a Decree of his Councill, and the commandement of the Gouernour of the Province, tending to a manifest disobedience. Secondly, that in Bearne they had deprived the Catholics of the exercise of their religion, & of their Churches: that they had dispossessed the Clergy of all their goods, & had employed them to the entertainment of Ministers, pensioners of Schollers, & profane vses. Whereupon there was a Decree made in the Kings Councill, Iune 15. by the which the free exercise of the Romish Religion was restored in all the Townes, Borowes, and Villages of Bearne, and and the Clergy-men as well secular as regular, within the sayd Country, had a full release of all their Goods, Lands, Seigneuries, Tythes, Rents, Renennues, and other Rights of what nature soever, being in his Maiesties hands, without refection or exception. And in like manner he did maintaine his subiects of that Country, making profession of the reformed Religion, in the exercise thereof, and of all that depends thereon, as well for the entertainment of Ministers, Colledges, Professors, Regents, Schollers, and Poore, as for their Wages, Pensions, Almes, and Ecclesiasticall Discipline: all which being at this present assigned vpon the Reuennues of the Clergy, his Maiesty doth assigne vpon the clearest Reuennues of his Demaines, as well of the Country of Bearne, as of other Duchies, Earledomes, and Seigneuries formerly re-venited thereunto.

made by the Clergy to the
King.

At the dissolving of this Assembly of the Clergy, they being accustomed to take their leave of the King before they separate themselves, and to make their Remonstrances of the disorders which might have crept into the Church; the Bishop of Ayre was deputed among other to make this Speech vnto the King.

1 Complaint.

His first complaint was against that detestable butchery (as he termed it) that infernall law of cursed Duels, which France baptized (in imitation of the Pagans) with the name of honour; but in truth, and according to the iudgement of God and his Angels, it was a rage and madness of men, the shame, contempt, and mockery of Christianity, of the Sauour of Kings, and of Diuinity it selfe. Having discoursed long vpon this subiect, hee entreated his Maiesty to giue him leave to continue his speech with as much liberty as he brought verity, loue, and fidelity. These wretches, (said he) who like enraged Lyons teare one another in pieces in Duels, sinne but once; they are onely guilty of their owne crimes; but your Maiesty (who is bound to hinder all, and to punish all) if you faile in this duty, you sinne alone with all; you make your selfe culpable for all; and will draw vpon you alone (if you doe not prevent it) a burthen of the iustice and vengeance of God, insupportable to an hundred thousand, and whose waight doth crush downe and ruine eternally. That the Church demanded not the law, but the execution of it; not by threats, but by punishment; not by a prescription which doth the sick no good, but by some wholesome letting of blood, which will stanch this flux of blood in your Estate.

1 Complaint.

The second complaint of the Church, was, That whereas his Maiesty was bound to giue D them Fathers, hegaue them Children: That the name of Abbot signified Father, and that a Bishop required more care, wisdom, affection, and fatherly authority: That notwithstanding, France was filled with Bishops and Abbots, which are yet in their Nurses armes, or vnder Regents in Colledges. Nay more, the abuse goes before their being; they are Fathers before they be Children, Abbots before they are borne, they know not yet whether they be males or females, and yet all the world knows they are crowned with Miters: monstrous Hermaphrodites, not onely against the law of Nature, but euen against God, the Author of Nature, which it befores your Maiesty to prevent.

3 Complaint.

That secular and lay Penfions approached neere to this sacrilegious disorder: it is a Tribute which the Church payeth (saith he) to the world which persecuteth it, and is sworne enemy to his Epouise: it is that cursed ranfome which doth evidently denote her captiuitie; and yet, contrary to the nature of a ranfome, doth not deliuer her. And that which most afflicts vs, Sir, is this, That others hauing the profit, your Maiesty is like to pay the interest, at that day when nothing will be remitted, and that the inexorable Iudge will make the mightiest Monarches of the world to tremble with the feare and horror of a punishment a thousand times greater then death it selfe.

4 Complaint.

That the Soueraigne Courts by their Decrees attempted vpon the authority which was committed to the Clergy, in that which concerned Ecclesiasticall Discipline, and the government of the Church.

The Baron of Quemadeuc beheaded at Paris.

We haue formerly made mention, how that the Baron of Quemadeuc, Governor of Fougères in Britany, had slaine the Baron of Neuet at Rennes during the Assembly of the Estates, for the which he was forced to goe to Paris to iustifie himselfe in Court, and to deliuer the Castle of Fougères into the hands of an Exempt of the Kings Guard, who during his absence, should exercise his charge of Governor. Now whether it were that he doubted of this cause, or for some other designe; in the Month of Iune, this Quemadeuc parted from Paris, and went into Britanie, and surpris'd the Castle of Fougères, making himselfe again master thereof. As soon as the King heard hereof, he commanded the D.

A of Vendosme and the Marshall of Vitry, to repaire with all speed thither before Quemadeuc might be aware thereof, which charge they so affectionately performed, as they found him rather dreaming on what he had done, then on what he had to doe. Hee excused himselfe vnto them; and they promised him to employ their credits to restore him to his Maiesties fauour. They brought him through Normandy to Paris, where he was committed to prison, and his proccesse made, by which he was condemned of treason, and of the murders committed vpon the Baron of Neuet, and of the Senechal of Chastillon in Vandelois, with other crimes. He was executed accordingly, notwithstanding all the suit made by his friends and his wife, who cast her selfe at his Maiesties feet to craue his pardon: but the King answered her, It is Iustice which makes Kings to reigne, I owe it to my subiects, and in this case I must preferre Iustice before Mercy: as for his goods which are confiscate vnto me, I giue them you.

The warre continued still betweene the King of Spaine and the Duke of Sauoy, notwithstanding all the Propositions of peace which had bene made in the end of the last ycare, by the Popes Legate and the Ambassador of France. In the beginning of the ycare the Spaniard had but ill successe; for the Prince of Piedmont had taken two Townes from the Prince of Masseran, a partisan to the Spaniard, and had defeated some of their best troops in the Valley of Sczia: and on the other side, towards Monterrat, the Duke of Sauoy, with the assistance of the Marshall D'Esquigues, tooke Saint Damian, Garennes, and Albe. Yet the Governour of Millane seemed more inclined to warre then peace. He leauied men in all places, and made great preparations to enter the Duke of Sauoyes Country in the Spring. At that time there was an aduce made by a Spaniard vnto his Catholicke Maiesty, touching the means of making a peace with the D. of Sauoy, wherein he set downe many reasons for the continuance of the warre; and in the end concludes, That if the D. of Sauoy doth not deliuer for caution and assurance of the peace, the Forts of his Country, by the which he may attempt vpon the Duchy of Millane, and doth not put them into the hands of his Catholicke Maiesty, a peace could not be made: That no assurance could be giuen but those Forts, notwithstanding all that the Popes Nuncios did propound: But they should continue the warre, and not attend vntill the French King came of age, or that the Duke of Sauoy had provided for the defence of his Countries: That about all things he should consider, what an opportunity was now offered him to make his way to the Imperiall Monarchy, and how fitly God had diuerted the Councils of King Henry the fourth: That France was now governed by a woman, Italy wisly out good Commanders; Germany full of dissensions; the Turke so weakened by his wars in the East; finally, all things were so impaired and confused, as there was not any one able to resist the power of the Catholicke King.

Continuation of the warre
in Sauoy.An aduice giuen to the Catholicke King
touching the peace with Sauoy.

It seemed this ycare in the Spring, that things would succed fauourably according to the desire of Don Pedro de Toledo, Governour of Millane, against the Duke of Sauoy, the Marshall D'Esquigues being returned into D'Auphiné, and the Ciuill wars so kindled in France, as his Highnesse of Sauoy could expect little helpe from thence: so as Don Pedro hoped to take two of the goodliest places belonging to the Duke, Verfel vp6 Seiza, which is a frontier to Millane; and Aste towards Monterrat. Verfel was speedily besieged with 16000 foot, and 4000 horse, and 32 Peeeces of Battery; and on the 25 of Iuly, they yielded vpon honorable conditions. The Duke of Sauoy seeing so powerfull an enemy in his Estate, who sought to take from him his best places, he sent to all the Kings, Princes, and Common-weales his allies, to be assisted with men: but he found not any one in case to doe it but the French King. After the death of the Marshall D'Auere, his Maiesty during the Month of May, was busie in discharging of the troops, as well French and Liegeois, as Germanes, which had bene leauied by either party; retaining onely one Regiment of F Lancoknets, which the Queene Mother had caused to be leauied by the Duke of Schomberg, his Maiesty resoluing to send them into Sauoy, and therefore he commanded the Marshall D'Esquigues to ioyne his Forces with them, and to passe the mountains speedily. In August the Marshall with the Duke of Rohan, the Earles of Candale and Schomberg, Marquis de Termes, and many of the French Nobility, with their troops came into Piedmont, who being ioynd with the D. of Sauoyes Forces, they set vpon Felizan, in the which were 2000 Germans of the Spaniards army lodged, which they forced and slew, or took all that were in it that bare armes. After which the Sauoyards took Nones and Barceus which 1617 which was abandoned by the Spaniards, Lombards, Neopolitanes and Suisses: which A being perceived by some of the Scouts of the Army, they were pursued by the French Carabins, who ouertooke them: where after some small resistance, they yielded. After these exploits, the Duke with the Marshall returned to Asse, from whence they sent these newes to Paris:

Wee haue defeated in sixe dayes five thousand of the best men the Spaniard had in his army, some of which were slaine, others taken prisoners, and the rest sent home to their houses: in this short space we haue also gotten fiftene Ensignes, and one Cornet, hauing forced five places, conquered many Borowghes, with a large extent of the Country, and by this meanes deliuered the Towne of Asse from a siege which threatened the totall ruine B thereof, and many Citadels and places of strength, which did greatly annoy it.

The King hauing taken vpon him the government of his Estate, desiring to bee assured of him that should haue the keeping of the Prince of Conde, this yeare in May hee committed him to the guard of the Baron of Perlan, brother in law to the Marshall of Virry, with the command of the Bastille. The Princeesse of Conde besought the King she might see her husband, and liue with him, the which his Maiesty granted: which act of hers was much commended, and God so blest her, as soone after her coming thither, shee grew with child; the which did much ease the Princes griefe for his detention.

On the 15 of September, they were both conducted vnto Bois de Vincennes, still vnder the guard of the Baron of Perlan, who commanded in the dungeon where they were lodged, a farre better ayre then the Bastille. This change of lodging did much please them, the Lady hoping that she should be more conveniently lodged at her lying in: but she was deliuered before her time of a sonne still borne, which did much afflict them.

In October the King sent forth his Letters for the assembling of the most famous Personages of France, as well of the Clergy as of the Nobility, and the Officers of his Parliaments, by their aduice to prouide for the Remonstrances and Grievances exhibited by the generall Estates assembled in the yeare 1615, which had not bene yet done, by reason of his voyage into Guienne, and the alterations which followed: To settle an order in his Councils; and the managing of his Treasure: The reformation of the abuses which were crept into all the orders of the Realme: and generally touching all which should D be found necessary and expedient for the good and ease of his subiects, the safety of his Estate, the honour and dignitie of his Crowne, and the sealing of a firme peace within his Kingdomes.

And to the end this holy worke might bee more famous and commendable, he commanded all the Princes, Cardinals, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of his Crowne, to be there present, to heare their aduice touching that which should be presented by the Assembly, protesting before God, that he had no other end but his honour, and the good and ease of his subiects: coniuuring those hee should call, and commanding them expressely, that without any other respect, feare, or desire, to please or displease any man, they should with all freedom and sincerity, giue those Counsels which they held in their consciences to be most wholesome and contentient for the good of the Commonwealth.

About the end of Nouember, the King came from the Castle of Gaillon (where he had spent some time in hunting) to Rouen, the Assembly beginning the fourth of December in the Archbishops Palace: This Assembly was very flatly, where there assisted all the prime men of the Kingdom of all degrees. At the beginning there were two speeches made; his Maiesties was short; but in royall termes, vpon the content hee had, hoping that this Assembly would giue him Counsels profitable both for himselfe and his Estate: commanding the Chancellor to deliuer his pleasure more at large, the which he performed with so fluent a discourse, as the whole Assembly (wherein were the greatest Personages and the best speakers of France) gaue him this commendations, that hee could F both doe well and speake well.

The Assembly beganne five dayes after, during the which his Maiesties caused this Act to be made: First, The nomination of those which hee would haue to preside the said Assembly. Secondly, His pleasure vpon the strife arising betwene the chiefe of the Parliaments and the Nobility, about their places. Thirdly, By whom the Propositions should be exhibited to the Assembly. And fourthly, The forme which should be observed in deliuering their opinions.

His

A His Maiesty for many good considerations importing the good of his seruice, established the Duke of Aniou, his onely Brother, President in this Assembly, the more to honor it, ioyning with him the Cardinals of Perron, and Roch-Foucault, the Duke of Montbazon, and the Earle of Briffac Marshall of France. That the Propositions which should be made in the Assembly, should be presented in writing vnto Monsieur, or his Adjuncts, by the Proctor generall of the Parliament of Paris. That in matters which should bee propounded touching the Clergy, the Presidents should cause them of the Clergy to deliuer their opinions first, and such as they should thinke fit for the opening of that business. That in that which concerned the Nobility, the Nobles should first speake. And B in matters of Iustice, the Officers and others of that ranke should first giue their aduice. As for the Treasure, the Chambers of Accompt, and Court of Ayds should be first heard. There was some question about their sitting: the Nobility saying, that they were the second Member of the State: That their seats ought to be right against the Clergy, and that the Presidents of Parliaments were but to represent the third Estate. Whereunto they answered, That it was no Assembly of the Generall Estates: That they were sent for by his Maiesty to giue their aduice touching the Propositions hee desired to make: That they were no Deputies of the Prouinces to the Estates; neither were they euer deputed to the generall Estates; and whensoever they assisted at the beginning or ending thereof, it was in quality of Councillors of State: That there was no reason the Nobility should precede, they hauing iurisdiction ouer them.

The Nobility not satisfied with this Act, procured Letters Patents from the King, by which hee declared, That moued with the good affection which hee had alwayes borne vnto his Nobility (whom hee knew to be his right arme) his intention was not in this Conuocation to hold an Assembly of the Estates: That hee had appointed them their seat about his person, and of those whom hee had appointed to preside in the said Assembly, as most honourable and fit for the action: as well at the beginning of the said Assembly, as the continuation, without any prejudice to that which had alwayes belonged vnto them in the generall Estates, that is, the second place next to the Clergy, the which hee would haue maintained.

D On either side of the Presidents of the Assembly sat the Nobles, being thirteene Gentlemen of speciall note, chosen for their wisdomes. There were eleuen of the Clergie in their places, whereof foure were Archbishops, the other Bishops: and lastly, sat the Heads of Parliaments, there being two Presidents of Paris, with the first Presidents of Tholouse, Grenoble, Disjon, Rouen, Aix, and Rennes, with the Proctors generall of the said Parliaments: beneath them on the right hand, were the Presidents of the Chambers of Accompts of Paris and Rouen, with their Proctors generall: and on the left hand, the Lieutenant Ciuill of the Viscountie of Paris: Behind the Presidents of Parliaments, were the Presidents of the Courts of Ayds of Paris and Rouen, with their Proctors; with the Prouost of Merchants of Paris. He that was chosen by the King to be Register E of the Assembly, had his place in the middell. President Jannin Super-Intendant of the Treasure, with the foure Intendants, coming twice into this Assembly, tooke their places directly before the Register. Monsieur de Rhodes, Great Master of the Ceremonies, stood behinde the Presidents. Behind Monsieur Chair, and a little more retired then the seat of the Nobility, stood his Gouverneur, the Captaine of his Guard, his under Gouuerneur and Secretary. This was the order obserued in this Assembly touching their sitting.

The Assembly hauing giuen his Maiesty thanks for their election, and for his religious intentions, they proceeded to their Propositions. The first was touching the managing of the secret affaires of State, which could not bee divulged without great prejudice to the crowne. Although the King in his Maternity may, like vnto his Predecessors, commit the managing to whom hee pleareth; yet his desire had bene to giue the greatest part to the Princes and great Personages of his Realme: whereby many difficulties had risen.

First, the great number of those of that quality, whereof no one thought to be excluded; and yet in this great number, secrecy (so necessary in affaires) could not be kept; and the multitude of opinions would cause delays and confusion. Secondly, that the difficulties which were growne among the great men of the Realme were such, as there had been no means for them to sit in Councell together.

Thirdly, that it did seldom happen but the aduertisements which came from within or without the Realme, concerned the interest of some one of this great number.

Fourthly, That so many Princes and great Personages which could not giue their necessary attendance, by reason of their Governments, Charges, and particular Affaires, the managing of the State would bee interrupted. That for these reasons his Maiesty had bene forced to leaue the managing of affaires to those Ministers whom his deceased Father had employed. Notwithstanding, causing all dispatches, aduertisements, instructions, and resolutions, to be daily read in his presence, and of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne: they haue free liberty to assist in his Councils, and to B participate in the affaires which were there treated.

And for that his Maiesty desired to giue vnto the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, all the honour and respect which might bee in the Government of the State, and managing of his affaires; His pleasure was, the Assembly should aduise if they could find out any better or more convenient means then that which hee had observed for the conduct of secret affaires: whereby without interest of the State, and prejudice to his Maiesties seruice, he might satisfie the desire of private men.

The Assembly humbly thanked the King, that it had pleased his Maiesty to demand their aduice vpon so important a businesse, which wholly depended vpon his pleasure. Notwithstanding, to obey his commandement, the Assembly was of opinion, that they C could not giue him better aduice, then to continue (if it were his pleasure) the same order hee now held in the managing of his secret affaires, and by the aduice and counsell of the same persons which were employed. There were in all twenty Propositions deliuered vnto them: but because they are very long, and would take vp too much roome in this briefe Continuation, I must entreat the Reader to rest satisfied with the Heads of them.

The second was for an order and reformation of the Council, concerning causes which were litigious, and of the Council of affaires. 3. What persons should haue place and voyce in his Councils. Of the Decrees of the Council. That Decrees in Soueraigne Courts should not be reuoked. 4. Of the Council of State and Treasure; wherein D they should treat of breaches of the Edicts: Petitions concerning the affaires of the Clergy: Differences which should happen for Offices: A Iudication of Farmes, Bridges, and publicke Workes: Abatements and Diminutions: Orders for the refreshing of Munitions in Frontier places: Petitions for the leauying of Money, Taxes, and Rents of Farmes. 5. What should be treated of in his Pruiue Council, as Petitions, Reuocations: and for the ordering of Iudges in matres of question, concerning their Iurisdiction Requests against the Decrees of the Council, and opposition to the expedition of Letters of Prouision for Offices. That Differences for Benefices in the Kings Nomination, should be sent to the Grand Council. Of the charge of Masters of Requests. Of the Council of Warre: and the preheminence of the Marshals of France in the sayd E Council. 6. Reduction of the Expences of the Kings House, and of the entertainment of men of Warre. 7. Cutting off of Pensions, and the suppression of Treasurers of Pensions. 8. Of the exemption of Taxes, and of Letters of ennobling. That the King should forbear to giue any great gifts in present money, but reward seruices done, with Offices and other Charges which were in his disposition. 9. That it should be prohibited to sell any Offices or Places in the Kings House, in the Warre, or Governments. 10. Of the Reuerfions of Charges, Offices, and Benefices, and of the reuoking of the said Reuerfions. 11. Of the meanes to settle Monasteries and Abbies, and that they may be hereafter supplied with Religious men, and no Commendatories. 12. Of simple and rural Priories, which haue no charge of Soules, depending on Abbies and other Monasteries, and held by men most commonly, vnprofitable for the seruice of GOD, who by Resignations, made them benedictary to their Houses. 13. That the Pope should bee entreated not to receive the Resignation of any of the said Priories, and to ordaine, that when any fell voyd, they should bee re-vnted vnto the Monasteries whereon they depended. 14. To haue the Ordinances observed, touching Artillery, Armes, and Munition; but, That none should arme either by Sea or Land; without Letters signed by a Secretary of State; and in that which concerned

A concerned any Land-seruice by the Gouvernours of Prouinces; for the Sea, by the Admirals of France. 16. Not to communicate with foraine Ambassadors without the Kings permission. 17. Of the disorders in Commitments, the which are Letters of priuledge, which the Kings seruants and others of the Infants of France obtaine, to call any one from the remotest places of the Kingdome, to come and plead before the Masters of the Requests. 18. Of the alliances and kindreds which are crept, contrarie to the Ordinances, into Parliaments and Soueraigne Courts. 19. Of the meanes to prevent the oppressions which are committed by some, as well in Soueraigne as Presidiall Courts. 20. To reuoke the Paulette or Annuall right, and to take away the sale of Offices. The aduice of the B assembly to these Propositions, was given on the 26 of December 1617.

During this assembly at Rouen, Monsieur de Villery died, being 74. yeares old; a great Personage said, all the griefe we haue for his death is, that we finde not written in our bookes what he know. He was made Secretarie of State by King Charles the ninth, in the year 1566. And it may be said, that during the space of fifty and three yeares, there were not any affaires in France, no treaties of Peace, Alliances, Mariages, or Reunions, wherein he employed not himselfe with such dexterity, as the foure Kings which he had serued, had giuen him great commendations. And King Henry the Great was wont to say of him, that the affaires of France, were the affaires of Monsieur de Villery. That hee laboured continually, and was neuer weary of well-doing. I know not, said this great King C (when as in the year 1605, they brought him word that Monsieur de Villery was sicke) which of the two liues were more necessarie for my Estate, either mine or Monsieur de Villerys.

The last yeare the King had bene aduised to vnite the Soueraigntie of Bearne to the Crowne of France. Whereupon they of the reformed Religion in the said Countrie, vnder the name of the generall Estates of Bearne, called extraordinarily together in the Towne of Pau, on the second of February 1617, caused a Decree to bee published, by the which they pretended, That the Countrie of Bearne was a Soueraigne Seigneurie, distinct from any other Soueraigntie or Realme, and that the Inhabitants thereof, who in the beginning gouerned themselves by their Lawes and Customes, did make choice of their Lords to bee continued in the same, they hauing no power to change, correct, or reforme them, but with the consent of the States of the said countrie. And that therefore his said Maiesty cannot (vnder correction) vnite the said Countrie vnto the Kingdome of France, without the consent of the said States, without infringing the principall marke and ground of the said Lawes and Liberties, which are dearer vnto them then their owne liues. That the said Estates may not transcribe vnto posteritie so fundamentall a change of State; as that which should happen by the said vnion, which was reprobued by the deceased King Henry the Great of famous memory, when he made the vnion of the ancient Demesnes vnto the Kingdome of France. Therefore the said Estates doe giue expresse charge vnto their Sindics to oppose themselves to all dispatches and Letters Patents which should bee sent, E and all Acts made in the Countrie for the establishment of the said vnion. That there should be deputed certaine of both Estates to aduise of some remedies, and to vphold these oppositions, and if need were to demand a generall assembly of the States to provide for the same. And that the said Estates taking leaue of Monsieur de la Forie the Kings Lieutenant generall, should report vnto him the aforesaid busines, beseeching him to giue aduice thereof vnto his Maiesty, as of a matter much importing his seruice. This Decree was signed as well by the Nobilitie, as the second Estate, in their assembly, the second of February 1617. Some write that this Decree was an enterprise vpon the Kings Soueraigntie in Bearne, vnder the name of States, which neither had nor could haue any Iurisdiction or power to make a Decree; and that it showed the bad intentions F of such (as being faile from the Court) endeavored to stirre vp troubles vnder pretence of Religion. And Monsieur de Villery before made mention of the Kings Decree, for the establishment of the Romane Catholique Religion in Bearne, and touching the restitution of Ecclesiasticall goods: And how the King before he made the said Edict, had written vnto the Ministers of the reformed Churches of Bearne, to send their Deputies to the Court to see the proceedings for the restoring of the Ecclesiasticall relienues, whereof his Maiesty had made graunt. they had a very great assembly at Orthes, in July, where it was resolved, That it was better to dye then to receive the said Graunt, and make restitution of the Ecclesiasticall goods, which would ruine the Religion & State of Bearn. That in this assembly it was decreed to send vnto the King the Seigneur de L'Escun, to beseech him in the name of the Churches, to permit, that the Deputies (required by his Maiestie, to see the proceeding of the reestablishment) might be chosen by an Assembly of the three Estates of Bearn, and the Deputies of the reformed Churches of the Prouinces of high Languedoc, & low Guienne. That being come to Court, and hauing taken by the way at Rochel, the Maior & Sherifes Letters to present vnto his Maiestie, He had audience at Saint Germanes in Lay, the seuenteenth of September. The said Apologie, faith also, that Monsieur de la Force, as Gouernour of Bearn brought him in, and that the general Deputies of the reformed Churches of France, which accompanied him in this audience, said vnto the King: That if the other Prouinces might haue assembled without offence to his Maiestie, as those of Rochel, they would haue presented Letters from all of them, beseeching his Maiestie to giue audience to Monsieur de L'Escun; who hauing done his obeisance, spake thus vnto his Maiestie.

to the King.

Sir, the Lawes and customes of men differ one from another. But it hath bin alwayes honorable for every country to obserue their owne: whereof your subiects of Bearn haue bene more carefull then any other. And they haue had this particular fauour from heauen; That for these three hundred yeares and more, that they haue been subiect vnto your Maiestie, and your Predecessors, their fundamentall lawes haue been religiously obserued, as no one of their Soueraigne Lords hath euer made any alteration in the State, without the aduice and request of all the orders of the State. To which end, your Maiestie hauing commanded by Letters to the Ministers and Ancients of the reformed Churches, of your soueraignie, to send Deputies to see the proceedings for the restitution of the goods of the Clergie, being desirous to yeeld the humble obedience which they owe vnto your commandements, without breach of the fundamentall lawes of the Estate, vnder which they are borne and bred; they haue giuen mee charge to cast my selfe at your Maiesties feet, humbly to beseech you, that it would please you, that the deputation may be made by an Assembly of the Deputies of all the Orders of the Estate, together with them of the reformed Churches of high Languedoc, and base Guienne; seeing that by your Maiesties permission they treat their affaires ioyntly with them. And for that there were certaine Petitions, presented vnto your Maiestie and Councell the last yeare which are vnanswered, they humbly beseech you, that you would bee pleased to vouchsafe them your accustomed iustice; and especially, touching a Petition, whereby your Maiestie was intreated to command, that information might be made against the Authors of a slanderous Libell, called the Monke, very prejudiciall to the safety of your Sacred Person, and the rights of your Soueraignie, the which they seeke to make subiect to the Realme of Arragon; whereby your Petitioners apprehend, that they will in time make them subiect to the rigour of the inquisition of Spaine, and draw them from the mildnes of your naturall subiection and obedience, to captiuate them vnder the yoke of a foraine command, then the which they had rather endure a thousand deaths. For the preuening of which danger, they humbly beseech your Maiestie to allow of their supplication, and they will continue their vowes and prayers to God, for your health, prosperitie and long life. To whom the King made answer, I haue understood you well; I will conferre with my Councell, and you shall haue my answer.

The Kings
Edict for the restoring of the Clergie of Bearn.

Soone after in September, the King made an Edict, for the settling of the Romish religion in Bearn, and the restitution of the Church-livings, the which they shall freely enjoy; from the Feast of the Purification in the yeare 1618, from which time his Maiestie should bee freed and discharged of the summe of 2400 pound sterling yearly, and other summes, graces, and benefits, wherewith he had gratified them by way of annuall pension, commanding Arthus de Farns, his Gouernour and Lieutenant general in his Realme of Nauarre and Soueraignie of Bearn, to see the execution of his will effected: yet not meaning in any sort to alter or diminish the graces and fauours which his deceased Lord and Father, and himselfe had conferred vpon his subiects inhabiting the said Soueraignie, of what quality of condition soeuer, which were paid their wages, appointments, pensions, or gratifications, out of the reuenues of the said Clergie.

The

A The Seigneur de L'Escun and his fellow Deputies, hearing that this Edict was concluded and adrawing, they presently advertised the reformed Churches of Bearn, who in the name of the Estates made a Decree on the tenth of Nouember, by the which they concluded, that the Graunt of the restitution of the Clergies Lands, caused many grieuances against the liberties of the Country. Wherefore in case the prouisions for the said restitution should be presented, or any Commislarie, or other sent to proceed to the execution, they should aduise of the remedies, whereby they might make their opposition, and obtaine reparation of the wrong done by the Graunt thereof against their Lawes and Liberties. Notwithstanding, the Edict of restitution was verified in the Parliaments of B Thoulouse and Bourdeaux in December following.

But for that the Ministers complained, that his Maiestie had assigned their pensions out of the Countrie of Bearn, although that by the Decree of restitution, the Demefnes of Bearn were expressly mentioned: vpon a Proposition made in the Councell of Nauarre, by the Seigneur of Plessis Moray, the King being present, it was decreed, that for as much as in the Edict of restitution, there was no mention made of the Demefnes and Reuenues of Bearn, which were more then sufficient to free the said charges, which amounted yearly to the summe of seuen thousand and eight hundred pound sterling: And to the end that they who had the interest, should not doubt of his Maiesties goodwill and meaning, that they should bee duly paid their wages, pensions, appointments, and entertainments, which were formerly assigned vpon the Church-lands, should bee hereafter payed, out of all the Reuenues ordinarie, and extraordinarie, as well of the Demefnes of Bearn, as of those which his Maiestie had already affected by his Edict of restitution, the which should not be diuerted by himselfe or his successors to their prejudice, vpon any colour or pretext whatsoever.

The Kings
Edict touching the Protestants of Bearn.

In the famous Assembly at Rouen, the two last Propositions were, touching the reuocation of the Annual right or Paulet, and the suppression of the Sale of Offices, which troubled the mindes of many Officers.

Proposition for the continuance of the Annual right, and sale of Offices.

There were many propositions made to the Kings Councell for the one and the other: To prove that this Annual right was profitable; they said, that the deceased King Henry D the Great had established it; & it had bin approved by all the orders of the State. That this right brought vnto his Maiestie 100000 pound sterling yearly. They pretended that it was necessarie, and that it had giuen the King affectionate Officers in these last alterations, and made them depend vpon him alone. That it supplied the place of other impositions, and was paid onely by the rich. That there was no inconuenience to exclude the poore from publique charges; neither was it necessarie that every vertuous man should be an Officer. That it was profitable for the King to haue rich Officers, whose wealth was a warrant of their wisdomes; and that they were alwayes enemies to Factions. That the sale of Offices had been forbidden: but all their Lawes had proued vnpromisable. That it had bin alwayes vsed in France. That the King could not know all vertuous men in his Kingdom, and that the expedient propounded, of a roll wherein all well deserving men should be written, was ridiculous, and an inuention of Courtiers. That the Annual right had made Officers grow old in their places, and gotten much experience. That to take away this Annual right, was to chase away the ancient Officers. That the children succeeding in their Fathers Offices, were also bound to succeed to their vertues. Many other reasons were produced touching this subiect. But all their propositions were rejected; and his Maiestie made a Decree, by the which he did reuoke for euer the dispensation of forty dayes, granted to many of his Officers; In paying the Annual right, wherunto they were taxed. Referring notwithstanding to acknowledge the vertue and merit of his Officers, who had discharged their places, with the reputation of integrity and sufficiency: If be it in their life time, by aduancing them to higher places; or after their deaths; In gratifying their Widowes and children, out of the price of their offices, in case they die before the forty dayes be expired. And touching the interdiction of the Sale of Offices, although his Maiestie had an intent to provide for it, holding it necessary for the publique good: notwithstanding, to gratifie his Officers, and to giue them some time to accommodate their affaires, and also to haue meanes to finde some grounds for his Maiestie to make good his casual reuenues: Hee was pleased to deferre the effect of the interdiction.

The Kings Decree for restoring the Iesuits to their publique Lectures.

We haue formerly made mention of the contestations between the Vniuersitie of Paris and the Iesuits; who required to be admitted to teach in their Colledge at Paris. For the which the generall Estates had bene suitors vnto the King. Whereupon, the matter being called in question before the Councell of State, there was a Decree past the fifteenth of February this year, in fauour of the Iesuits; by the which his Maiestie did call vnto himselfe and his Councell the instance depending in the Court of Parliament of Paris, betwixt the Iesuits on the one part, and the Rector, Deane, and Proctors of the Vniuersitie on the other, in regard of the said opposition. And hauing respect vnto the Petition of the States, and the publique interest; He ordained that the Iesuits should hereafter, make their publique Lectures in all sorts of sciences; and all other exercises of their profession in their Colledge of Clermont, as they had formerly done, and on such dayes and houres as shall be most convenient for their schollers; which Lectures his Maiesties meaning was, should be presently reestablished, without any opposition; with this Proviso, That they should obserue the rules of the Edict, and submit themselves to the Lawes and Orders of the Vniuersitie, as his Maiestie should ordaine. And his pleasure was, that the said Iesuits should be put in full possession of the said Lectures, by two Councillors and masters of Requests, or other Councillors of the Soueraigne Court, being first required by vertue of this Decree, and Letters of Commisision, who shall transport themselves vnto the places, notwithstanding any opposition, or appellation whatsoever; and if any hapned, his Maiestie reserved the knowledge thereof to himselfe and his Councell, forbidding all Courts to take notice thereof. This Decree was executed accordingly, and the Iesuits put in full possession of their Lectures.

The burning of the great Hall of the Palace at Paris.

On the tenth of March hapned that fearful fire of the great Hall of the Palace at Paris. About two of the clocke or more after midnight, the Sentinell at the Louure, next vnto the Riuer, saw as it were a circle of fire ouer the cowering of the Palace Hall. Soone after, the singing men of the holy Chappell, and some neighbours, by reason of a cry of fire which was made, saw this circle, which increased by little and little, and of the bignesse of a Hogsheed. The watchmen who ordinarily keepe the gate of the Palace Court was vp at midnight; they knocked at one of the Hall doores; they cryed our fire; but the House-keeper and his seruants being in their first sleepe heard nothing of all this.

About halfe an houre after, some singing men and Merchants, who came running at the cry, forced open a little doore neere vnto the holy Chappell, by which they entered into the little Hall, and from thence they got into the great, where they saw the fire onely in the top of the rooffe, and beneath in foure of the Merchants shops. By this time the Keeper and his seruants were awake, who came to open the gates. The winde being Southerly, the great rooffe which was of dry wood and varnished, fell suddenly on fire, and the girders and rafters began to fall vpon the shops; the Proctors seates, and the Chappell which was made of wood, and newly varnished; in the which there was aboue a hundred and fifty pound waight of Waxe-lights and Torches, which did so fire all the lower part of the Hall, as the Keeper had no leisure with his seruants to enter into his Houfe to saue his goods. The Merchants who came running to preferue what they had, were glad to retire for feare of the burning Timber which fell from the rooffe; about foure of the clocke the rooffe towards the Consultations fell, and soone after that of the midst, and about five of the clocke the rest towards the Prison.

Poliss the Register came running at this cry, and entered into his Office, by the Kings garden, and saued his bookes of Records, and what else was there, as likewise the Registers of the Treasure, and what belonged to the Kings Councell. In the meane time the first President, and Monsieur Seruin Aduocate generall, being lodged within the walls of the Palace, ordained what they thought fit to hinder the course of this fire. The Colonnell of that quarter put the Burgesses in Armes for feare of some disorder. The Fire continuing and caried by a fourtherly winde, fell vpon the lodging of the Requests of the Household, of the Register of the Treasure, of the first Chamber of the Inquests, and the others Court, all neere vnto the golden Chamber, which were burnt and consumed in lesse then halfe an houre. It rained still on, and got the passage towards the Mercers gallerie and Court of Aydes. Then began there a great and fearfull cry, as well of the Prisoners who would haue saved themselves by force, (but the Proctor generall caused the chiefe of them to be conducted to other Prisons by the Prouost) as by the Merchants who

caried

A caried away their goods, and cast their shops and stalles downe the staires, to take away all combustible matter. The Fire grew so violent, as it blew Slates ouer the Riuer of Seine, and the Tower of the great clocke was set on fire with a burning brand, the which was speedily recovered to saue the rest. Hauing vncouered those rooffes which were in danger of fire, they fell to quenching it; after which they caried away all the Timber & rubbish which lay in the Hall, lest it should endanger the vaults underneath.

The next day the Court assembling, they made a Decree concerning their Papers, Procefes, and Registers which were wanting, inioyning all men of what condition so euer, that had taken and caried any away, or found them by accident, or otherwise, to deliuer them presently vnto Iohn du Tillier, Register of the said Court, or to his Deputie, without any fraud or deceit. And withall, they did forbid all Merchants, Apothecaries, or others, to buy directly or indirectly, any Parchments or written Papers: but if any be brought them, to retaine them, and acquaint the Iustice therewith: They spake diuersly of the cause of this accident.

Some would haue it to proceede from some pan of coales shut vp in some of the Mercers shops. Others, say that it was the House-keepers fault, who negligently in fluting of the doores, had left the end of a Torch vpon a Mercers shop, whereby the rest were set on fire.

There had bene a Peace concluded in Italy, betwene the Archduke Ferdinand, and the Venecians; there rested nothing to settle a full peace in those parts; but the execution of the Treaties of Alte and Pavia, with the Sauoyard.

The Most Christian King who had undertaken the performance of these Treaties, sent Monsieur de Madene, to assist the Baron of Bethunes, to the end that all Townes and places taken on either side might be restored. But Don Pedro du Toledo made so many difficulties, and delays, as some write his Maiestie was forced to say vnto the Duke of Monteleon, Ambassador in France for the King of Spaine, The opinion which they haue giuen the King of Spaine your Master, that I cannot goe out of my Realme, but I shall leave it full of troubles and diuisions, is the cause of the delays of Don Pedro your brother in law, to content my cousin the Duke of Sauoy: but I will haue him know, that although my estate should bee abandoned to fire and sword in my absence; yet nothing shall hinder my resolution to passe the mountaines in person, to force Don Pedro to hold his word with me, and to performe the promise which I haue made to the Duke of Sauoy.

After many journeys, according to the Treatie of Pavia, the Duke of Sauoy, beganne first to restore the places which he held from the Duke of Mantua, and the Prince of Masseran. And then Don Pedro deliuered to him, Saint German and Onegle. These restitutiones and others were made by degrees. And on the fifteenth of Iune, Verceil, the most important of all was restored to the Duke of Sauoy.

After this, his Highnes began first to send backe his Prisoners with Passports, and an honorable conuoy; some to Felizan, and others neere vnto Millan; as Don Pedro's Nephew, and the sonne of Don Iohn de Viues, Ambassador for his Catholique Maiestie in Italy: And then Don Pedro did the like. So as there remained nothing for a full execution of the Peace, but a publication for the restitution of priuate mens goods, which had serued either party: the which the Duke of Sauoy performed accordingly on the eighth of Iuly. After which, the like was performed in the Duchy of Millane, and in Monterrat: So as the Peace was fully settled in Italy.

It is written, that on the fourteenth of February this year: The Lord Chancellor dismissed the Seigneur of L'Escun, Councillor in the Court of Parliament of Pau, and Deputie for the reformed Churches of Bearne, in the presence of the generall Deputies of the reformed Churches of France, and the particular Deputies of base Languedoc. Telling him in the Kings name, that his Maiesties pleasure was they should not make any assemblies within his country of Bearne, to those ends which were mentioned in their Petition of the seuenteenth of September; That is to say, That the Deputies desired by his Maiestie to see the proceeding in the restitution of the Church-lands, should bee chosen by an Assembly of three Estates of Bearne, and the Deputies of the reformed Churches of high Languedoc, and base Guenne.

The reformed Churches of Bearne being assembled at Pau, received Letters from L'Escun of his dismissal. Whereupon the States being at that time assembled in the same same towne, resolved to call the Deputies of the Councils of three Prouinces of France A next adioyning to Bearne, that is to say, high and bafe Languedoc, and bafe Guienne, to meet at Castil. Laloux on the first of May.

Forbidden by
the King.

The King aduertised of this Conuocation, sent Letters to the Parliament of Bourdeaux, and the Chamber of the Edict at Nerac to proceed against the Authors thereof, and against all such as should assit them, as breakers of the Edict, and troublers of the publike peace. So as the Gouvernour and Consuls of Castil-laloux, and such as had the command of other Townes in Guienne for them of the Religion, refused the holding of the same assembly.

The Kings
Declaration
against the Assembly at Orthes.

The Deputies of Bearne & they of bafe Guienne, and high Languedoc, being come to B the place appointed on the first of May, and seeing the refusal was made to hold the Assembly, they went to Tonnus, where they had the like dismissal. Hereupon they consulted together, and resolved to goe to Orthes in Bearne, on the five and twentieth of May, and there to hold their Assembly with all libertie, taking an oath amongst them, not to speake any thing vntill the day. His Maiestie being aduertised that they had assigned their assembly out of the Iurisdiction of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, hee made another Declaration, verified in the Court of Parliament at Paris, on the five and twentieth of May, and in the Chamber of Cistres, commanding all Iudges to proceed against them, which should be found the Authors, and which should assit at the said assembly in Bearne, and in all other assemblies forbidden by the Edicts, as breakers thereof, and troublers of the C publike peace.

Notwithstanding all these prohibitions, the assembly held at Orthes; and they sent Letters to the generall Deputies of France, residing in Court, charging them to present the Assemblies Letter vnto the King, and to beseech him to answer them fauourably in their Petition made by the Seigneur of L'Escun; and in case of refusal to desire a generall Assembly. Hereunto they made answer: That they would not receive their Letter com-ming from an vnlawfull Assembly. As for them, they would heare them alwayes as generall Deputies, and not as having commision from the said Assembly.

About the same time, Monsi Renard, Councillor of State, & Master of Requests, deputed
Commissarie by the King, for the execution of the Edict of restitution, parted from Court, D & arrived at Pau, the 9 of Iune; where having delivered vnto the Proctor generall the Edict of restitution with the Decrees of the Courts of Parliament of Thoulouse, and Bourdeaux, to be enrolled in the said Parliament of Pau, and executed: they write that during his abode there, they stirred vp the schollers, and others, to commit many insolencies, and to speake many opprobrious words vnto him at his lodging doore; the which Monsieur de la Force the Gouvernour, nor the Court of Parliament, did in no sort punish, but only restrained them. It is also written that the Deputies of the Estates, and the reformed Churches of Bearne, presented their requests vnto the Parliament, to be admitted opponents vnto the Edict, and verifications presented by the Proctor generall, and that the Bishops of Oleron, and L'Esca should giue their request of Recusation against the Seigneur of E L'Escun, Councillor in the Parliament, Deputie for the said Churches, as being party.

Decree of this Parliament of Pau, against the Edict of restitution.

The matter being heard, there was a Decree made by the Parliament, by the which it was said: That in regard of the Edicts, Letters Patents, and Declarations enrolled in that Court, granted as well by his Maiestie now reigning, as by other Kings his Predecessors, in fauour of their subjects of the reformed Religion dwelling in that Country: there was no meanes to proceed to the verification of the Edict concerning the restitution. But his Maiestie should bee humbly intreated to leaue matters as they were, for the good of his seruice; the settling of his estate; and the goods of his subjects: enioyning notwithstanding all the inhabitants of that Country, of what Religion so euer, to retire to their houses, and to liue in peace, vnicie and concord.

The Kings
Intention to the Parliament of Pau.

The King being informed of all these proceedings: it was resolved in Councell to send an other Iulusion to the Soueraigne Court of Pau, wherein making repetition of the Errors had been committed, he enioynes them expressly, (notwithstanding their Decree of the one and twentieth of Iune) to proceed without delay to the publication and inrolling of the said Letters Patents, and Edicts of restitution: and the full execution thereof, for as much as should depend of them; and notwithstanding that he had by his Edicts more then plainly satisfied all those which might either directly or indirectly be interested in 1618

A in the said restitution; yea, with such losse and disadvantage to himselfe, as hee was not only dispossest of all the reuenues which he had in Bearne, but also of a good part of his neighbour-Countries. Yet he declared, that if after the verifying of the said Decrees and Edict, there should be any one found which pretended any losse or prejudice thereby, which deserved consideration and recompence, he would receive their complaints, and giue them full satisfaction. Withall he gaue commandement, they should make their processe which had come in armes to attempt against his Commisary; and likewise to proceed against those which had assembled at Orthes contrary to his Edicts and Decrees, and to punish them according to the rigor of the lawes.

B This yeaere Monsi D'Ornano Gouvernour of Castil. Trompet in Bourdeaux was made Lieutenant Gouvernour in the Prouince of Normandie, and the particular government of Pont de Larche, the which Monsi de Luynes enioyed after the death of the Marshall D'Ancre: And the said Monsi D'Ornano yielded vp Castil. Trompet into the Kings hands.
Monsi de Luynes was made Gouvernour of the Ile of France, and had likewise the particular government of Soissons, Noyon, Chauny and Couilly, by the resignation which the Duke of Mayenne made thereof into the Kings hands: whereupon he was made Gouver-nour and Lieutenant Generall in Guienne, for which he tooke his oath before his Maie-stie. Thus the Duke of Mayenne left Soissons to goe to Bourdeaux to be at the Registing of his Letters of Prouision in Parliament. Where hee arrived in the beginning of C Iuly, at the reading whereof there was much spoken in honour of the said Duke, and of the many good seruices which he and the House of Lorraine had done to the House of France.

Exchange of Gouvernements.

Barnouille, who commanded in the Bistile, being accused to haue had his eyes blinded with a diamond to suffer Barbin, a prisoner thence, to receive letters and write answers, lost his place, & was the cause that the Baron of Perlan his brother, who had the custodie of the Prince of Conde, being come from Bois de Vincennes to Paris, vpon certaine haughty words which he spake, was committed to prison: the King giuing the guard of the Prince, to the Seigneur of Vernet, brother in law to Monsieur de Luynes.

Of all the accused, one was condemned to dye; others banished, some to retire to their D houses, and the Prisons were opened to others. The King being intreated by the kinsmen of some great men condemned, to shew his clemency towards them, would that it should not only extend vnto them for whom they were suitors but vnto all, Barbin, onely excepted, who had beene banished France, but his punishment was changed to a perpetuall imprisonment.

About the beginning of September, France lost the Cardinall of Perron. King Henry Death of this the third knowing the sharpnesse of his wit, tooke him into his seruice, and gaue him 1200 crownes a yeaere to be his Reader. He followed his Master to Tours. After whole decease, the Cardinall of Vendosme making great account of his learning, brought him to the Court after the siege of Chartres. The King seeing his sufficiency and learning,

Cardinall Du Perron.

E beganne to affect him much, and made him Bishop of Euroux. After the Kings conuer-sion, as some write by his perswasion, hee was sent to Rome to represent his filiall obedience, and to reconcile him to the holy Sea, the which he obtained from Pope Clement 8.
Being returned from Rome, he purchased a great deale of honour and reputation with the King and Court, vpon a conference which he had at Fontaine Bleau with Monsieur de Plessis Moray. Soone after, his Holinesse sent him a Cardinalls Hat, the which was very pleasing vnto the King, who gaue him the Archbishopricke of Sens being void, and made him his chiefe Almoner. The Reconciliation of the Pope with the Venetians, was partly made by his aduice, with many other goodly actions. And without doubt it may bee said of him, that he had bene one of the learnedst and greatest Prelates of the Romish Church.
F in his time.

On the last of September Monsi de Luynes came to Soissons, to take possession of the gouernment of the Ile of France. The next day the King came thither, where he was re-ceiued with all demonstrations of publike ioy; the which the inhabitants did shew by the brute of their Cannon, which they had planted vpon their Bulwarkes. The Kings voyage should haue been longer, but all the Country thereabouts being ruined by the Armies, for the space of foure yeaeres, it drew the King backe againe with his Court to Paris.

sonne vnto him, as well to giue him thanks for the assistance which he had receiued from his Maiestie in the protection and pacifying of his Estates and Countreys, as to finish the alliance propounded for the marriage of the Prince of Piedmont, the Dukes eldest son, and Madame Christienne, the Kings second sister. He gaue commandement to the Governours of Prouinces and Townes where hee should passe, to receiue him with all honour, and to d. fray him as was fit for a personage of his qualite and dignitie; wherein there was nothing wanting during his whole journey.

In the beginning of Nouember, hee arriued at Paris, where he receiued as honorable entertainment, as he could desire or imagine, no lesse furable to his blood and ranke, then to the greatnesse and magnificence of the House of France. Hee was lodged in Pi- quigny place, and was serued by the Kings Officers. He had audience, and in the end obtained a Graunt of the Marriage for which hee came: the accomplishment whereof will belong to the next yeare.

Proposition of the French Ambassador to the vniued
Estates.

The beginning of this yeare was troublesome in the vniued Prouinces, by reason of the Arminian faction, and their criminall proceeding against Barnuel, Advocate generall of the Estates of Holland and West-Friesland, who was held to bee the head and chiefe of the Arminians. Hee was a man of great credit and authoritie in those Prouinces, hauing past all the Offices a man could desire in a Soueraigne Common-wealth; but alwayes opposit to the Prince of Orange. Being committed to Prison the last yeare, they were now vpon the point to proceed against him. Whereupon the French King sent an extraordinarie Ambassadour to the generall Estates, who being assisted by the Leiger; they made their proposition vnto the said Estates, exhorting them, to continue firme in the vnion of their Prouinces; as the chiefe foundation of an Estate, and to be carefull lest the changes of Magistrates and Consuls, which they had made in their Townes, did not increate the hatred and dissenion among the Citizens in stead of curing it. That the Synode which they had called should be free and safe, for all which should assit there. That free Common-wealths, had alwayes spared the blood of their Citizens. That the Seigneur of Barnuel was recommendable for the good seruices which he had done vnto his Countrey. That they should giue to him and others accused, Iudges which were not suspect, nor passionate, who may iudge according to the lawes of your Countrey, by plaine and vndoubtfull proofes, and not by coniectures and presumptions. That the King aduised them to vse Clemencie, and mildnes towards these prisoners, and not rigor, as most pleasing to God, and fit to winne the loues of the people, and make them obedient, which his Maiestie desired for the interest hee hath in the preservation of their State, and the knowledge he had of the great seruices this prisoner had done them; and the affection he had alwayes borne to entertaine the Alliance betwene France and that Estate; such remarkable testimonies of his loyalty and fidelitie, that they seemed to exclude all treason and treacherie.

The answer of the generall
Estates.

The generall Estates made answer to the Ambassadors proposition; wherein they complained, for that the most Christian King would not suffer any of the Ministers of France to assit at their Nationall Synod, which began at Dordrecht the last yeare. And touching the Prisoners, there was no losse of time, but they laboured therein duly and diligently, wherein they had proceeded so farre, as they doubted not but they would soone come to iudgement, which should be such as at the publication thereof, all the Allies which did affect the prosperity of that Estate, and especially his Maiestie, who was a Prince of Iustice and Equitie, would commend their iust proceedings. But touching the Ministers of France, assisting at any foraine Synode, K. Henry the 4. at the Pacification of Nantes, inserted an Article, whereby all strange Ministers were forbidden to come to the Synods of the reformed Churches in France; and in like manner the Ministers of France restrained from any foraine Synods.

An Italian Ambassador burnt at Thoulouse.

The last yeare in Nouember, there was an Italian in the towne of Thoulouse committed Prisoner, who was a Philosopher, and a very learned man, and went from house to house to teach such youth, as desired to learne Philosophie. Hee maintained and taught, that our bodies were without soules, & that dying all dies with vs like vnto brut beasts. That the blessed Virgin Mary (oh execrable blasphemie) had had carnall knowledge like vnto other women; with other words more scandalous, and vnworthy to be written, or spoken.

A By his eloquence he did so insinuate his pernicious doctrine into the vnderstandings of his priuate auditors, as they began to wauer in their Faith: which coming to the knowledge of the Parliament, they sent out Warrants to apprehend him; who being examined, hee maintained his instructions to bee true: whereupon his proceesse was made, and sentence giuen, by which hee was condemned to doe penance in his shirt, with a Torch in his hand, and to be drawne vpon a Hurdle, his tongue to be cut out, and to be burnt alive, the which was executed in the beginning of Februarie. He died with as much constancie, patience and resolution, as euery man did. For coming out of the prison with a cheerefull countenance; He spake these words in Italian: Gom gente, let us die cheerefully like a Philosopher. Being aduised to aske God forgiveness, he said in the presence of many; There is neither God nor deuill: for if there were a God, I would intreat him to shooe a Thunderbolt vpon the Parliament, as being altogether vniust. And if there were a Deuill, I would also pray him to swallow them vp into the infernall gulfes: but because there is neither the one or the other, I will not say any thing.

Hauiug made mention of the punishment of Atheists, wee will continue the discourse, with the relation of a Iewish woman, which was burnt by the people of Saint Iohn de Luz on the twentieth of March. Philip the second of Spaine, hauiug vniued Portugall to the Crowne of Castile, many Families of Iewes retired themselves into Holland, and other places of Christendome, for feare of a strid Inquisition: and many were fled into the Villages, vpon the Frontiers of Biscay, where they did liue Christian-like in shew, and yet in secret they made their Conuenticles and Synagogues in Caves, contrarie to the Kings ordinances.

A Iewish woman burnt by the people of Saint Iohn de Luz.

The Vicar generall of Bayonne, hauiug giuen charge to a Priest of Saint Iohn de Luz, to obserue the behauiour of these Portugals, he did it so carefully, as on the 19 of March, certaine Portugall women presenting themselves to Confession, and afterwards to the Communion, which was administered vnto them, by one Don Anthony a Portugall Priest, but held for a Iew: he discouered that all these women as soone as they had receiued the sacred Host, they presently put their right hand to their mouths, which made him coniecture that they tooke it forth. Being verie nere vnto the last, whose name was Katherine Fernandes, hee plainly perceiued, that as soone as she had receiued it, she drew it out with her Handkerchiefe, and hid it in her sleeue. Whereupon the Priest went vnto her, saying, wicked woman, what hast thou done? who seeing her selfe surprized, answered that she was mad. Hereupon the Priest called some to assit him: which the Portugall Priest, & the other women perceiuing, they fled presently away. Fernandes being taken, and caused to draw out her handkerchiefe, they found the Host in it somewhat moist, the which they put vp againe with great reuerence into the holy Pixe. The woman being examined by the Vicar generall of Bayonne, she excused her selfe, saying, that the Deuill had made her commit this sinne; that coughing, it had slipped out of her mouth, and that she had kept it to take at leisure in her lodging. The people being impatient of any long delay in her examination; and hearing that the Iewes had made a purse to saue her life, they resolved to doe iustice themselves. So going into the Vestry, they brought her forth in the view of many Iudges, putting her presently into an empty barril, and an empty Pitch-barrel vpon her head and shoulders. Then filling the barril wherein she was with Pitch and Rosin, Straw, drie Wood, and other combustible materials, all the people came running and set fire to it, burning her alive, which the Officers of Iustice could not hinder. Being burnt, they found in the Ashes Jewels of great price, for she was verie rich.

After this, the people gaue present commandement to all the Portugals and Iewes to depart from thence forthwith, if not, to be all burnt: whereunto they were forced to obay flying to Biarintell, a league distant from Bayonne, where they were now remaine.

The King Proctor generall of Bourdeaux caused information to be made for this burning, and Warrants to be sent out, to apprehend as well the Bailiffe and Iurats, as against the rest of the Inhabitants of Saint Iohn de Luz, being an enterprize of dangerous consequence, and against the authoritie of the Kings iustice: but it was a popular mutinie, zealous in their Religion.

The Duke of Sauoy, hauiug receiued newes in the beginning of the yeare by a Post, sent from the Cardinal of Sauoy; That the Treatie of marriage of the Prince of conclusion of

marriage.

1619 Piedmont with the Ladie Christienne second daughter of France was concluded, A they were verie acceptable, being accompanied with a fauor wherewith the King honored the Prince, sending him the Ladies colours, which were presented vnto him by Monsieur Marin, Councillor to his Maiestie, and his Agent in Italie. For three daies space there was nothing but publike processions throughout all Sauoy, and Piedmont, shooting off of Cannons, Bonfires; and other exterior signes of ioy.

After which there was a solemne triumph proclaimed, in which the Prince was Challenger, being assisted by eleven other Knights, and Prince Thomas his brother defendant with as many more, all which was performed with great state. The Court of France was in like manner full of ioy. The Duke of Elbæuf married the yong Ladie of Vendome. B The Duke of Guise went from Paris to Marceilles, to draw a Fleet together to free the Seas from the Pyrats of Argier; and the Duke of Tremouille went to Sedan, to marrie the Duke of Bouillons Daughter, where there was great triumphs and ioy.

The Prince of Piedmont and his brother Prince Thomas, came to Lions on the first of Februaire, where Monsieur D'Alincourt, Gouverneur of the Towne, entertained them verie sumptuously. From thence they tooke Poste and came to Rouan where they imbar- cated vpon the Loire: but their boat making no such speed as the Prince desired, he landed at Bonne with his brother and some Noblemen, leaving their traine to come after: there they tooke Posts and came to Paris on the tenth of February, where they were entertained with all shewes of honour. On the 10 of February the Prince of Piedmont was married to the Ladie Christienne the Kings sister: And it was observed that on the 10 of February, in the year 1606 she was borne. There were manie discourses vpon this marriage, to shew how religiously the will of the deceased King Henry the Great, had beene performed in the accomplishment of this marriage: That it was necessary to renew the ancient alliances of the Kings of France and Dukes of Sauoy thereby. To honour this Marriage the King presented the most itatclift maske which hath beene read of.

During these Magnificences in signe of publike ioy for the Ladies marriage, and of an assured peace in France, They might discouer a thicke cloud rising about Metz. The King had lent for the Duke of Espemon to come to him to Rouen during the Assembly, who leaving his government of Angoulême attended vpon his Maiestie. The Court returning to Paris, in the beginning of the year 1618, whether he had taken some discontent, or they had given him any: In Aprill following, hee tooke occasion to goe visit his faire house of Fontenay in Brie, and some dayes after retired to Metz, being discontented with those whom the King fauoured, so as meeting them once going downe the great faiores at the Louure, and they comming vp, he said vnto them, My masters you mount, and we descend. The which the Courtiers observed well. That being at Metz, vpon certaine differences which had happened, the President and some of the discreetest Inhabitants, were gone out of the Towne. The King desiring to be informed of the true cause thereof, had sent Monsieur Fauier a Councillor and Master of Requests to Metz, with commission to restore all things to their first estate. The which he had done for the President, but not for the rest: whereof he brought Letters from the Duke vnto the King, and that it seemed he had a desire to part from Metz, to goe to Angoulême. Whereupon the King wrote vnto him.

That in regard the warres were newly kindled in Germanie, and that it seemed they would not bee so easily quenched, but might extend further: He held his presence more necessarie now then euer in the town of Metz, commanding him expressly not to depart without order from him, the which hee should haue, as soone as the affaires of the Frontiers would suffer it: assuring himselfe, that hee would yeeld him the seruice hee desired, and whereunto he was bound by his place. Paris the eleuenth of January 1619.

The Duke made answer vnto the Kings Letter, the which I amforced to insert, being matter of State, and the forerunner of a great alteration.

Sir, (saith he) I haue nothing to answer to your Maiestie: But that hauing depended absolutely vpon your commandments; and hauing neuer propounded in my actions any other ends then the good of your Estate, the least interest which shal concern my charge, is not only sufficient to stay me here, but shall bind me to expose my life in all places for your seruice: but now, Sir, France enjoying a generall Peace, your affaires

fo

A so strongly continued; and the honour of your friendship so depe vnto your neighbors, that as there is nothing within the Realme, but bowes vnder your authoritie: so abroad there is no Prince but doth respect your power, or is perswaded by your iustice. And touching the troubles of Bohemia. The danger which they imagin (who make matters greater then they are) is so farre from this Frontier, as the apprehension were would take, can haue no ground, seeing that no man Armes on this side the Rhine. Those considerations, Sir, doe not binde mee to stay in this Countrey where all things are in so good an Estate, and where the stay of my Sonne, La Pallete shall be sufficient in my absence, to give order for any thing which may concerne the good of your affaires. I assure my selfe your Maie- B ste is so iust, as you will regard the necessitie of my particular, and be pleased that I may returne vnto my house from whence I haue bene absent about fiftene moneths. I take that libertie which you allow vnto the least, which haue the honour to be vnder your obedience. I doubt not but you will be well pleased with the desire I haue to make this Voyage, and assure my selfe you will consider that since your comming to the Crown, being bene engaged in 100000 crownes for your seruice; for which I pay the interest at Paris, and not having received any gift from your Maiestie these two yeares, but the simple pay of a Colonnell, at the rate of ten moneths a yeare, it is not possible for mee to defray the great and necessarie charges that I am bound to bee at here, to maintaine the dignitie of my charge, and doe your Maiestie seruice with more lustre. Finally, Sir, seeing C mine enemies daily seek to raise doubts in your Maiesties minde of my pure intentions, & that I am so unfortunate as being growne old in the seruice of three great Kings, I must be troubled to defend my loyalty against a slander. I am inforced to say with much griefe, that I haue contained my selfe in my dutie, when as they propounded vnto me recom- pence for disobedience: and that I haue defended your authoritie, when as some abused it, and others contemned it. They doe mee wrong to thinke, that I would begin to faile at this age, and that my particular interells are more deare vnto me then your seruice. Where- in, Sir, I will freely confesse, that I haue no cause to complaine but of my bad fortune, being assured that vertue is not suspected vnder your raygne, nor reputation odious; and that your Maiestie is too iust, not to distinguish the innocent wronged from the Nocent. For D in effect, Sir, seeing that when you were not yet at libertie, the mildnesse of your disposition was so great, as you did alwayes oppose against violent Councells, and could endure that your authoritie should be employed to the ruine of your subiects: There is no apparance, that now when you depend wholly of your selfe, and that no man doth force the bounty of your inclination: you would toyle the age of one of your best seruants, and the most ancient Officer of your Crowne, nor deny him that rest which Nature demands. I thinke, Sir, I may hope for this, at the least as a recompence of my long & faith- full seruices, seeing your Maiestie may giue me, (as I most humbly beseech you) without any discommoditie of your affaires: hauing neuer expected any other fruit of my actions, then the contentment to haue done them. I shall hold my selfe happie enough to receiue the Testimonie of my conscience; to haue been truly, and so will continue, your most humble, faithful, and affectionate subiect and seruant, J. Lewis de La Pallete. From Metz the sequenteenth of January 1619.

Thus the King would haue the Duke of Espemon continue at Metz, and he desired to goe to Angoulême. The subiect of his desire will bee knowne hereafter by that which happened.

Ypon this resolution he made preparation for all which he held necessarie for his voy- ages, that is to say, of Men, Armes, and Horles, hauing drawne together 200 Cheual- liers and Carabins. All being ready, he caused the gates of Metz to be shut some daies to- gether before his departure, and certaine daies after, so as they could haue no aduantage E against Cour before he had crost Lorraine and Bourgundie, past the Riuier of Loire be- tweene Delfe and Rouane, and Lallec at Pont de Vichy. From whence hee wrote thus vnto the King.

Sir, hauing formerly represented vnto your Maiestie the long patience wherein I haue stood in my governments of Metz all occasions to doe your seruice, and promising vnto my selfe, that hauing taken into consideration, the necessitie of my affaires: you would bee fully perswaded of my resolution, to law fully grounded. I did beleuee that I should not be disappointed by your Maiestie, or any other; if at this age (hauing given the best part of my life vnto the publike) I desired to goe and end it in peace, and to enioy part of that rest which you haue purchased for your estate. Notwithstanding Sir, the least of your desires are so deare vnto me, and I am so religious in all the circumstances of my dutie, as I had not vnderaken my journey, if the subiect of my stay had not ceased, and the difficulties of the warre of Bohemia quite taken away. But hearing that the Duke of Lorraine had bene aduertised from those Countie, that the affaires were vpon point of reconciliation; and that the ouerture began by a suspension of Armes, I did not thinke that the good of your seruice bound mee to stay any longer in a place, which is in no danger in the time of Peace, and which will reape benefit by the weaknesse of the Empire, if the warre continue. If there be any part in this Estate which is lesse found then others, and wherethe publike tranquillitie hath need to bee more carefully preferred: I assure my selfe that your Maiestie will iudge, it is the Prouince whither I goe: And therefore it is vnder my charge, I am bound to watch for all which may concerne the quiet thereof, and not to suffer any thing to passe, which may preiudice your authoritie. As Sir, if now I embrace the occasions, your Maiestie (if you please) will doe mee the honour to consider that herein I disobay not your commandements, but doe expound them according to their true sense, and giue them their best interpretation, being most profitable for your seruice. For in effect, Sir, no man is ignorant, that as the maintenance of your authoritie is the first law of your Estate; so the good of your affaires, is the most important of your commandements: which being absolutely true, what apparance should there be (if hauing meanes to preferre a Prouince diuided in wall for your Maiestie; and by my preference to stay them which might bee subiect to alterations, if they were not fortified in their duties) to breake off a necessarie voyage. I should propound to my selfe so weak and remote considerations as those of the warre of Bohemia. I am not, Sir, of that rage that I should feede my selfe with vanities; neither doe I thinke that your Maiestie doth regard me so slightly, as you will make no other vse of my seruice, then to see your packets safely conueyed from Germany. Nor doe I hold my selfe so vnprofitable as I must be forced to doe you and your Estate serices of so small consequence. I humbly beseech your Maiestie to iudge fauourably, and to doe me the honour to beleaue that wherofocuer I am, (notwithstanding the bad vsage I haue receiued for these twenty moneths) there is not any man liuing, that can corrupt me; nor any powerfull necessitie alter me, but will alwayes be your most humble, most obedient, faithfull, and affectionate seruant. *To: Lewis de la Palette. The Duke of words going out of Metz.

The Duke continued on his journey to recouer Angoulême, by the Countie of Lymosin. It was written to Court, that going from Metz, hee would see all his troupe that should accompanie him in this voyage, goe out of the gates before him: that hee came last, and that the gates were shut vpon him. That hauing viewed his companie, and finding them all to be well mounted and armed, he said, I goe to vndertake the boldest enterprise that euer I made. They thought in Court that his meaning was concerning his going from Metz, contrary to the Kings expresse commandement (which indeed was verie bold: but afterwards they found, that his meaning was, by the assistance which hee gaue vnto the Queene to conduct her from Blois to Angoulême.

Blois.

The King and the whole Court was gone in the beginning of Lent to Saint Germain in Lay, but he stayed not long; for on the three and twentieth of Februarie, a Nobleman brought him Newes that the Queene his Mother was gone from the Castle of Blois, vpon the one and twentieth, at night: That she had past by Mont Richard, wherethe Archbishop of Thoulouse met her with twenty horse; and a little beyond, the Duke of Epemnon attended her with a great troupe, and conducted her to Loches. These newes were the subiect of the Kings speedie returne to Paris, where hee received this Letter from the Queene his Mother.

The Queens
Letter to the King.

My Lord, my sonne, I haue suffered my honour and libertie to bee long oppressed, and haue endured strong apprehensions of my life; and that which was most sensible vnto me, was the priuation of your sight. All which hath bene done, being in some sort countenanced by your name: with the like patience would I haue attended the future, without search for mine owne particular, whether your will were well or ill aduised, but being informed to my great griefe, of the apparant danger of your affaires, I was not soone

A soone made knowne vnto you, I resolved to put my selfe into some sure place, where being free, I might let you vnderstand that which was impossible for me, being in the power of those which hide it from you, as some of the greatest of your Kingdome and abroad, haue with a thousand protestations counselled mee to doe. To this end I haue hazarded a perillous departure, and haue entreated my Cousin the Duke of Epemnon, to reuise me to Angoulême, whither I goe in regard of the certaine knowledge I haue of his fidelity and affection to your seruice; and by that which your father of happy memory my Lord and Husband gaue me, commanding me to rely wholly vpon his integrity and wisdom, in your most important affaires; and for mine owne particular, if they could be diuided from yours, which hauing done for your good; and to moue you to prevent the inconveniences which might trouble you, I assure my selfe that you will allow of my resolution, and be well pleased that I inuite you thereunto, by the most tender affections of a good mother, and by the truest duties a faithfull seruant can doe you; assuring you that you shall doe much for your selfe, and shall greatly binde me, if you giue the meanes and man, wherewith it shall please you I shall hold to acquint you therewith, without hatred or ambition: to the end I may see your reigne happy, and your Realme in peace; and that it may be knowne, that I neither haue had, haue, or will haue hereafter any other end but your seruice: for the which I will not onely forget all my discontents, but will willingly sacrifice my liberty and life, when the good counsell you should haue, or your selfe shall C hold it profitable. Delay will breed impossibility in the remedies, the which are now asie, safe, and honorable, as I will let you vnderstand with all sincerity and respect, and with protestation neuer to affect any authoritie in the conduct of your affaires: for as I deale therein with much paine and danger during your tender age, being therunto bound; so now I pretend no other part but the glorie to see them managed by your selfe, with the dignity and authority which is due vnto you, and to reioyce (as I would I now could) hearing euery man content with your reigne, proclaime your vertues and your prayes, in what place is pleased you I should end the remainder of my dayes: Praying God as I doe continually, with the most passionate feeling of my soule for your prosperity, and of your whole Realme, being your most humble and affectionate mother and seruant, Mary. D From Loches the 23 of Februarie.

The Duke of Epemnon in like manner the same day, and from the sayd place wrote this following Letter to the King.

Lewis.

Sir, presently after my coming to this Towne, I receiued commandement from the Queene your Maiesties Mother, to receiue her here, and then to conduct her to Angoulême, wherewith I thinke she hath acquainted your Maiesty by her Letters, and with the subiect of her resolution: the which I thought I could not refuse, without failing much in my duty to your Maiesty and her; humbly beseeching you to beleaue, that as I haue neuer failed (nor withstanding any bad vsage) in my seruice to the King your Predecessor, and your Maiesty, so I would not beginne at this age to make a breach in my duty, desiring rather to die a thousand deaths, then to doe any thing contrary to the fidelity of my long seruices, and which might giue your Maiesty iust cause to doubt mee, as I hope to witnesse by good effects, in all occasions which shall be offered, to be your most humble and obedient subiect and affectionate seruant. To: Lewis de la Palette.

There was no answer made to this Letter: but to the Queene Mothers the King wrote this Letter with his owne hand.

The King
answers
the Q<sup>ue</sup>
Mother.

Madam, I was at Saint Germaines with a resolution to see you within few dayes, when as three Postes brought the newes, that the Duke of Epemnon had caried you from Blois, hauing first perswaded you to leaue that place, vpon pretext that you could not continue there in safety. This action seemed so extraordinary and strange vnto me, as I could hardly beleeue it: For whether that I consider the quality of your person, or the condition of the time, you will confesse that there is no kind of discontent for the which I should be lesse prepared, nor thinking that there should be any man whatsoever, who in a full peace should presume, I will not say to execute, but to congeine a resolution to attempt vpon the liberty of this Kings Mother, but God who is the iust protector of Kings, and doth assist me visibly in all my designs, will giue me the grace to punish this injury to powerfully; the mischiefes shall fall vpon those which conder themselves with your name, and seeke their aduantages in the ruine of my subiects, and the blenish of my authority. The marks of power which the Duke of Epernon doth practise vpon your spirits, are so vi A fible in the Letter which he hath made you to write, as it is ealie to iudge, you haue written it with griefe: For who can imagine, that hauing giuen me so many bad impressions, you should now seek to perfwade me, that the deceased King my Lord and Father, had commanded you a litle before his death, to make use of his counsell both in my affaires and your owne. You know, Madam, in your conscience, that his opinion and apprehension were quite contrary, as you haue often declared vnto me, and haue your selfe made triall by experience. Moreover, being well informed, as you are, of the good government of my Estate, and hauing so often reioyced with me by your Letters, when your will was not transported by the motions and passions of another: who would be so void of iudgement, to beleuee that you haue not beene forced to complaine, that you haue not receiued that viage from me you deserue? If that were, I deserued first to be blamed, for that all resolutions which concerne you, haue not onlie beene countenanced by my name, but haue proceeded from mine own motion, and the aduice of my Councell, which is the Councell of the deceased King my Father.

Madam, my conscience, yours, and all France can witnesse, that I haue forgotten no kind of dutie towards you, which is a great satisfaction vnto me: The loue and feare of God being engrauen in my soule, as I hold my selfe more glorious in that fauour, then in the possession of my Estate. I desire not that my Crowne should dispence me of the respect which Children owe vnto their Parents. If you haue at any time thought, that the tender feelings of a sonne were not visible, it was to take the true interest of a King and Father of my People, and that the condition of times and affaires would not suffer me to doe otherwise: You your selfe haue often witnessed by your Letters, that this conduct was so iust, as you could not be offended, and that you willingly preferred the safetie of the publicke peace before your priuate content. As for the government of my affaires, whereof you are pressed to complaine with subiects, I will make them know (which haue vnderaken it) that it is I that governe my Realme, and preside in all my Councells. And when you shall be better informed of the truth, you will praise God with me for this blessing. And to free you from the trouble wherein you are, I haue resolved to take armes to restore you to the full possession of your libertie which your enemies haue taken from D you, and the respect and honor which is due vnto you, promising in the faith of a Sonne and King, to preserve them for you as carefully as mine owne life.

If vpon any occasion your abode at Blois be not pleasing, you may chuse anie of your houses or mine to lue in with all libertie, and to change at your pleasure, where I will presentlie come to visit you. At this interview, you may deliuer vnto mee by word of mouth, what you thinke imports the good and quiet of my Realme. All other aduertise-ments touching my affaires comming from you, would make the world thinke that they rather sought shewes then profit. I coniure you to giue me the meanes speedilie to trust me and loue me, as I loue and honor you. The Seigneur of Bethunes, whom I haue chosen as one of my faithfull seruants and yours, will acquaint you with my particular intentions: I pray you beleuee him as my selfe, who am your most humble and obedient son, Lewis. Paris the 12 of March, 1619.

This alteration vpon the Queenes departure from Blois, produced nothing but Letters and Answers, which being a high point of State, I am forced to insert. Hee that brought the Kings Letter to the Queene, presented this following, to the Prince of Piedmont.

Son, I take it for a beginning of good hope, that you are now present with the King my sonne, and haue the honor of his alliance, to ioine your prayers vnto mine, and to dispose him to redresse the miseries which are ready to trouble the dignity of his authority, and the quiet of his Estate. I haue retired my selfe late and without any circumstance, which may be suspected for the discouery thereof: and to satisfie my duty, and the requests which the greatest and wisest of the Realme make daily vnto me, whereunto the extrem misery wherein they haue made me lue long, could neuer draw me in regard of my pri-uate interest. If there were no question but concerning my selfe, the name of a generous integrity which you haue purchased, and the respect and obedience you yield vnto my Cousin the Duke of Sauoy, your Father, would make mee haue a very good conceit of your good offices. But seeing it concerns the interest of the King my Sonne, from

1619

A the which mine cannot be separated, and whereby you should expect great aduantages, if he gouerned him selfe with vertue and reputation, and according to the ancient orders of the Realme which God hath giuen him. I will summon you boldly to moue him, that he would speedily heare what I am bound to tell him for the prosperitie of his affaires, and the speedy redresse of disorders, which I with with passion, praying vnto God for his felicity, and to giue you all happinesse and satisfaction, &c.

Whereunto the Prince made this Answer.

Madam, it was a great content to prepare my selfe, to accompany the King my Lord, in his resolved voyage to Blois to visit your Maiesty; hoping to doe my duty vnto you, and promising to my selfe that the interview of your Maiesties, setting a perfect vnion (as he hath obserued all signes of good disposition) I should haue better meanes to testifie my submission and obedience, and how much I esteeme the honour to bee allied vnto you.
 But the more I ioyed in the expectation of this happinesse, the more I was grieved to be frustrated thereof by your Maiesties sudden departure, the which was the more sensible, for that I saw by your Letters you tooke an occasion to retire, thinking you were not safe, and that you could not freely acquaint the King with the disorders which you conceived were in his Estate: The which I esteemed proceeded not from your Maiesties meere will, whose iudgement and disposition is too good; but from the practices of some, who seeing your Maiesties readie to be strictly vniued, haue giuen you these impressions, hoping C to profit by your diuision, and the troubles which they thought to bring vnto the State.
 For it is most certaine, and I can iustifie it, that there is no kind of libertie but your Ma-iesty might haue enioyed at Blois. And that nothing could bee added to the tender feelings and true affection which the King beares you, nor to the conduct of his publicke and priuate actions, all which are answerable to the great reputation which he hath gotten, and the general esteeme is made of his vertue and generositie. Whereof (besides the effects which all Christendome haue felt) I obserue daily manifest proofes, seeing him present in his Councell, with so solid a iudgement, exact iustice, and so firme and constant a resolution, as no man (considering thereof without passion) but will admire him, and thinke that God hath not ended him with such excellent parts, but he will blesse his reigne, and D aduance his glorie about his Ancestors. The profession I haue alwayes made to loue truth, and the bond I haue to publish that which is so well knowne vnto me, and my great griefe to see the Labyrinth wherein those (which disguise it) seek to plunge your Maiesty, must free me for this libertie of speech, beseeching you with all humilitie, to banish from your thoughts whatsoever you haue conceived in preiudice of the sinceritie of the Kings intentions, and his wise government: assuring my selfe, that when it shall please you to sa-tisfie your selfe by meanes which are not suspect, you shall finde all good content, seeing that as a good & wise mother, you can haue no greater ioy then to see your sonnes affaires flourish, and to lue in perfect friendship with him. I find him to bee greatly incensed against those whom he thinks to bee disposed vnder your name to breed any alteration, E and readie to set powerfully vpon them. It appertaines, Madam, vnto your prudence to preuent the infinite hurt which may come thereof, and not to permit that (for your occasion and vnder colour of procuring an order in the State) confusion and disorder reigne, which doth ordinarilie follow ciuill warres. God, Nature, your owne good, and all considerations bind you: and I assure my selfe so much of your good disposition, as your Ma-iesty will be whollie enclined thereunto. The House of Sauoy, and my selfe especially, are so bound vnto the King, as if to preferre his authority, to reduce the enemies of the pub-like peace, and of the greatnesse of this Crowne, to reason, and to restore your Maiesty to that libertie which they haue taken from you in going from Blois, he be forced to war, we will willingly employ our liues and goods, and whatsoever depends of vs, to witnesse
 F vnto the world, that we are not vnthankfull for those vnspokeable fauors he hath imparted vnto vs, praying God that he will long preferre your Maiesty in health, and giue mee meanes to merit by my dutie and seruite, the qualitie of your most humble and obedient seruant, Amadee. Paris the 12 of March.

His Maiesty being aduertised of the Queene Mothers departure from Blois, and that she was arrived at Angouleme with great troops of horse, hee presentlie sent to all the Gouernors and Lieutenants general of Prouinces, commanding them to provide for the safetie of the Townes and places vnder their obedience, and to suppress all leuities of Souldiers without his commission, and to fet vpon all those which should attempt the A contrarie; conceining that those which had giuen this counsell for her departure, had bad designs, and would not faile to make vse of this occasion, and of her name, to seeke their owne auantages, and to trouble the publicke peace.

At the same time the King wrote particulare to the Marshall of Bouillon being at Sedan, and sent vnto him the Seigneur of La Chesnaye to haue his aduice touching the Queenes departure: to whom he made this Answer.

The D. of Bouillon aduice to the King.

Your Maiestie commands me to giue my aduice touching these occurrents of the Queenes departure. In obeying I cannot be taxed with presumption, but well ignorance, for the small iudgement I haue in affaires. My affection to your seruice, and the fidelitie B I owe you, shall, if it please your Maiestie supplie the rest. The Queene your mothers departure hath giuen much discontent to all good Frenchmen, to see an alteration in the common and naturall intelligence which should be perpetuall betwixt your Maiesties. But as this displeasure is very sensible, so is it somewhat mollified by the assurance they haue that both by the law of God and Nature, your Maiesties cannot continue diuided in affection: You, Sir, of a good King and a good Sonne; she not onely of a Mother, but of a most humble Subject. Your Maiestie might see by the Letters which she wrote from Loches, that two passions, as the faith, made her goe from Blois with danger. First, the knowledge the hath of many things which concerne your Maiestie; and secondly, the feare of her life, submitting to your choice and will, the meanes she shall hold to acquit you thereof: with: Herobey your Maiestie shall be without constraint, iudge of her actions. That C king those counsels which shall be profitable for your affaires, you may reject the rest. Sir, France more then any other Realme hath bene tossed with the like sudden accidents, and much more violent: but they haue bene suddenly repaired without armes, which are alwaies hurtfull to an Estate. Thus, Sir, by a royall hand, powerful, iust, and milde, your Maiestie shall reape profit hereby, and consider what is defective to an assured tranquillitie, in which your authority may be preferred, the lawes of the Realme maintained, your Edicts of pacification entertained, the breaches repaired, the ialousies of your subjects taken away, and your fauours and honors imparted to the qualitie and merit of such as your Maiestie shall make choice of. Thus, Sir, you shall enioy an immortal glorie, and D as your Realme an assured felicitie. I cannot thinke that any man will aduise your Maiestie to take armes, but such as aime at a dissipation, and to equall their obedience to the equality which they shall finde in the sword, which is a detestable intention; they shall haue Heauen for their Iudge, and shall receive their punishment on Earth. In like manner, they which offer their seruice to haue wherewithall to deserue, whereof there are manie. Sir, heare the Queene your mother, by faithfull and sufficient men; heare the common desires of your Estate, and giue that which shall bee fitting: in doing so, if there bee any which vnder goodly shewes haue bad intentions, they will discouer themselves, and serue to shew your power and iustice in punishing them. Wherein, Sir, you shall bee serued by your good subjects as they are bound. For my part, who haue little remaining of life, and lesse of health, I will bring all that is in me or mine, without excuse, to serue and settle your authority with an assured peace, and to runne with all my Forces and a perfect obedience to your commandements, vpon those which shall presume to make any opposition: The number of which will be small, if there bee any, seeing nothing in the intentions of the chiefe bodies of the Realme both of the one and the other Religion, but a desire to enioy peace: thinking (as it is true) that warre would ruine both soules and bodies, and peace giue them a pious and religious vse. I haue dilated of these things more amply with Monsieur de la Chesnaye, whom I humbly beseech your Maiestie to heare, and to hold me your most humble subject and seruant, Henry de la Tour. Sedan, the 4 of March, 1619.

The words in this aduice, That many would offer their seruice to haue wherewithall to deserue, were found very true; for some imagining that a war would be kindled in the four corners of the Realme, came to offer themselves without sending for, but they were dismissed with thanks, for that their inclinations were well knowne. But the wisest and most iudicious spake their mindes plainly, saying, That they that should giue aduice to entertaine these diuisions, were pernicious: that it belonged onely to the King and Queen mother betwixt themselves to pacifie this alteration; and they which should make themselves all gold by the fauour of Kings, should seeke meanes which might not bee prejudiciall

A ciall to the publicke. Within few daies after, the King caused a Declaration to be published, forbidding all leaues of souldiers, without Letters of commission signed by one of the Secretaries of State; and vnder the great Seale, with a Warrant annexed thereunto from the Gouernors of Provinces where they should be raised, or in their absence by his Lieutenants generall, commanding all which were already leauied to disperse themselves and retire vnto their houses: and if any should attempt the contrarie, he gaue charge to all Gouernors, Seneschals, Prouosts, and others, to charge them and cut them in pieces, which was strictly obserued in all France, but in some places of base Guienne and Poictou.

B In the beginning of Februarie, there happened a difference in the Gouernment of Guienne, betwixt the Duke of Mayen Gouernor, and the Marshall of Roquelaure the Kings Lieutenant in the said Gouernment, vpon diuers subjects; amongst other, for the Cattle of Reole, and the Cannon which was therein. This controuersie grew so bitter, as they drew souldiers to them on either side: and the Garison of the Cattle of Reole, which was usually but of nine men, was increased to the number of 400, which in the beginning bred some amazement in Guienne, especially in the neighbour Townes and Bourghes: for the Nobilitie of high Guienne did rather affect the Marshalls partie then the Dukes. The King hauing sent to the Parliament of Bourdeaux to pacifie this quarrel for the good of his seruice and affaires: Two Councillors of the Court were deputed, who went to the Marshall of Roquelaure, who was at Agen, and to the D. of Mayen to Nerac on the 21 of Februarie; and labored so in this businesse, as they reconciled it. The great Garison of Reole was discharged, and onely the nine morte payes remained. They restored the Artillerie which the D. of Mayen demanded: and the assemble of the Estates of the Province was concluded at Agen; where the Duke and the Marshall met, and entertained one another with all shewes and demonstrations of good intelligence for the Kings seruice: whereof his Maiestie being aduertised, was very well satisfied, for that they spake diuersly touching these alterations in Guienne: and at the same instant the D. sent vnto the King a copie of the Letter which the Queene Mother had sent vnto him: which was as followeth.

D Cousin, I had alwaies resolved to haue more patience then I could haue affliction, as long as there was no question but of mine own interst and troubles: for that I would giue no suspition vnto the King my Lord and Son, that I meant to separate my selfe from his will, although they held him ill aduised: but hauing bene solicited by complaints and generall entreaties, both within and without the Realme, to acquit the King my Son with the euident danger of his authoritie, and the quiet of his Realme: I made no difficulty to hazard my life by a most perillous issue, that I might let him vnderstand in all surety the passion of a good and faithfull mother; and haue aheadie written vnto him, most humbly beseeching him to prescribe me the forme I should obserue to giue him knowledge thereof. I thought good to impart the same speedily vnto you, for not onely the account which both my selfe and all France haue of you, makes me desire to haue your opinion: but also knowing that the King my Sonne doth much esteeme your counsels, I wish that you would ioine your prayers vnto mine to inuite him to the remedies which I know you vnderstand better then any other, to bee wonderfull necessarie: Coniuring you as much as possibly I may, to be careful that no alteration may happen; and that every man may attend from his good disposition that which hee owes vnto his subjects and his Estate. If I had need of witnesses to proue that the desire of the Kings seruice had moued me to these resolutions, wherein I had no consideration of that which concernes my selfe, I would name you the first. And now I sweare vnto you by the confidence which I desire to haue of your magnanimity for so important a businesse, & for the inclination which you know I haue alwaies had to you, that I haue not in my most inward thoughts other feelings then those which the prosperitie of the King my Lord and Son doe suggest. Let vs then labor therein, and you shall finde me for your particular, your good and affectionate Cousin Marie. From Roche Polay the 6 of March.

To the which he made this answer.

Madam, I cannot conceale the great griefe I conceiue to see the estate, wherinto it seemes your departure from Blois may bring the affaires of the Kingdome: the which I should apprehend the more, without the assurance which it pleaseth you to giue mee of it your " your good intentions for the Kings contentment. Madam, I beseech God with all my A " heart to assist you with his holy inspirations, being vnable herein to contribute any other " thing then that which belongs to the duty of an honest man and most faithfull seruant to " the King, and who hath resolved without any other considerations to oblige himselfe only " to the Kings will. Doe mee the honor, Madam, in the meane time to beleuee that I am " your most humble and obedient seruant, de Mayenne. From Bourdeaux the twelfth of " March, 1619.

It was obserued, that the three answers from the King, Prince of Piedmont, and Duke de Mayenne, were all dated on the 12 of March, and that there were 17 dayes past from the writing of the Queens Letter at Loches and the said 12 of March: the which gaue B the Queene occasion (seeing such preparations of warre) to write foure Letters on the 10 of March, that is to say, to the King, the Chancellor, the Keeper of the Seales, and President Jannin. Whereunto the King made no answer, for that hee expected to vnder-stand the Queens intention in answer of that which he had written vnto her: the rest made their severall answers, the which because they are conformable to the Letter which shee sent to the D. of Mayen, I will not trouble the Reader with any repetition.

In this month of March, the common talke in Court was variable, one day peace, and another day warre: one day they held it a good signe of peace, that Monsieur de Be- thunes, sent by the King to the Queene mother, had also commission to goe see the D. of Espemon: and the next day they sayd there would be warre, in regard of the many com- C missions which were sent to the D. of Mayen in Guienne; to the Earle of Rochefoucault, in Poitou; and to the Earle of Schaumburg, in Lymosin: one day they shewed the names of Noblemen, which had assisted at the Queenes entry into Angoulesme, who knowing that the King was not well pleased therewith, had retired to their houses, and since had taken armes for his Maiestie: and the next day they saw a lyst of such as had offered their seruice to the Queene; yea and some after they had leauied their Companies with the Kings Commission. Vpon these preparations made by the King to warre, the D. of Espemon tooke occasion to extend himselfe to Towne Charente, where hee put a Garison, to the end he might make himselfe Master of the Riuer of Charente vnto the Sea, and he sent his son the Archbishop of Thoulouse to Loches with diuers troops of horse. This trou- D bled the inhabitants of Loches with the feare of a siege, as most of them retired to the neighbour Townes. At this day they had need of strong Citadels and Garisons, to force the Townes of France to obey their Gouvernors, whom they see disobedient to the Kings will. In the beginning of April, the inhabitants of Vzerche in Lymosin, and of Bullen vpon the Sea in Picardy (whereof the D. of Espemon is Gouvernor) shewed the effects to his Lieutenants.

The inhabitants of Vzeche are rich
 themselves
 against the Abbey.

Vzerche is a reasonable good Towne betwene high and base Lymosin, vpon the high way to Paris from Thoulouze. It belongs to the Church, the Abbot being Lord of the Towne. The Abbey is vpon a little hill enuironed with a Ruer, where is onely a narrow passage which may be easily cut off; so as it is a naturall Citadell, and commands the Towne, and hee that holds this Abbey, is Gouvernor. It were impertinent to repeat how this Abbey fell into the D. of Espemons hands during the last alterations, through the diuision which grew betwene the last Abbot deceased, and the inhabitants: but the Duke being now in quiet possession, he put Captain Breuil into the Abbey, with a garison of 24.ouldiers. The inhabitants who had Breuil for that he had beene a great partizan to their deceased Abbot, finding that he had an intent to fortifie the Abbey with 100 men & munition, they refused to hinder it, to take armes and recouer their liberty vpon this occasion: whereupon they entrenched themselves against the Abbey, and sent to the Earle of Schaumburg, the Kings Lieutenant in Lymosin, entreating him to succour them, who presently marched thither with what friends and troops he could draw together. The D. F of Espemon on the other side being aduertised that the inhabitants of Vzerche were en-treached against the Abbey, he presently raised a flying Campe of 2000 foot 300 horse, and two peeces of ordnance to relieue the besieged, but they were forced before he came, as you shall heare: and in the meane time the Queene wrote a third Letter vnto the King in these termes.

The Queens
 third Letter
 to the King.

My Lord and Sonne, I will neuer cease humbly to beseech you to receiue the sincerity of my intentions, and to know that there is no person liuing that can haue more passion or

A or interest then my selfe in the prosperitie of your reigne, hauing propounded to my selfe to acquaint you with the inconueniences which may alter the power thereof, onely in consideration of your good and of your Estate, and for the great content I shall receiue to see the inuolable power of your Scepter continue firme. Consider then if you please, whether it be iust, that in stead of receiuing my durie and affection, they make you leaue armes particularly round about me, either to suppress the voice of my faithfull remonstrances, or to ouerthrow my condition and libertie, which breathes nothing else then your authority and content. If I be so vnfortunate as to haue giuen you such bad impressions of me, as my petitions and libertie are in no esteeme, yet at the least turne your eyes vpon the quiet of your people, and the discommodities which the firmeest and most absolute Monarchies doe oftentimes receiue from warre: And consider that in this occurrent you shall haue no occasion to vse force, being most certaine, then when you shall haue heard what I shall deliuer vnto you, it shall depend of your selfe to apply those remedies which you shall hold most conuenient, and I neither can nor will vse any other means then sup-plications and humble remonstrances. Wherefore I coniure you vpon my knees, to free me from the apprehension of present armes, and to take from the malecontents the pretext of making vse of this occasion, and be pleased that I may seeke to preserue Vzerche, seeing that the Earle of Schomburg is the assailant, as I vnderstand, contrarie to your intention, which is not to alter the quiet estate of your affaires: to the end that hearing that C which I am bound to acquaint you withall, euery man may receiue as he ought, (and I first of all) a law from you, and the order which you shall hold necessary for the good conduct of your affaires, &c. Your most humble and affectionate mother and subiect, Marie.
 Angoulesme the 4 of April, 1619.

Whilest that the D. of Espemon marched to relieue Vzerche, the Queene mother receiued Letters that the inhabitants of the towne of Bullen had done like vnto those of Vzerche, and that the Duke of Espemons Lieutenant had put the higher towne into the Kings hands. This reduction was the subiect of the fourth Letter which the Queen mother wrote vnto the King as followeth.

My Lord and Son, It grieues me extremely to be constrained to beleuee, that my Letters are troublesome vnto you, because I plainly see they preiuaile nothing. For hauing besought you many times to giue mee the meanes to let you know (without feare or apprehension) that which I am bound vnto for the good of your seruice and State: I doe not onely see an increase of the appearances of euill, contrarie to that which your goodnesse made me hope; but by the counsels they giue you, I beginne to feele the most pernicious effects in the enterprise which vnder your name hath bene made vpon Vzerche, as I haue already aduertised your Maiestie, and in the other vpon Bullen, which I now heare of with great griefe, it hauing added vnto my affliction so much the more, for being done at such a time as the faire speeches which Monsieur de Bethunes reported vnto me from you, and his presence here, had almost giuen assurance vnto my sinceritie, E and all men hope that I should bee shortly heare in the iust demand of making you to vnderstand (without perill) that which you are in no case to neglect for the enioying the powerfull continuation of your authoritie, and to giue to all your good subiects that peaceable tranquillity which they desire. On the contrarie, I plainly perceiue, that they raise warre, and trouble the dignitie of your power, and the publicke peace, onely to op-presse me; seeing they assaile the places which should serue for my suretie and preseruation, during the time that my mishap and other mens passions constrain me to be out of the protection and assurance of your fauour, finding it very strange, that in stead of giuing me occasion to moderate my feares and distrusts, into which the bad visage which I receiued at Blois hath made me fall, they haue now mightily augmented the subiect.
 F I appeale vnto your good nature and your iustice; and if that suffice not, vnto Gods, against those which are the cause hereof: And in all humilitie coniure you, to hinder this beginning of mischiefe which they procure, from which I might the better shield my selfe, if the respect I beare you did not make mee vse all considerations of not exceeding the termes of the necessitie of a iust defence: In which I will attend to know, if I may haue hope to make you peaceably to vnderstand what I hold is my dutie to performe: And doe pray you to beleuee that I will continue (in seruing you as I should) to make true proofs that I am, my Lord

The Queens
 Letter to the
 King.

my Sonne, your most humble and most affectionate Mother and subiect, Mary. From A Angoulême this 11 of April, 1619.

The morrow after the King had received this Letter from the Queene his Mother, a Post brought him this following from the Earle of Schomberg.

"Sir, seeing Monsieur D'Espemon within two leagues of Vzerche with his flying army, I resolved to assaile the Abbey, and that did so happily succed, that giuing the assault in five or six places, we forced the same the twelfth of this month. At this exploit there were some of the defendants slaine, and composition giuen to therest which had shut themselves vp in a Tower. I thinke Monsieur D'Espemon was neuer more grieved, for being so neere and not able to helpe it; if he come to assaile it, he shall finde whom to take B vnto. I keepe the field with my friends, which are in all five hundred horse, and will see what the enemy will doe, continuing to yeeld vnto your Maiesty the best seruices which I may, &c. Schomberg.

The Cardinal of Rochefoucault sent to the Queene.

On the seuenth of April, the Seigneur de Bernille, Restor of the Fathers of the Oratory, who was employed in the reconciliation of the King with the Queene his mother, arrived at Paris; and having made report vnto his Maiesty what Monsieur de Bethunes had aduanced in the businesse: the Cardinal of Rochefoucault receiued commandement to transport himselfe to Angoulême, and to treat in general of this reconciliation: whereupon he parted presently from Paris with Berules on the ninth of April.

Vpon the receipt of the Queenes last Letter, dated the 11 of April, the King sent her C this answer.

The Kings Letter to the Queene mother.

Madam, louing and honoring you as I doe, I cannot be but much grieved to see that all the care I haue employed for your satisfaction proues fruitlesse. You haue both by my Letters and by diuers personages worthy of credit whom I haue sent vnto you, receiued all manner of assurances of the sincerity of my intentions. I haue caused you to be satisfied touching all ieaousies and distrusts which they would giue you. Finally, I haue omitted nothing which I thought might content you; and yet, Madam, I finde by your two last Letters, and by aduertisements which I haue from diuers parts, that you witnesse, or rather that they make you to witnesse, to bee lesse satisfied now then at first. The cause hereof I would gladly find out, to the end that if it proceeded from any thing which depended on me, I might suddenly redresse it: But finding nothing about my person which D breathes not as much your good as mine owne, I am easily perswaded, that the mischief proceeds from the cunning of such as are about you, who hauing drawne you to the state wherein you are, disguise all things and diuert you from accepting that which is offered you on my behalfe: labouring to engage you more and more into disorders, hoping to raise their fortunes by our losse. If it please you, Madam, to waigh their proceedings, you shall easily iudge of their designs: they counsell you to write and publish, I hat you haue no stronger passion, then to see my reigne to prosper; nor greater desire, then my peoples rest: That you will not attempt any thing to the preiudice of my authority; but will be the first to receive and obey my will. These are your very words, and as I beleue, your intention. But E contrariwise, to trouble the publicke peace, and to ruine my Crowne, they haue vnder your name begunne long before your departure from Blois, and since continued, to trouble, corrupt, and stirre vp all they could against me, both within and without my Realme: They haue not onely leauied Souldiers, but seized vpon my Reuenues, imposed vpon my subiects, made enterprises vpon my places; and to omit nothing which might make a breach in my royall authority, they haue brought troops into the field with Cannon to set vpon the Seigneur of Schomberg my Lieutenant generall in Lymosin, who they knew had commandement from me to goe to Vzerche, which depends vpon his charge, to persecue the Religious, and other inhabitants whom they would oppress. Iudge, Madam, I pray you, if the effects be answerable to the words which they make you giue; and whether there be any reason I should allow of them, being not allowable either before God or Men: You haue often condemned farre lesser faults, & I rely so much vpon your judgement, that if you were at liberty you would blame these, and would be the first which would giue me counsell to suppress them.

As for that which they make you write touching the order I haue giuen for the preferuation of Vzerche and Bellen, I know not vpon what ground you should haue any cause to take exception. Every man knowes that Vzerche was viarped by the D. of Espemon vpon

A vpon the Church and the inhabitants. That he had put a Garison into it of his owne priuate authority, and against my will: the which hee would haue augmented to molest my subiects, and to hinder the free passage betweene Paris and Thoulouse. As for Bullen, the inhabitants seeing, that to make them altogether subiect, he had drawne in many strange souldiers, they opposed themselves, and haue had recourse to me to protect them from this danger: whereupon I haue provided for the safety and preferuation of these two places. Who can iustly say that I should haue done otherwise, or that you haue reason to say it concerns your safety? they were appointed to another end, neither euer haue you had or shal haue need within my Realm: You shall be alwayes safe & free, where B soeuer my power doth extend: And I pray you, Madam, doe not imagine that you shall find in this world a more certaine safety, or more perfect content then in my affection; you cannot finde it elsewhere. I did wonder much, seeing you complaine by your last Letters, that they seeke by my Armes to stop your mouth, that I may not heare the aduice you haue to giue mee for the good of my affaires: You know that about three weekes since, I haue (according to your desire) commanded the Seigneur de Bethunes to heare them, and to represent them speedily vnto me, whereof you haue not yet made any mention, notwithstanding all his diligence; which makes me thinke, that what they persuade you to write, is but to giue some colour to the enterprises they make against my seruice. When it shall please you to make declaration, the Cardinal of Rochefoucault and C the Seigneur de Bethunes, haue commandement to entreat you thereunto on my behalf, and to assure you, that I will take such consideration as is fitting, coming from you. I vnderstand that the chiefe practice they vse to hold vs diuided, is to entertaine you daily in ieaousies and distrusts, and to that end they disguise all the actions which passe here, yea those which are most to your aduantage. But I call God to witnesse, that there passeth not any thing which can be preiudiciall vnto you, nor contradict the honor, respect, and affection which is due vnto you, and which I will haue every man yeeld vnto you, as my most deare mother.

It is by this name, Madam, and by the cordiall affections of a good Sonne that I conioyure you to settle your spirits; stop your eares hereafter to so many bad reports, and such D pernicious counsels as they giue you, and suffer not your name to be a couering to actions like those which they make you practise, being quite contrary to our common good, and that which you say you desire for the greatnesse of this Estate, and the maintenance of my authority. The best will be, Madam, if you please, and I entreat you with all my heart, to embrace the offers which haue bene made you in my name, seeing they containe whatsoever you can desire with reason, and tend particularly to confirme betwixt vs a perfect loue, vniuty, and confidence, which is the end whereunto wee should aime, and the fault shall be yours if we doe not attaine vnto it: for my part, I will neuer stray from it by any of my actions, but will alwayes witnesse that I am your most humble and most obedient sonne, Lewis. Paris the 23 of April, 1619.

E This year in the Spring, the Prince of Conde fell dangerously sicke of an impostume in his bowels, which breaking he voyded the putrid matter by the sege. There was commandement giuen vnto all the Churches to pray for his health, which was performed with great affection, and God restored him: the King sent daily to visit him, and was glad of his recovery. On the eight of April he sent him the skarfe and sword which had bene taken from him when he was first committed, and wishall assured him of his loue. His Maiesty commanded they should prepare a Hall for him, whither he might repaire when he went to heare Masse, and that they should suffer him to take the pleasure of hunting. Some haue spoken maliciously of this sickness, were ashamed when as the Princes recovery gaue them the lye, for the false reports they had dispersed amongst the F people.

The Prince of Conde dangerously sicke.

His Maiesty hauing giuen the rendezuousto his Army of Champagne, on the 27 of April, at Vitry, the troopes beganne to march, when as suddenly the King was aduertised, that there was some diuision in Metz, betweene the inhabitants of the towne, and the Mirquis of La Vallette, whereupon hee caused his horse to aduance towards Metz, but it brought no ease to the inhabitants: for that the Marquis hauing drawne in those souldiers which the Duke his father had engaged vpon the Frontiers of Germany, hee made himselfe absolute master of Metz, and disarmed the inhabitants.

The inhabitants of Metz disarmed.

1619

During this retreat of the Queene, there were diuers small Discourses published touching the present estate of France: among the rest there were two, the one was called The Torment of the Courtiers Envy, made in fauour of the Seigneurs of Lynes, by the Kings Proctor at Ville Neufue by Auignon; and the other was styled The Lymosin: who spake thus in his Discourse.

A Discourse
touching the estate of France.

The Queene Mother hath governed the State of France seven yeares during the Kings Minority; the necessity of affaires hath brought in this kind of government, although it agree not with the humour of the French: All things have past with reasonable good order during her Regency; and this Monarchy is much bound to her wisdom and bounty. It is true, they are parts which are necessary at some season, but not always: for there are some defects whereof her felicity may be accused. All that can bee said if the King hath not beene well served, is, that there wanted a man. A womans spirit is subtil and inuentive, but not so fit to gouerne and conduſt. If the happineſſe of France had produced a man worthy of this charge, it had beene hard to find him without interest. To chuse one which were not advanced aboue the rest, no man would haue obeyed him: To take it by authority, and not capable, were the ruine of the Estate. It was then necessary to auoid these inconueniences, that the Queene should haue the government, not for the profit they might expect from her administration, but for the danger which might happen, if it had bene put into any others hands. The person of a sonne, and the quality of a King, could not be in any danger of life or of State, being in the hands of a Mother and Queene.

The King hath already found, and if he may attaine vnto the perfect experience of the government of his Estate, we shall fee him iudge of all that hath past for the good of his seruice: amend that which shall be found imperfect, and take away that which the abuse and necessity of the time hath brought in. Such exercises will more fortifie his iudgement, then if he had found all things according to his desire. He will reioyce to see that France had wanted a man, and that hee was the man, which makes himselfe necessary for his affaires, which had need of his preference. The greatest of all the defects which had beene in the Queene mothers government, the King hath repaired of his owne disposition: which were the great aduancements of that oblerant and looting Galiga. It is true, shee had giuen her too great power, and too good a share in her secrets and counsell: for as for her husband, he was an image cast in metall, his life and motion wrought not but by the springs of his wifes wit: the Queene Mothers credulity could not thinke that this mans fortune should grow suspect, or that any great conceit should enter into his thoughts: She imagined to vndoe him as easily as shee had raised him, but hee was deceiued." So was it one of the greatest maruels which was euer seene in France, that a stranger, a man vnknowne, without merit, without authority or friends, destitute of courage, of iudgement, and of government, had done all for money: hee had made himselfe great, purchased honours, and had drawne many braue men to his partie; had made warre, assured his affaires, and setled his fortune in such sort, as none but the King could stay his violent course.

The Prince of Conde and the greatest of France joyned their interest to the common apprehension of this insolent fortune, but they could not oppress it. He had powerful Commanders, Townes and People, which caried the Kings authority vpon the front of their Armes onely to preferre him. The Armes were ready to ioyne; and France had beene vndone by France, if the wisdom of the Commanders had not prevented it: God, who neuer fauours the designe of Armes without a iust occasion of warre, vnder-tooke the vengeance of his Anointed, whose innocency was ill serued by either party: both Armes ~~fasted~~ under the Wine-press of his wrath, and Death caried away more men by sicknesse, then the sword had done in the bloodiest Batcels which we haue scene. The Duke of Mayen endured a sieg, and gaue goodly reftimonies of his valour and courage, but in the end he had the worst, without the fall of this Huge Colosse, which had couered France with his shadow from East to West. The shadows retire at the rising of the Sunne: so this Spirit of darkness vanished at the Kings anger: his life, his fortune, and his memory perished in an instant, and there remains nothing but the name of what hee was at the first.

The Kings affection to Messieur de Lutzel.

A- As Nature suffers nothing void, for a royal breed cannot live without friendship. The King rook Monsieur de Luyne into his affection from his infancy, and so preferred it, as, whilst he lived he had the goodliest fortune of any man living; such great favours cannot be enjoyed without enmity, which made every one difficult; some in regard of their private interest, others by opinion; so as all the world ~~was~~ drew unto him two of his Brethren, which fortified him greatly, for they were three in one. And to make them more invincible, he contracted alliance with ~~the~~ Princes of Rohan, Duke of Montbazou.

Romany in his Torments of Courtiers Envy, continues this discourse, laying; That the condition of all men is subiect to censure, for the Tongue is without respect, it pardons none. That the envious would renew the fable of Gerion with three bodies, publishing that vnder the three *Luyne*s the whole Estate of France was governed, and that the vsurped the absolute authority vnder the Kings name. That they would make the world beleue, that they were strangers and fables to the Pope, for that they were borne in his County of Auignon; putting in the same tank the Seigneur of Modena their Vncle, a Gentleman of many good parts, and much esteemed. But admitt it were so, I said he, for besides that they of Auignon and of the County of Venissin are reputed for true and natural Frenchmen; the truth is, that the House of *Luyne*s comes out of Prouence, and that they are issued by the fathers side from the Illustrious Family of Albret, and by the mothers side from the noble House of Saint Paul. Monsieur de Luyne Father had beene Knight of the Kings Order, Governour of the Townes and Castles of Beaucaire, Pont St. Esprit, and Bagnols, and had a Regiment entertained. The honor which he got during the reigne of King Charles the ninth, in that furious combat at Vincennes in the face of the whole Court, is memorable, where he tooke away the sword, and slue Captain Paine, who had bene 36 times in the field. This act wonne him much reputation with the House of Bourbon, to whose family they haue bene alwayes affected. Henry the great did loue the father, as hee would be God-father to *Monsieur de Luyne*s his eldest son; And for that he was of the Reformed Religion, he made Charles, Cardinall of Bourbon, his Deputy, and Monsieur de Bellay Master of his Horse: This Chriftning was in the Abbey of Saint Denis, in the yeare 1562, and the Cardinall named him Charles.

This great King finding his God-sonnes good disposition and loyaltie, hee gaue him to be King his Son, being then Dauphine: That if this young Prince began then to affect him it was first in obeying his Fathers will: But being advanced to age, he hath loved him by election, inuited by his commendable qualities.

The Author of this booke called Lymon, faith, that looke in what credit Monsieur de Luyne is with the King, the Duke of Epiron is with the Queene mother. The Sword and force of armes, saith he, must be in the Kings right hand, and good Captaynes must be called to Councells both of warre and peace, a warre cannot be made without them. In peace should not be concluded without their presence, seeing they are the true Judges of times and occasions to take or lay downe armes, and may discerne whether a warre be just or peace dishonorable. There are martiall men of good capacity, which induce naturally vpon a true and solid reason: "A found and vpright man hath no better Booke then his understanding nor furth. A sinner then the experience of the affaires of his profession: after the model whereof, he better judgements approaching to Prophecies.

I will not give my censure upon the confidence and merit of the Duke of Epemum, whether he have taken any cause of discontent, or that they have given it him; in regard of the time many times might be taken: But few few observations which I have made thereupon, shall suffice, the which may well be spoken (although they be not common) seeing they are true.

[illegible]

oblige them doth not engage their hearts: He is hangry and wary in the distribution of A his fauours: more seeke him then doe enjoy him: They which seeke are without hope, and they which enjoy him, without content: He that engageth himselfe vnto him, enters into seruitude: whosoever is his, doth sooner lose his liberty then winne his friendship: If he doth good to any, he makes him feele it in such sort, as it distastes him: if he hate, hee is irreconcilable: he neither knows humillity nor pardon. These are the conditions of a man who makes account to liue without the helpe of any: Norwithstanding, he is so followed, as if there be any faction, where the King is not interested, you shall hardly find in France so powerfull a friend as he. He hath of all sorts, great and small: but such as hee calls to his friendship, are commonly active men, and fit for something. He makes a difference of their condition by discretion, to the end there might be no enuy amongst them. Without losing any thing of his grauity, he takes wonderfull paines to keepe them, and yet it appeares not. He visits his friends often by Letters of his owne hand: his Secretaries know not all his affaires. He imparts his secrets with so much retention, as he knows there is capacity or hope of seruice in him that vnderstands them: for he alwayes keeps the best, and neuer deliueis the bottome of his thoughts, two being made partakers of the secrets of one thing will neuer iudge alike of his intention: for that hee propounds is diuersly, yet all his diuersities answer to one sense: plurality of aduertisements neuer hinder a resolution, whereas his thoughts haue past to the determination of his will. His friends are so charmed, as they desire rather to be blamed by him, then commended by another, C thesse esteeme they make of his iudgement. He doth all things without any noyse. If hee hath a quarrel, or be forced to fortifie himselfe against some dangerous enemy, whether it be to surpris him, or to prevent a surpris, his preparations are made in his cabinet. Commonly great men quarrels carry a great brute, they threaten afaire off; they take time to fortifie themselves with friends, and to winne those which will serue the first commet: But he hath the lyst of his friends in hand, a sheet of paper shewes him his strength when there is occasion to employ them: He doth aduertise them in time, then they are ready and know whither to goe: So as in any good action when as they shall thinke him ill accompanied, he will be sooner able to draw together the body of an army, then another shall make a consulted assembly of his friends, and all this costs him little, not doth not incommode him. D

The Duke of Elspem hath many good parts, we haue seene him practise the vse of them in good and bad fortune. In the time of the deceased King, he had found his Master, and therefore he liued retired, and medled not much with affaires, labouring onely for his owne preservation. Since, he hath made himselfe necessary to the State: yet domesticke discontents did much trouble him, and were the cause of his misfortune. The King being master, the Marshall D'Anne suppressed, and all things changed, he loyned his interest with that of the Queene mother, it may be he had some spleene against the Kings Paiores, and to maintaine himselfe, and to preserve his childrens fortunes. To attaine therunto, he hath fortified himselfe with friends and intelligences, according to his custome, in all the foure corners of France, where hee hath particular Governments.

His greatest Government is that of his particular Governments in Kaintonge, Angoulmois, and Lymosin, which he hath viued as one Government, and made thereof a Barre from the Mountains of Auergne vnto the mouth of Charente on the Sea betwene the Governments of Poitou and Berry, and that of Guienne. But Lymoges and Lymosin remaining in these alterations in the Kings obedience, hee possesseth now but Kaintonge and Angoulmois.

As for his second Government, which is the Countie and Towne of Bullen, vpon the Frontiers of Picardy, and along the Sea side: the affection and love of the people towards the King, hath deuised him thereof, as hath bene said. And touching his third Government, which is Metz and the Countie about it, which hath for frontier Germany and Lorraine, although the people bee as ill affected vnto him as else where, yet the strong Citadell of Metz keeps them in awe, notwithstanding the Kings Army bee nere them, vnder the command of the Duke of Lorraine. The tower of Loches, which makes his fourth government is a strong place, but in the midst of the kingdom on the Frontiers of Touraine being vpon his important passage of a river.

A river. This is the estate of his foure governments. As for his forces they are for the present force of five thousand foot, and a thousand, or a thousand and two hundred French horse, besides the strangers which he hath hired, and are in Metz: and this is all, and little against thirte thousand men which the King can leauy in eight dayes. On the other side, there needs no more then one siege to ruine a mighty Armie: and as an ancient Countellor of State, said: It is sometime necessitie to appeale Fooles & Malecontents which one might easily chastise, lest the wise become fooles, as in a ciuill warre. Thus farre the discourse called the Lymosin.

At length the Cardinal of Rochefoucault, and the Seigneur of Bethunes, being at Angoulmois, on the last of Aprill, agreed vpon these Articles following, in the name of the King and Queene Mother.

1. His Maiestie accordeth that the Queene his Mother may dispose of her house, as she shall please, making choice and retaining of what seruants she will.

2. That she may goe and come, and make her abode in what place of the Kingdome she please, and neere the Kings person if she like.

3. That during her life, she shall enjoy all that she hath held by assignation, gift, pension, and gratification, granted vnto her by the deceased King, and by his Maiestie, and that she should be paid the arrearages.

4. That she should freely dispose of all the Charges, Offices, and Benefices, depending C as well of the Demesnes which her Maiestie now enioyeth, as those which shall be giuen her, conformable to the expeditions which she hath.

5. His Maiestie promitteth to entreat louingly (like vnto his other subiects) all those which haue serued and assisted the said Queene, in her retreat from Blois; namely, the Duke of Elspem, and his children.

6. That his Maiestie will suffer them to enjoy all their Charges, Dignities, Offices, and Benefices, and restore them to the Townes, Places, and Castles, without any exception, whereof they haue bene dispossessed since the Queenes retreat. And moreover, that they shall be paid their Pensions, Estates and appointments.

7. That all such as had bene dismist by iudgements, or otherwise, from Court of D out of the Realme, should be recalled, and all prisoners set at libertie.

8. That all which hath past by reason of the Queenes retreat from Blois, whether it were leauying of men, imposition of money, or any other thing whatsoever, it should bee forgotten by his Maiestie without any question.

9. That within two months the Queene Mother should be discharged of the money which she was forced to borrow since her retreat.

10. That within sixe weekes, the Kings Declaration should be verified in all the Courts of Parliament, according vnto forme, without any restriction.

The King receiued these Articles on the second of May. Five dayes after he went into Touraine, to be the nearer to Angoulmois, for the execution of the Articles, and to treat of particular business. But especially for that hee had long before let the Queene vnderstand, of a desire hee had like vnto Kings his Predecessors for the government of Normandie, and principally King Lewis the eleventh; who for the nearnesse of this Province to the Capital Citty of his Realme, would not suffer his owne brother to hold it, although it had been promised him by the Peace concluded in the warre of the Common-wealth. The Queene had bene preferred to this government after the death of the Earle of Soissons, during his Maiesties minority: wherefore the King desired, that she should resigne this Government, and content her selfe with some thing else: the which was anably compounded by an accord, to giue her the Governments of the Counties of Angiers and Chynon, with some other places.

After this they began to disarme on either side, and the King wrote his Letter vnto the Court of Parliament of Paris, concerning this reconciliation betwene him and his Mother, and the conclusion of the peace. On the seventh of Iune, the Duke of Elspem wrote this following Letter vnto the King.

Sir, I haue bene so vnfortunate, that your Maiestie hath conceived any bad opinion of my intentions before that you were truly informed; I thinke that I haue done so by stifling them by my proceedings, as there cannot remaine any sinister impression. The Queene your Mother hauing done me the honour to employ me in an occasion which the held important for the good of your Estate, I dare boldly say, that the conduct I have used hath been such, as without any remembrance of mine owne feelings, or any resolutions which might have apparently succeeded, I have contented my selfe to let all France know, that I respect your authoritie euen among mine enemies. By this means, Sir, I thinke I have so cleared my actions to your Maiestie, as you should rest satisfied, and have giuen you cause to know that as a naturall defence, neuer wants a lawfull excuse: so ciuill warre could haue no iust cause. Now that it hath pleased your Maiestie by a Christian-like action, to adde that which seemed to want in the felicitie of your reign to settle a peace in your estate: All your good subiects are bound to haue the more confidence in your word; for that it is at this day the foundation, whereon all Christen-B dome relies; and that being giuen to the Queene your Maiesties mother; besides that God, Nature, your Conscience, and reputation doth warrant it vpon this holy and inuincible assistance, having giuen my interest to the good of your seruice, and taken all good Frenchmen to witnesse, that I have maintained my fidelitie without reproach in all the troubles of your Estate; I assure my selfe that your Maiestie is so iust, as you will suffer me to passe the remainder of my age with some content; and that you will hold my long seruices worthy of your remembrance. I have little to liue, and I should thinke I had liued too long, if I should feele my selfe culpable of a thought contrarie to the obedience which I owe your Maiestie. I humbly beseech you to consider, that desiring nothing in this world but a little rest for the end of my labours, and an honorable death, for your seruice; I thinke to deferre that which I desire, which is to die in the end content, so as your Maiestie will doe me the honour to beleue that I haue neuer benee other then your Maiesties most humble and obedient subiect and seruant, De la Paletie.

After this, the King caused a Declaration of his will to be verified in Parliament on the twentieth of Iune, concerning the Queenes departure from the Castle of Blois, and the execution of the Articles of the Treatie concluded at Angoulesme.

The reduction of Conquer-
neau.

The King being at Tours in the beginning of Iuly, having receiued many aduertisements touching the carriage of the Seigneur of Lezonner, Gouverneur of Conquerneau, tending to disobedience and bad designs. He resolved to take from him this place, lying vpon the Sea, importing much, by reason of the strength of the situation. To this end he sent to the Duke of Vendosme, being in his gouernment of Britanie, and made him General of an Armie, the which consisted of three hundred of his men at Armes, three hundred Swisses, and some Cannon, which went downe the River of Loire, and were conducted by Sea. Sixscore Souldiers drawne out of the guards; which were sent to conduct La Besne, one of the Captaines of his Maiesties guards, and some companies of the Regiments of Picardie, Nauarre, and Beaumont.

This Capitaine made such speed, as in nine dayes hee came to Quimperle, within five leagues of the place, having marched seuen and fifty leagues in Britanie.

The Duke hearing of his diligence, commanded him to attend him there, and in the meane time to take vp all the Shouels and Pickaxes he could finde in the Towne. The Duke being ariued, he commanded La Besne to march away the next day, who came to Conquerneau, and lodged himselfe nere vnto the end of the bridge.

At the same instant the Duke of Vendosme, and the Marshall of Brisac ariued, sending to summon them of the Towne to yeeld it vnto the King. They demanded fiftene dayes respite, to aduertise their Gouernour, (who was gone forth two dayes before to seeke for succours.) They made answer vnto them, they should not haue one dayes respite. Whereupon the truce was broken, and they all retired.

The Duke of Vendosme, gaue charge to La Besne to desire to speake with L'Hospital, Sergeant Maior in the towne, and to perswade him to seize vpon Querchesne, who commanded in the Gouernors absence, and deliuer him with the towne the next morning, else they should all die. This being done, the Souldiers made answer that if Querchesne were comprehended in the Capitulation, they would defend themselves so well, as they would ruine the Kings Armie. To whom La Besne replied, Souldiers, you that speake so boldly, there is but one meane to saue you, in seizing vpon them which play the mutines with the hazard of your liues, the which you will lose ignominiously, for you will be all hang'd.

Hereupon they retired on either side: yet early in the morning the Souldiers desired

A to speake with La Courbe Hiré Capitaine of the Duke of Vendosmes Guard: the which La Besne refused; he being there present and a Capitaine of the Kings Guard. Then they sent vnto him to excuse them, and to tell him that they had a great desire to parley, touching their capitulation. A truce being made, hee went to the end of the bridge, where the Sergeant Maior, and Querchesne intreated him to be a meane that he might be comprehended in the Capitulation. La Besne answered them, that when La Courbe came, they would both intreat the Duke, but he feared it would not be granted: and therefore their best expedient was to yeeld the place presently. The Souldiers told them that they were the Kings seruants, and that they would willingly yeeld: which Querchesne vnderstanding, he said, he would stabbe them all, and himselfe afterwards, if they had not a good composition.

La Besne aduertised the Duke of the parley, and Capitaine La Courbe came vnto him; who hearing how matters had past, went presently to the Bridge, perswading the Souldiers to seize vpon Querchesne, which they did presently, and disarmed him, saying, wee will binde him; and bring him to you. The which La Besne vnderstanding, he ranne to the trenches, and brought forth his company in good order towards the Draw-bridge, where he met with La Courbe, to whom the souldiers had deliuered Querchesne, of whom La Besne seized, saying, that the Prisoner belonged to him, as commanding the Kings guard, and having besieged the place.

delivered to La Courbe.

C Presently after this, they deliuered the Keyes of Conquerneau vnto La Courbe, which La Besne in like manner challenged: but in the end they agreed that La Courbe should present them vnto the Duke in both their names. But in the meane time, La Besne got into the towne, and disarmed his souldiers, keeping his men in battell two houres, attending the Dukes pleasure: who being ariued with the Marshall Brisac, their meaning was to capitulate with them. But La Besne assured them that he had surprized the Towne & Fort two houres before, and disarmed the Souldiers. The Marshall hearing him, told the Duke that La Besne had done his duty in seizing of the place after that manner. Whereupon Querchesne was presently condemned and hanged before the Bridge. The Souldiers were sent away naked without their Cloakes, and white Rickes in their hands: yet they were conducted three leagues, lest the Country people should haue false vpon them.

In Iuly and August the King had sent many men of quality to the Queene mother, to summon her for an enteruiew, and to tell her that her presence was necessary at Court, for the quiet of the State. The Prince of Piedmont, hauing a great desire to see the Queene before his returne into Sauoy being her sonne in law by his mariage with the Lady Christine, the King was very well pleased he should go to Angoulesme, with Prince Thomas his brother, the which they did with a goodly traine of Noblemen. The Duke of Espernon receiued them with a state befitting their greatnesse: and the Queene held the mariage of her daughter with this Prince, for a special fauour from heauen. The Queen Mother (although they represented vnto her some difficulties, to diuert her from going to the King) told the Prince of Piedmont, that he might assure his Maiefty, that her desire was to approach neere vnto his person, to yeeld him and the State all manner of seruice: whereof she assured the King at his returne. But whether it were by reason of some indisposition, or for some distrust (as some supposed) the King feeling her stay, and desiring to haue the content to see her, he sent this letter by the duke of Montbazon.

The King sends to the Queene
to come to Court, and the Prince of Piedmont goes to see her.

Madam, the perfect vnion which I desire to confirme betwixt vs (being one of the worthiest and most commendable effects which a good inclination can produce) I will by all the meanes I can let you see how much I affect it. Madam, you know the persons whom I haue imploied to this end. I now send vnto you my cousin the Duke of Montbazon, whom I loue as much as any other, and the esteeme which you haue alwaies had of him makes me thinke, that you will giue more credit vnto that which hee shall deliuer vnto you on my behalfe, then to any other. Hee will assure you, that I desire not only a good correspondency with you, but that you should come and take your place in my Court with full confidence as you haue in my heart: you may stay as long as you please, and not depart vnlesse you like: it is the meane to liue together in amity. Seeing then Madam, that you know my intentions, and that you see them intirely disposed vnto all which you desired, I beseech you to repaire hither so soone as you may, to giue mee the contentment, that we may returne together to Paris: for I would not willingly leave this Country

The Kings
Letter to the Queene Mother.

1619 "Country, (where I have so long stayed vpon your occasion) without you. I will attend A
"your resolution, and will remaine your most humble and obedient sonne Lewis, From "Amboise the 17 of Iuly, 1619.

The Queene Mother hauing receiued this Letter, gaue the Duke such assurance of her resolution, as he told his Maieftie that without any further delay shee disposed her selfe to come to Tours. Whereupon Monsieur de Brenz, brother to Monsieur de Luynes was sent with some troopes of light-horse to attend the Queene in her voyage; who hauing conducted her to Poitiers, came to assure the King, that she would be at Tours by the 5 of September.

At this newes the whole Court prepared for her reception, as for a great feast long B desired. Some great Personages which had accompanied the Queene from Angoulesme to Poitiers, tooke their leaues, and returned to their houses, which made many thinke that all ieaalousies were suppressed.

The Queene
Mother comes to Court.

The King sent Monsieur le Grand with many Noblemen to meet the Queene at Chastelleraut, and himselfe with his Queene and the whole Nobilitie and Ladies, went two leagues out of Tours to receiue her. At their first meeting, there were vnspokeable demonstrations of ioy, and content on either side. They write that the Queene Mother approaching neere the King, said, My Lord, my Sonne, you are grown tall since I saw you. To whom the King answered, Madame, I am grown to doe you seruice. The Court stayed some dayes at Tours, when as the Queene desired to goe to Angiers to see her new go- C uernment, where they made preparation to receiue her with great state, and in the meane time she retired to Chynon: And the King taking leaue of his Mother, went to Paris, where he entred not for feare of the Plague, but went directly to Compeigne, where they began to speake of the Prince of Conde's deliuerie.

An Assembly
of them of the Religion at Loudun.

On the three and twentieth of May past: The King had granted a Briefe to them of the reformed Religion, to hold a generall assembly in the towne of Loudun: where being met, the Viscount of Turenne, second sonne to the Marshall of Bouillon, passing that way with his Mother, told them that his father would be alwayes enclined to the good of the Churches, and would willingly embrace their resolutions. Within few dayes after they were assembled, they sent the Marquis of Mouffay, with some other Deputies with D seuen Articles vnto the King.

1, Touching the reuocation of the Edict for the Church-lands in Bearne. 2, Concerning the continuation of their places of safety. 3, To haue the Gouverneur of Lestoure changed being become a Catholique. 4, To haue two Councillors of the Religion receiued into the Parliament of Paris. 5, To haue a substitute among the Kings learned Councill in the said Parliament. 6, To haue satisfaction touching the businesse of Tartas. 7, And for the burning of the Temple of Bourg. The Deputies had this answer given them, That it did ill befit the subjects (who termed themselves so zealous of the Royall authoritie) to treat with their King by speciall Articles; and that they should present all their demands together. Whereupon the Assembly laboured in such sort as their generall propositions E were concluded in the beginning of December: with a resolution not to dissolve the assembly, vntill they had a full satisfaction of their demands, and the execution of the same. They were caried to the Court by the Seigneurs of Courelles, of Bouteroue, and Allain, who presented them into the King the 20 of December, and in giuing them, the Seigneur of Courelles said vnto his Maieftie:

Speech of the Deputies of the Religion to the
King.

Sir, we acknowledge it to be an ineffimable honour vnto vs, that it pleaseth your Maieftie to giue vs so free access vnto you, to present our requests, and most humble supplications. For although, Sir, it seemes to some that the humble petitions which wee presented vnto your Maieftie, for the maintaining of your Edicts, concerne vs alone, yet we may sincerely protest before God, that it is not our owne interest, that so much moues F vs, as the desire of the quiet of your estate, and to preferre our selues for the good of your seruice, which will be an excellent meanes to maintaine all your subjects in peace, so much desired of all good men.

An order made by the Assembly touching Catholique
Preachers.

About the end of December, the said assembly made an order, touching Catholique Preachers, which should goe to preach in their Townes of safetie; forbidding all Gouvernours, Maiors, and Sheriffs, to suffer any Iesuits, or of any other order, to preach being sent by the Bishops of the Diocese.

The

A The Kings Proctor generall presented a request to the Parliament of Paris; against the said order. Whereupon there was a Decree made; commanding all Gouvernours and other Officers of the reformed Religion, to receiue all Preachers, were they Iesuits or of any other Order, that should be sent from their Bishops; for the comfort and instruction of Catholikes: forbidding them & all other the Kings subiects, to hinder them in their Sermons, or other spirituall functions, vpon paine to be declared troublers of the publique peace, and guiltie of treason.

Vpon the fourteenth of October, the Queene Mother went from Chynon, to Saumur; and came to lodge at Pont de Cé, and on the sixteenth she made her ioyfull entry B into Angiers. The Marshall of Boisdauphin, the Commander of La Porte, Gouverneur of the Towne and Castle of Angiers, the Marquis of Bellay, the Earle of Montfoucault, and the Marquis of Breszé being followed by fiftene hundred Gentlemen well appointed, went to meet her: coming neere the towne, there were 6000 Inhabitants in armes to attend her, where she was receiued with Orations, triumphant Arches, and stately shewes and inuentions: all which I must leaue to the original.

But leauing the Queenes entry into Angiers, wee will obserue the Prince of Conde's C coming out of the Castle of Bois de Vincennes. The King being come to Compeigne, he resolved to set him at libertie; hauing bene a Prisoner euer since the first of September 1616, whereof he aduertised him by his Letters of the 17 of October. On the nineteenth the King being accompanied by his brother and all the chiefe men in Court, came to Chantilly, from whence he sent Monsieur de Luynes to the Prince, to whom he deliuered this Letter from the King. Cousin, I will not tell you how much I loue you, you see it, I send vnto you my cousin the Duke of Luynes, who knows the secrets of my heart, and will acquaint you therewith at large; come to mee as speedily as you can, for I attend you with impatience: And in the meane time I will pray vnto God to haue you in his keeping.

At the same instant his guards retired, and he with the Princeesse his wife went to walk into the Parke, where Monsieur de Luynes acquainted him with his Maiefties pleasure: which done, he returned to the Castle. Hee lodged that night at Paris, and returned the D next day to Vincennes, from whence he parted with Monsieur de Luynes, Monsieur Cadines his brother, and many others to goe vnto the King, who had commanded the Duke of Mayenne as great Chamberlaine, to goe and meet him, and to bring him into his Maiefties Cabinet.

At his entrance, the Prince saluting the King, and bending his knee to the ground, King raised him vp, saying; Cousin you are welcome: then retiring themselves apart, they had some conference together: which done, the King commanded him to goe and refresh himselfe; and the next day the King and the Prince, with the whole Court returned to Compeigne; and on the fixe and twentieth of Nouember, there was a Declaration E to be made, touching the Prince of Conde's deliuerie. By which he declared the Prince to be innocent; of all those things which had bene imposed vpon him, and wherewith they had charged his honour and reputation; and had made it a pretext to haue him committed: reuoking all Letters, Declarations, Edicts, Decrees, Sentences, and Iudgements, made against his said Cousin, which might any wayes preiudice him; commanding them to be taken out of all the Registers of his Courts of Parliaments, and other places, and that the memory thereof might bee suppressed. His pleasure also was, That the Prince should enjoy all his charges, and governments, rights, prerogatives and preheminences appertaining to his qualitie, as hee did before his detention and arrest.

A Declaration
touching the Princes deli-uerie.

The King hauing a desire, to take away all the ieaalousies which of late yeares had bin F between the Gouverneur of Picardy, and the Gouvernours and Capitaines of the Cittadell of Amiens; and to assure the peace and quiet of that Prouince, he made these changes following.

The Duke of Longueuille, who was Gouverneur of Picardie, and Capitaine of the Castle of Han: Leauing those places, was made Gouverneur of Normandie, and of the towne of Depee.

And the Duke of Montbazon, who was Lieutenant generall for the King in Picardie, and Gouverneur of the Towne and Cittadell of Amiens, hauing resigned those charges, He

He gaue him the government of the Ile of France, and of the Townes and Castles of A Spillons and Noyon, whereof Monsieur de Luyne had bene Gouvernor: to whom hee gaue the government of Picquard, and of the towne and Citadell of Amiens; and his brother Monsieur de Cadiner, was made Lieutenant Generall of that Province: who at the same instant married the only heire of the deceased Vidame of Amiens, and Lord of Picquemy. The Plague ceasing at Paris, the King returned; and on the fourteenth of November, Monsieur de Luyne Earle of Maille, obtained his Majesties Letters to change his name of Maille to Luyne, and was received Duke and Peere of France.

In December the Earle of Fustemberg, Ambassador from the Emperor, came to Paris, where he was entertained and stayed with great state by the Kings Officers. B The subiect of his Embassie was, to demand aide from the King, against the Elector Palatine, who, as he said, had invaded his Realme of Bohemia. Soone after, there came a discourse entitled, An aduice vpon the causes of the Alterations in Europe, sent to all Kings and Princes, for the preservation of their Realmes, and Estates, made by the Baron of Frydemburg, and presented to his Majestie by this Ambassador.

This seemed to giue some touch to the Marshall of Bouillon, in regard of his alliances with the Count Palatine, and the Prince of Orange, generall of the Forces in Holland. They did suggest in their discourses: That the Electors accepting of the Crowne of Bohemia, had bene by his aduice and counsell. Whereupon there was a Letter published in the Marshalls name; by way of aduice vnto the King, touching the Embassie from C his Imperiall Majestie, as followeth.

Sir, hauing vnderstood that your Majestie will not be displeased, that I should giue you my aduice, touching the present Estate of the affaires of Germany; and feeling my selfe besides bound therunto, by my Oath vnto the Crowne, I will make bold to represent vnto your Majestie, with that most humble respect which is due vnto you, that which in » this occurrent, I suppose to concerne the good of your seruice and State.

» I will not speake of the right, which the Estates of the Kingdom of Bohemia pretend to haue, in the Election which they haue made of King Frederic, because the causes & reasons are apparant, by the writings which they haue caused to be published. I will insit only vpon that which concerne the interest and that party which it seemes your Majestie D

» should take in this affaie in the estate it is in at this present.

» It is well knowne, Sir, that the Emperor Ferdinand, seeing the authoritie of his house almost lost in Germany, and hopelesse to be recovered by their owne forces, or them of Spaine, endeouoreth by all meanes to conuert his common interest into the publike cause of Religion, to engage all the Catholique Princes in a common defence for the recovery of what he hath lost; and to this end it seemes he hath of late sent an Ambassador to your Majestie to demand aide. But you may by your wisdom easily distinguish the cause and the pretext, when you shall know that the Catholique Religion, is publickly maintained in Bohemia, and the incorporated Provinces, as the said King hath protested by his Letters to your Majestie, and by the Declaration which hee hath published of the causes which had moued him to accept that Crowne. So as this businesse nothing concerning Religion, but the State, your Majestie would not bandy in fauour of the house of Austria, against a Prince of the Elector Palatine House, alwayes allyed to your House and Crowne. From whom the Kings your Predecessors, haue bene alwayes assisted, and especially the deceased King your Father, in the defence of his House, Person, and lawfull succession: who being by reason of his marriage so strictly allied to the King of Great Britaine; besides his generall alliance with the Townes and Protestant Princes of Germanie, should without doubt be much assisted by that prudent and iust Prince, who hath alwayes affected the good of your Realme, and would take it ill if he saw, that vnder a false pretext, and by a common Councell, they fought the ruine of his soune-in-law, F and of his hereditarie estates. Wherefore if your Majestie were to resolute to assit the one or the other, I thinke it were fittest for your seruice, to preterre the alliances of your Crowne, and to assit them if they had need, to prevent the enterprizes, which the House of Austria and Spaine might make to the preiudice of his estate, if they found it weake, as hath bene alwayes practised by the Kings your predecessors, who haue alwayes fauoured those whom this house would haue oppressed. For this reason, K Henry the second tooke vpon him the protection of the Protestant Princes of Germany, against the Marshall of Bouillon's Letter of aduice to the King touching Bohemia.

A the Emperor Charles the 5. and the deceased King your father, hath also fauoured the Estates of the vniued Provinces; notwithstanding that they are of the reformed Religion; and your Majestie after his example, and following his Maxims, hath openly assisted the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Duke of Neubourg in their pretensions to Cleues and Iuliers, to crosse the Emperors and King of Spaines designs, who vpon diuers pretences would haue seized vpon that succession. And since vpon the like consideration; the Duke of Suboy hath felt the effects of your Majesties succours, whom they would perswade, that they arme against the Catholique Religion: That they are in danger in Germany; for that the Estates of Bohemia haue chosen a new King; who, on the other side say, that B it is to maintain their liberties, rights and priuiledges, vnder which they are borne, and the lawes of that kingdom, as well for Religion; as Government; the which (say they) they haue broken and violated, with a designe to make it hereditarie; notwithstanding that it hath alwayes depended vpon the free Election of the Estates of the Country. But howsoever, Sir, it is worthy of your Majesties zeale and pietie, to haue a care of the Religion; whereof you make profession, yea, to defend it, if any seek to oppress it; and it seemes that vpon the apprehension and distrust, which the Ecclesiasticall Princes, and other Catholiques of Germanie haue, they haue reason to arme in their territories; to hinder all attempts against their Religion and Estates; so as they hold there: the which I thinke, is in a manner impossible, considering the practices they vse to draw them only C without your Majesties mediation or authoritie, the which alone might retaine either party, letting them know that you will be a stickler to maintain the peace and quiet of Germany, whereby they may enioy the priuiledges & common liberties of the country; as well in that which concerne the politike government as Religion, against those which would violate and infringe them. And to attaine vnto so good an end; if your Majestie haue any such resolution, it is necessary you should procure an Assembly, where the Kings and neighbour Estates which were not interferred, might be invited to mediate by their Ambassadors, and search out by a common consent, the most fit and conuenient meanes to take away the cause and pretext of Armes: to assure Religion; to free the Catholiques from feare and distrust: assure the Emperors authoritie, which is D now weak and much shaken; and so to quench the fire, which threatneth not only to burne all Germany, but all Christendome, which is in danger (if it be not quickly prouided for) to be ouer-runne by the Turke, through their diuisions. And it may be, that the difficulties which some few months may shew, both vnto the one and the other party of comming to the end of their pretensions by Armes, there might be some ouerture made for a good accord and agreement; the glory whereof would redound vnto your Majestie: who by this meanes, as the Kings your predecessors, shall make your selfe common Arbitrator of the Empire, and all Europe. Behold, Sir, what I haue thought good to represent vnto your Majestie vpon this subiect, whom I beseech most humbly to take it in good part, as proceeding from a true Frenchman, & most faithful vnto your Crown: who E foresees the inconueniences which may arise from all parts, and the issue of Armes to be doubtfull and vncertaine, which by the iust iudgement of God, might in the end turne to the ruine of those, who by warre endeouore to force mens consciences to the danger of religion it self, which they take for a pretext of their Armes. Thus praying to God to poure forth his blessings vpon your Majestie, I remaine, &c. From Sedan the 4. of Decemb. 1619.

Now the King desiring to shew the Emperour and other Princes of Germanie, that if he meddled with their differences, it should bee but as his Predecessors had done: namely, to send a great and honorable extraordinary Embassie, which in visiting the Emperour and the Princes & Estates of the Empire of both vnions, should mediate the pacifying of the troubles of Bohemia, and the alterations which were growing in Germanie betweene the Princes of the one and the other Religion. According to which Deliberation, he made choise of the Duke of Angoulême, and Earle of Auvergne; with the Seigneurs of Berthoules, Baron of Selles, and of Aubospine, Abbot of Preaux, to be his extraordinary Ambassadors in Germanie: but they went not out of France vntill the yeare following, as we shall see hereafter.

We will begin this yeare with the Ceremonies of the Order of the Holy Ghost, which were performed in the Church of the Augustins at Paris, where the King made and created certaine Knights, according to the nomination made in the Chapter of the said Order, held on the 5 of December last past at S. Germaine in Lay. On New-yeares A Eve, after dinner, the King & the ancient Knights of the order, with the Knights which were to be created, came to the President Seguier house, neere the Augulins, from whence about three of the clocke, they went to the Augulins Church to Euen-song.

First, the Archers of the great Prouost, led by his Lieutenants, the hundred Swiflers of the Guard, the Kings Trumpets, Fifes, and Drumes, clothed in his Maiesties Linc-rie of blue Velvet, marched before those Knights which were to be received, who went two, and two together; the hindmost of which was the Kings brother, and before him the young Earle of Soissons. There were five Prelates named to be associates to the Order, which were the Cardinall of Retz; the Archbishop of Tours; the Bishop of Carcaffone, B the Bishop of Orleans; and the Bishop of Marseilles. There were 59 Knights received at this creation, being the fiftenth after the first institution.

The Deputies of the Assembly of the reformed Religion at Loudun, had presented the Articles of their grievances in the end of the last year, and had demanded the execution thereof, before they should dissolve their assembly: the which was contrary to the Kings permission; according to the which, having drawne their complaints, they should name fixe Deputies, whereof the King should choose two, to reside in Court to sollicite an answer to their grievances, and to haue a care to the execution of that which should be decreed in his Maiesties Councell.

The King seeing that they continued in their resolution, and would not name their Agents, he sent Monsieur du Mayen a Councillor of State, and Maresfort, who comming into the Assembly on the tenth of Ianuary, Du Mayen said vnto them: My Masters you haue sent by the Kings Letters, the Commission here giuen vs, to acquaint you with his good intentions, and to deliuer you his commandements, vpon the occurrents of this assembly. I will deliuer these two points briefly; and I assure my selfe, that you will giue so fauourable a hearing to the one, as the other shall be followed with a speedy obedience: seeing it is a father which speaks vnto his children; the Master to his good seruants, and the King to his natural subiects; who protest that they breathe nothing but the reformation of the Church and Religion. I will first tell you my masters, that the King hath commanded vs to assure you that his intention is, to make you enioy fully, D and peaceably, whatsoever hath beene granted by the Edicts of Kings his Predecesssors, and his Maiestie. To this end he hath beene pleased you should set downe your grievances in generall, hath received them fauourably (notwithstanding that you haue presented them before your separation, contrarie to the accustomed forme) and promised you to make them labour seriously about the answer, and within one moneth, to let you haue the execution.

Touching the second point, he said, The King had commanded them to let the assembly vnderstand; that seeing he had their demands and grievances, and they his promises to receiue all fauour and iustice; the long subsistence of the Assembly, could not bee pleasing vnto him, being not onely vnprofitable, but also preiudicial to his authoritie, E and might rather cause scandall, then edifie his subiects. That hee could not allow of the reason they gaue, saying, that they would onely attend the answers and executions of their demands: nor yet the reiterated supplications they might make: for that it seemes they would extort that which they must attend from his meere grace and bounty; or participate with him in the bond which his subiects of the reformed Religion owe him, for the graces, fauour, and iustice which they shall receiue. Wherefore his Maiestie hath giuen vs in charge to command you expressly from him, to proceed forthwith to the nomination of fixe Deputies, of which (according to the custome) we will make choice of two to remaine in Court: And to separate your selues within fiftene dayes at the farthest, beginning at this present tenth of Ianuary, and every man to returne into the Prouince from whence he was deputed, to carry his promises to all his good subiects of the reformed Religion, with assurance they should be speedily followed: with all the desired and iust effects they can hope from their good King.

The Assembly gaue them no other answer, but that they must reiterate their most humble supplications vnto the King, to whom they sent their Deputies: whereof they presently aduertised all their Churches of what had past touching this subiect: complaining that the execution of promises made to them of the reformed Religion

A lition, was the cause of the subsistence of their assembly. That King Henry the Great had allowed the continuance of their assembly at Saumur, in the year 1599. That the question was to repaire the Edict of Nantes. That there was no touch of the Kings authoritie: the question being onely to iuge iustice to his subiects troubled. And that the resolution of the assembly was, not to separate themselves before that all which concerne d the iustice of their complaints were executed.

The Deputies came vnto his Maiestie with Letters, protesting their humble submission and seruice; and shewing how necessarie it was, for the reformed Religion to haue strong Townes for their safety. But they had no other answer, but that they must obey his Maiesties will, whereof he had acquainted them by du Mayen and Maresfort.

Soone after, there was a Declaration verified in Parliament against those of the Assembly at Loudun. By the which he declared their guiltie of treason, if they did not separate themselves within the prefixed time, which was three weekes, during which they should name their Deputies to reside in Court.

After which (they not obeying) he declared the assembly vniuersally, and contrarie to his authoritie and seruice. This Declaration made many of both religions apprehend some new alterations. They saw that the ialousies of such as had taken Armes the yere before, increased. Some great men of the reformed Religion (as is mentioned in the Declaration) ill affected to the State, made visits for the continuance of the said distress, in those places whither they could not goe without giuing the King cause to suspect that they had some bad intent; as it appeared afterwards by the effects.

At this time, the Marshall de Saligny came to Paris, and was receiued Duke and Peere of France in Parliament, Monsieur de Chastillon was also there. These two being of the Religion, began to deale in this businesse. The King was well pleased therewith; and gaue charge to the Prince of Conde and Duke of Luynes to treat with them.

Having heard the Deputies of the Assembly, and seene their complaints, they found that they consisted vpon three chiefe points. First, in the reception of two Councillors in the Parliament of Paris. Secondly, to put a Governor of the Religion into L'Escluse: D and thirdly, to haue a Briefe for the continuance of places of safety. Of which three points the Prince of Conde and Duke of Luynes promised verbally, that they of the Religion should haue all satisfaction and content within fixe moneths.

And touching the restitution of the Clergie goods in Beare, That within one moneth after the expiration of the said fixe moneths, his Maiestie would heare the remonstrances of the reformed Churches of Beare.

The Prince and Luynes, gaue their words in the Kings name, for the execution of these promises: conditionally that the assembly should proceed speedily to the nomination of fixe persons, whereof his Maiestie should choose two to bee general Deputies for the reformed Churches in Court: after which choice the said Assembly should separate themselves. The Duke of D'Elidignieres, and Earle of Chastillon, hauing aduertised the assembly of the conditions of this Treatie, they returned them answer that they were well satisfied therewith.

The Assembly named fixe persons, whereof the King made choice of two. There remained nothing now, but for the Assembly to dissolve it selfe. They desired to haue in writing that the three Articles promised, should be effected within fixe moneths; and for want thereof, it should be lawfull for them by the same writing to assemble themselves again, without any new permission; touching the inexecution of the said promises.
Monsieur de Plessis Morisy, had commandement from the King by the Duke of Chastillon to assure the Assembly at Loudun, that what had beene promised them; should be kept and effected. Vpon their reiterated demand to haue the permission in writing to assemble againe within fixe moneths, if the three Articles were not executed, Monsieur de Luynes told them that they should not haue any thing in writing; but he promised to doe all his endeavour with his Maiestie for the permission, in case those things promised were not executed. Hereupon Monsieur de Plessis sent vnto the Assembly, representing vnto them of what weight the Kings word should be. Whereupon the assembly dissolved, and they returned into their Provinces.

Whereupon he made choice of the Duke of Angoulême, and others as we have formerly said, to goe both to the Protestant Princes and States, which were ancient Allies to the Crowne of France, and to the Emperour. To exhort both the one and the other party, not to enter into warre one against another, as it seemed they were inclined; and that they should only give succours to the Emperour, or the Bohemians, according to their affections, and that within the Realme of Bohemia and Austria, where the warre was, and nowhere else. And secondly, to mediate some accord betwene the Emperour, and the Estates of Bohemia, who had chosen the Elector Palatine for their King.

Dispute about holding the Towell to the
King.

About this time there were promises of humble marriages betwene the young Lady of Bourbon, daughter to the Prince of Conde, and the Prince of Giville, eldest sonne to the Duke of Guise: and the Duke of Joyeuse, second sonne to the Duke of Guise, with the Duke of Luynes Daughter. There also hapned a dispute about giving the Towell to the King, betwix the Prince of Conde, first Prince of the Blood, and the Count Soissons, a Prince also of the Blood, and Lord Steward of the Kings House, which to appeale, the King sent presently for his brother, who held the same to his Maiestie.

The Prince of Conde, as first Prince of the Blood, maintained that none in France ought to present the Towell to the King before him, except his Maiesties brother. And the Earle of Soissons, as high Steward and Prince of the blood, maintained that his office joynd with his qualitie of Prince of the Blood, could not give place to any person but a sonne of France. The friends of both these Princes repaired to their Houses to offer them their services.

The Duke of Guise, joynd himselfe vnto the Prince of Conde. And the Duke of Mayenne (who was already in some difference with the Prince) drew to the Earle of Soissons: so all those which were not in good termes with the said Prince, or the Dukes of Guise or Luynes, cast themselves on this side. On the other side, all such as were discontented with the creation of the Knights of the Holy Ghost, or for that they were not of the number, or who (having been named) would not accept thereof, because of the pretensions of their precedencies; and some about the placing of the Ladies (about the Queene) at their Ceremonie: So that (as we shall see hereafter) the said Earle of Soissons, with many other Princes and Noblemen, retired themselves one after another from the Court, to ioyne their discontents with the jealousies and distrusts which they possessed the Queene Mother withall.

Court.

In the meane time the King (being at Fontaine-Blau) sent the Duke of Montbazon to Angiers, to sollicite the Queene Mother, to draw neere vnto him, and come vnto the Court. And vpon the assurance they gaue him shee would come, his Maiesty went to Orleans to meet her, where he received aduice that she could not as yet come, for the reasons which the Controller of her house (whom he would send vnto his Maiesty) should deliuer.

She excuseth
her selfe.

The King being come backe againe to Fontaine-Blau, was aduertised that the Duke of Mayen (whom hee left at Paris) had taken Post and was gone into his Government without any other leaue then what hee tooke by this Letter which he wrote from Precigny.

Monseigneur
Mayenne
Letter to the King.

Sir, I neuer did any thing with more discontent, and vnwillingnesse, then to part from Paris, before I had the honour to receiue your Maiesties commandement. But having too long neglected an aduice given mee of some designe against my person, it hath beene confirmed by so many, and with so strong assurances, as I was constrained that I might otherwise mischance which threatened mee) to depart thus sodainly. I craie your Maiesties pardon for the same with all sorts of submission, appertaining to a most humble seruant and subiect; beseeching you not to make mee so vnhappie, as to deprive mee of the honour of your gracious fauour in this regard. For in all the rest of my actions I finde my selfe so cleare, as I haue more reason to impute your iustice against such as would slander them; then any need to haue recourse vnto your clemencie. I hope, Sir, that God will giue mee the grace to performe the like hereafter, or better. And I am going into my Government with this firme resolution

to

A to render vnto your Maiesty all faithfull endeauours, to preferre the reputation (which I hold dearer then my life) to be your Maiesties most humble obedient and faithful subiect and seruant, H. de Lorraine. From Precigny the thirtieth of March, 1620.

1620

Vpon the retreat of the Duke of Mayenne from Court, they assured the King there was a faction framed, and that the Dukes of Vendosme and Longueville were intaged: who iudging themselves not to be safe in Court, the one of them tooke his way towards his government of Normandie; and the other to Anet, from thence to Vendosme, and afterwards to the Queene Mother at Angiers.

Two moneths time was spent, in diuers voyages to and fro, which the Seigneur of Blainville and other persons on the Kings party, made vnto the Queene Mother at Angiers, to treat with her of the contentment which she desired; that she might come to the King, and by this means disperse the clouds, which began to appeare in many of the Prouinces, vnder this faire pretext of reformation of the State. But they preuailed little with her at this time by meanes of her distrusts.

In Iune, many Princes and Noblemen retired from Court one after another, which they performed by night. Of the Princes, the Duke of Nemours was the first which beganne, and was followed on the next day by his wife, who went straight towards Angiers. Three daies after, the Earle of Soissons and the Countesse his Mother, withdrew themselves by night, and went to Dreux, and from thence to the Queene mother. Two daies after, they were followed by the Cheualier of Vendosme, Grand Prior of France. The King had giuen vnto this Prince, (after the Marshall D'Ancre death) the best of his Benefices and Offices, namely, the Abbey of Marmoutier in Touraine, and the Government of the Towne and Castle of Caen, the best place of Normandy; and of all those which should come to bee on the Queenes party: Wherefore he sent thither with all speed, the Seigneur Prudent his Lieutenant, who came vnto the Castle on the first of Iuly to strengthen the place with all which he should hold fit to defend a siege.

All these Princes thus retired from Paris and their associates, they gaue out, that the motiue of their leaving the Court, was, because they could not endure (but with greife) the disorder of the State. That they could not impure it vnto the King, but vnto his Favourites, who being raised from a meane condition, vnto a great and mighty fortune, did wholly enioy his Maiesties cares and his bounty. That the Queene Mothers partie (as being the most iust) would prouoe the strongest; that it was vpheld by the greatest number of the Princes & chiefe Officers of the Crowne: that their designe ought not to be termed rebellion, because all the malecontents were the Kings good seruants, but capitall enemies vnto his fauorites; that they would onely settle the State which was almost ruined: That the Queene notwithstanding would not be the first which should arme, but in case they oppressed any of those of her partie, or her allies, that then her defence should be iust, and haue some appearance.

According to the common course in all combustions, many Discourses were dispersed abroad, touching the deformations which they sayd to bee in the State. Some of them were Sarrycall: others more milde, which they entituled, Christian verities vnto the most Christian King, words a little more sacred, but to the life effect.

The Queene
Mothers
parties.

The King was aduertised from many places, that they leauied Souldiers openly in the Queene mothers name: That in Normandy the Duke of Longueville had a partie, who held Diepe on this side the Riuer of Seine, with purpose to make himselfe sole master of Rouen: That beyond the Riuer of Seine, the great Prior of France held the Castle of Caen: and that the Earle of Torigny, the Duke of Longuevilles alie, was Lieutenant generall in Basle Normandy: That the Earle of Soissons holding Dreux and La Fyrté Bernard, would be master of the Country of Perche, and a part of Mayen: That the Governor of Alençon was of their party: That the Marshall of Bois-Dauphin had the passages of the Riuers of Sarre and Mayenne, holding in his possession the Townes of Sablé and Chasteaugontier: and the Duke of Vendosme those of the Riuer of Loire. The Queene mother had Angiers and Pont de Cé, a passage vpon Loire, with all the Nobility of the Countie in a manner, which were of her faction. On the other side of Loire, shee had Chynon vpon the Riuer of Vienne, to walke into Touraine, where Loches held for the Duke of Epernon. Monseigneur de la Tremouille Duke of Tours, and the Duke of Retz were Masters in Poitou, which ioynes vpon Loire, and in Britany opposite on the other side.

[v3]

1620

The Duke of Roannois had his lands lying in the midst of Poitou, for the leauing of A souldiers. The Duke of Rohan Gouverneur of Saint Iohn D'Angely, was Master in bafe Poitou neere the Sea. The Duke of Elpernon commanded throughout all Angoulmois, and Xaintonge, and vpon all the Riuer of Charente: and the Duke of Mayenne in his Government of Guienne and Bourdeaux. The Viscount of Aubeterre, held Blaye, and the mouth of the Riuer of Gironde. Barbin leauied souldiers in Liege, to passe ouer at Metz, which was held by Monf. de la Valette, the Duke of Elpernon's sonne. And the Duke of Nemours had sent Falquier his Secretarie, to leauy souldiers in the Country about Genéua.

This was the estate of the Queene Mothers party, which held many Prouinces, from B Diepe in Normandy, vnto the other side of the Riuer of Garonne, being almost two hundred leagues. A party wherein we see great perfonages of either Religion, hauing many good Captaines with strong places vpon all the Riuers. A faction which without troubling themselves to besiege Townes, should haue marched directly to Paris with a great Armie, to reforme the abuses which they said were in the State: thinking it so easie, as they held it in a manner done. Many were not of his opinion, who held this enterprise to be like the warre of the Common-weale, vnder the raigne of Lewis the eleuenth, for that there were too many Princes and Generals of Armies, to continue long together without ialousies; or to performe any exploit of worth; and that in stead of a reformation, they would breed a deformation in France: yea although the successe should C be answerable to their designs: for that they were thus vnited, only for their owne priuate interest.

The King foreseeing that whatsoever hapned, the discommoditie of the warre must fall vpon his estate and subiects, resolved to send an honorable deputation by Du Peron Archbishop of Sens; the Duke Montbazon, Monsieur Belgarde Master of the Horse, and President Jannin to treat with the Queene Mother of the meanes to pacifie these alterations in the breeding; and on the other side to arme strongly, to reduce those by force, which should not yeeld to reason: And to the end there shall bee no stirring in Britanie, he sent the Marshall of Brisac thither. But before their departures, both Monf. de Belgarde and the Marshall, were receiued Dukes and Peeres of France in Parliament.

The Popes Nuncio, desiring to imploy his seruice, and his Holinesse authoritie to reconcile the Queene Mother with the King, he wrote a Letter vnto her, and recommended it vnto the Archbishop of Sens: by the which hee gaue her to vnderstand, how much his Holinesse was grieved, to see their old ialousies reuiued, the which were growne to discontentments. That he had receiued commandement to doe all good Offices with the King, bestirring a businesse of that importance. That the King had protested, that he had been alwayes carefull to giue her Maiestie all satisfaction, and that he did not thinke to haue euer failed to yeeld her all due honour and respect. That hee had often inuited her to come vnto him, and to that end had sent diuers times vnto her. In the end hee exhorted the Queene in his Holinesse name, that she would likewise contribute for her part, whatsoever might serue to reconcile her to the King her sonne, and to vnite their wils: coniuering her by all meanes, to auoid the occasions which might bring matters to extremitie and draw them to Armes.

Some write, that the King hauing prayed earnestly to God to inspire him what hee should doe for his glory, and the safety of his Estate, he called a Councell, where he assisted in person; and where many aduertisements were represented from all the Prouinces of a neere rebellion. They first considered of the factions which were in Paris, and the restraint of some of their minds who had places in Soueraigne Courts.

After this, they treated of those of Normandie, and particularly of Rouen, where the first President and almost all the Officers of Soueraigne Courts, were for the Kings service; and yet there were many of place and qualitie which did fauour the Duke of Longueuille Gouverneur of Normandie, who was of the Queene Mothers faction. They were also aduertised of many practices made by them of the reformed Religion, whereof there were many in that towne; so as the fire began to kindle, the which they must seeke speedily to quench, & to giue order in like manner for the Castle of Caen, whither the Grand Prior of France had sent Prudent, to fortifie it, and make himselfe Master of the towne.

Two factions in Rouen.

A Some said that they should not suffer that Prouince to bee lost, which was the bafe Court to the Loure: but others considering the estate of affaires, were of opinion, that he should first looke to the preservation of Paris, before that of Rouen and Caen. That the Kings presence in Paris, would disperse all factions, if there were any: wherefore his stay there was most necessarie; and that there was nothing so dangerous, as to draw his Maiestie out of that great Citie. And that if Normandie were oppressed by the factions, they might recouer it at another time. That leauing Paris, it would fauour the designe of those mutines: and that all factions which had been made in France, did commonly come and demand Peace, or make warre about Paris. And that those forces which were leauied B in Liege, and which might come from Metz, might suffice to oppresse it. They did also represent, that if the King did not enter into Rouen, but would passe on to assure Caen, vndoubtedly all the other Townes would grow amazed, and the Kings reputation would be blemished, both within and without the Realme. They also spake of the danger wherein the King should be if hee found the forces of Normandie in front, those of Angiers on his side, those of Champagne at his backe marching towards Paris; and those of Gaienne and Aulgoumois vpon the banks of Loire.

His Maiestie having heard all these difficulties with attention, he said generously: That amidst so many dangers which presented themselves, they must enter into the greatest and needfullest, which was in Normandie: and that his opinion was to goe thither directly, and not to stay in Paris to see his Realme in prey, and his faithfull seruants oppressed. That hee had a great hope in the innocence of his Armes, and that his conscience could not reproach him to haue failed of his duty to the Queene his Mother; of iustice to his people; and of bounty to all the great Perfonages of his Realme.

The Prince of Conde, and the Duke of Luynes, were the first which did second his Maiesties opinion, saying, that it was more honorable and safer: for that if it pleased God to suffer his first Armes to triumph in this voyage, he should thereby assure the Prouinces and great Townes which had not bene distracted: and strike a terrour into those which were reuolted. The rest of his Councell were of the same opinion. It is said the Prince added moreover, Sir, you must goe vnto them before they assure themselves: it is a point D of victorie, and the most expedient and easie. I haue found it by experience: for if at the alteration of Mezières, they had come directly vnto vs, before we had considered of our forces, as some had aduised Monf. de Villerey, without doubt they had easily separated vs.

Hauing in this Councell resolved to warre, they sent out diuers Commissions; to the Marshall of Themines, to oppose himselfe to the Duke of Mayen. The Earle of Rochefoucault, Gouverneur of Poitiers, to make head against the Duke of Rohan. The Marquis of Courténaur was sent vnto Touraine: And Monfieur de Bosompierre to fetch the troopes which were vpon the Frontiers of Champagne, and to conduct them speedily towards Chartres.

All Gouvernors of Prouinces were commanded to returne to their governments. So E the Duke of Guise prepared to goe into Prouence, and the Duke of Neuers into Champagne, with Commission to leauy troopes to oppose against the Liegeiois, which were coming for the Queene Mother.

Coming from Councell, the Seigneur of Roulet, great Prouost of Normandie, presenting himselfe vnto his Maiestie, said, That it was not fit hee should goe thither, where he should finde nothing but reuolts, and discontents: To whom the King answered, you are not of my Councell, I haue taken a more generous resolution. Vnderstand that if the way were all pauced with armes, I would passe vpon mine enemies bellies: seeing they haue no cause to declare themselves against mee, who haue not offended any man. You shall haue the content to see it: and I know you will reioyce at it, hauing serued the F ceased King my father so faithfully.

Before his going from Paris, hee sent for all the Soueraigne Courts and Magistrates, and recommended vnto them the preservation of his good Citie, where hee left the Queene his wife for Gouvernesse, and with her the Chancellor, and some of the Councell for the dispatch of all affaires; leading with him onely the Keeper of the Seales: and some Counsellors of State, and Masters of Requests, hoping to bee backe againe within three weekes.

Deputies come to the King
from Caen.

Noblemen, left Paris, and lodged at Pontoise, whither the Deputies of Caen came vnto him with Letters, to assure him of the inhabitants fidelitie, who according to his commandement were become Masters of the Towne, whereof they would giue him a good account: They let him vnderstand that his presence was very necessarie to preferre the Towne from the oppressions which threatened it; and that in the meane time they would defend themselves with their owne forces. The King had sent the Seigneur of Bellefons with Letters vnto them, giuing them to vnderstand, that the Grand Prior was retired discontented from Court, and that he desired the inhabitants would haue a care of his Towne of Caen vnder his obedience, and not suffer any one to enter the fronger. Bellefons (who had sometime bene Gouvernor there) made offer, that if the inhabitants would defend themselves against the Castle, hee would serue them: to whom they answered, That matters were not yet reduced to those extremities: That they were in good intelligence with those of the Castle, the which they would husband: That this discreet temporizing would more auail the Kings affaires, then his designe which was very hardy, and the successe doubtfull: That it was to no purpose to incense them of the Castle, and expose the Towne to the mercy of the Cannon: That dissembling was more profitable both for the aduancement of the Kings affaires, and of the Towne, on whose preservation depended the safety of the Prouince.

swer to the Deputies of Caen.

His Maiesties Letters were imparted to Seigneur Prudent, and hee was inuited to come into the towne to assist at their deliberations, who thanked the Deputies for this complement, entreating them to assure the bodie of the towne: That he desired nothing more then to serue them, and that they needed not feare any thing from the Castle: That the Grand Prior was not retired from Court to doe the King any bad seruice, but to defend himselfe from the oppression of his enemies, who had conspired to haue him arrested: That in taking leaue of the Grand Prior, he had commanded him expressely to haue a care to the preservation of his place and the towne, that if the inhabitants would lye in good intelligence with the castle, they should without danger see the miseries of other townes. Finally, he said, he had not so little experience in his profession, as he knew not how much it did import a Gouvernor to abandon his place in a doubtfull and suspicious time, the which he was resolu'd to preferre for the King vnder his Masters seruice, and that he would endure all extremities by an obdinate siege: Finally, that hee would suffer himselfe to be buried in the ruines thereof.

The Kings answer to the inhabitants of Caen.

The townsmen erected a Councell of the chiefe Magistrates, for the gouernment and guard of the Towne, wherewith they acquainted Prudent, entreating him to referre the order and the keyes to the disposition of the towne; for that the King desired they should remaine Masters: whereunto he yielded willingly. And this was the state of the towne when the Deputies came vnto the King, who sent them away with Letters of assurance of his great content for their obedience, and that within few dayes he would be with them, and in the meane time the Marshall of Prassin should come vnto them with two thousand foot and five hundred Swisses: and at the same time his Maiestie sent away the Marquis of Mauny, who came to Caen on the eight of Iuly, and after him the Seigneur of Arnauld. The King lodged within one daies iourney of Rouen, his Harbingers going thither before to make their lodgings: whereof the Duke of Longueville being aduertised, he sent for one of them, demanding where he had left the King? At Pontoise, my Lord, answered the Marshall, but this night hee lyes at Magny. Where make you account to lodge him, said the Duke? Here, my Lord, replied the Harbinger. It is reason, said the Duke, that I should quit him the place. The Duke had bene the same morning with the Parliament, and made protestation of his fidelity to the Kings seruice, but with some complaints for his owne private against those which were nere vnto his Maiesty, with whom they had put him in disgrace without cause: saying, that to auoyd the detention of his person, which they had long proiected, he was resolu'd to retire to Diepe: which hee did, and tooke horse about five of the clocke in the euening. At the same time also some officers and persons of quality left Rouen, whereof the King was aduertised the next day at his departure from Magny. Within an houre after the Dukes going from Rouen, Colonell Othano came thither by the Kings commandement, who presently visited the chiefe of the Parliament, and of the body of the City, assuring them that the King came with speed to settle an order for the combustions which they intended to make in Normandy. Hee had

A had also some conference with the Gouternor of the old Palace, telling him that his Maiesty held him for his seruice: and the gouernour gaue him his faith to serue the King: but being afterward aduertised not to stay the Kings coming, left hee were made an example, he retired and abandoned the place into which he had put 700 souldiers, besides the ordinary garrison. At the same time the Prince of Conde (whom his Maiesty had caused to aduance) arrived at Rouen, who commanded the Colonell to assure himselfe of the old Palace. The King was assured vpon the way that Rouen was wholly at his deuotion, all the riuers of Seine free, and the Duke of Longueville in the Country of Caux, so as he could by no means succour Caen but by Sea; whereupon he commanded the Marshall of Prassin, and Monf. de Greguy to aduance with all speed to Caen; with ten companies of his Guard, and one of Swisses. The King entred into Rouen on the tenth of Iuly, where the people attended him with generall acclamations of ioy and blessings. The Parliament went presently to tender their seruices vnto him: the first President moued his heart with a short Speech, as he gaue God thanks to haue preferred them from the rebellion which was so neere, confessing that his onely presence had prevented the desolation of the Prouince; and of the City. The next day his Maiesty went to the Parliament, where the Keeper of the Seales represented what had past since the alterations of Angoulême: The gratifications the Queene his mother had received, and the care he had to visit her: The offers which had bene lately made vnto her, and his tender affection. He then spake of the Letters which the King had sent vnto Monf. de Longueville to come vnto him, and to accompany him at his entry into the Prouince; and the refusal he had made. After which they presented Letters of suspension of the Dukes authoritie in the Gouernment of Normandie, vntill he had iustified himselfe in his Maiesties presence. The first President gaue the King most humble thanks, that he had vouchsafed to communicate his affaires to his Parliament, who had no part but obedience, & did not breathe but from his commandements, protesting an inuoluble fidelitie to his seruice, beseeching him, that as he had preferred them from danger by his coming, whereinto they had vndoubtedly fallen, so he would not depart the Prouince, vntill hee had settled their peace. His Maiesty stayed three dayes in Rouen, where he gaue order for the safety of this capital Citie: And at the request of the Parliament hee made new Capitaines, chosen out of the Soueraigne Courtes, who tooke their oath of fidelitie vnto his Maiesty.

The diuers pretexts which had embarked many, were suppressed by the Kings presence: for they write, that in all Normandy not about eight daies before, no man durst speake of the Kings name, but in blemishing his name and reputation; so powerful their practices were: That their designe was to assure themselves of Rouen on the ninth of the Moneth, by a great faction of the Nobility which followed the Duke of Longueville, and by 1200 Souldiers which should come thither, and make the execution easie: That it was a wonder, at the very brute of the Kings coming, there being three or foure hundred Gentlemen within the City, of all these there were but five & twentie remaining with the Duke, & all the rest protesting that they would serue the King: That the fidelitie of the Parliament and generally of other officers, was to be honored for ever; for that there was no kind of temptation but had bene tried to withdraw them from their obedience.

What passed at Caen.

But let vs observe what hath past at Caen: the inhabitants were wholly royall, and breathed nothing but the Kings seruice, yet they apprehended a Garrison, and that a Gouvernor for the King: attempting against the Castle, they should grow to those termes, as their towne should be ruined on the one side with the Cannon from the Castle, and on the other by the Kings troops which they would lodge in their houses. A considerable feare in a great towne. This Councell of the Towne then was forced discreetly to entertaine a correspondence with the Seigneur Prudent: but they had diuers intentions. He expected the Grand Prior with forces to constrain them of Caen to embrace the Queen mother's partie: And the Councell of the Towne drew on the time vntill the Kings coming to succour them, and that by his presence hee might reduce the Castle to his obedience.

You haue formerly heard what Bellefons offered vnto the Towne, and their answer: Prudent grew jealous of his stay there, sending word to the Councell of the towne that he could not endure it: That if they would entertaine their common intelligence, they must cause him retire: That he knew him to be a capital enemy to the Grand Prior: That if

if they would preferre themselves, they must not use this consequence: And that if the Towne did bandy against the Castle, he would come down with two thousand men with fire and sword, entreating them to resolve thereupon, and send him their answer. The Councell being assembled upon this occasion, they found it hard to entreat the Seigneur of Bellefont to retire, being sent from the King, and having offered his service to the Towne: notwithstanding, it was concluded, that he should be invited thitherunto. The Message was delivered, but he could not relish it: they returned his Answer, which was, That he would rather die then retire without a special commandment from the King, or at the least, a Decree made by the body of the Towne, for his justification to his Majesty: yet loone after, doubting a mutiny of the people, he left the towne; the like he did the Seigneur of Bleville, and Villain the Bayliffe of Caen.

The Earle of Thorigny comes to Caen
to riding to command
there.

The same day, the Earle of Thorigny, the Kings Lieutenant, came to Caen, being allied to the Duke of Longueville, and as they sayd, held his partie. The Councell of the Towne went to entreat him, that hee would allow of the order they had set downe for their preferation: That their Deputies had charge to know the Kings pleasure whom they should obey: That they were bound by his Majesties Letters and commandement, never to put his power to compromise. The Earle of Thorigny observed, that he must of necessity yeeld to that which they held: whereupon he returned the next day, seeing all the officers and chiefe Burgeses girt to their swords, and witnessing by their resolute countenances, that they had courage enough to preferre themselves in their ancient fidelitie, and to maintain their libertie. The Towne doubled their guards, and fortified their Suburbs with Barricadoes, and they of the Castle stood vpon their guard, drawing in all kind of victual and munition, to endure a siege.

The answer of the Councell
at Caen to the Marquis of Mauny.

The Marquis of Mauny and Arnault being arrived, went to the Town-house, to whom they spake somewhat obscurely, as if they would sound their disposition for the receiving of a garison: wherewith they were discontented, saying, That the Towne was not resolved to endure the insolency of Souldiers: That the King should not enter into distrust of their fidelities, their forepassed adions prefiging of the future: and that in stead of confirming the people in the Kings obedience, the word of Garison would thrust them into extremities: That having hitherto entertained a good correspondency with them of the Castle, they would make use of it until the Kings arrival: That they of the town would not commit the first acts of hostility; but if Prudent falsifying his oath and promiks, should seeke to force them, they would take aduice what was necessary for their defence.

Prudent being aduertised of these communications, he desired them to entreat the said Marquis and Arnault to retire: wherunto the Councell made answer, That being sent from the King they could not doe it without crime: but that hee should assure himselfe they should haue no command in the Towne, nor entry within their Councell. Yet to resist their obedience to his Majesty, they doubled their guards, drew their chains, to hinder the descent of them of the garison, and set Corps de guard vpon all the approaches to the Castle.

Vpon the tenth of Iuly, a Gentleman came from the Grand Prior, to aduertise the Towne that he dined at Falaise, and came to preferre the place, and to maintaine the liberty of the inhabitants, whom they sought to oppress with garisons, entreating them to suffer him to passe through the Towne to the Castle: to whom they made answer, That they were sorry the Grand Prior was in bad tearmes with the King, who came directly to Caen: That he should doe well for himselfe and them to submit himselfe, and not to lose a towne which had alwayes much honored and esteemed him: That for the passage he desired, they could not grant it through the Towne, and that hee might take some other way.

The Kings troops advanced towards Caen, and Monseur de Crequy entered the Town, affuring the Councell that the King burnt with impatience to deliuer them from the oppression of the Castle: That for their parts, they came not to ill treat the inhabitants, but rather to be ruled by them: That they would willingly expose their liues for their safety: and that they should give them the most dangerous places to guard: That it was their profession to hazard their liues for the Kings service, and that they had gotten their honors and charges by such generous acts. The Lieutenant General answered; That they held themselves very happy to be able to discharge the promise they had made to keepe

A keepe the towne for the King: That for the present, they which had taken the charge referred this care to them, and would hereafter rely vpon their vigilancy: yet the Towne should willingly furnish whatsoever should be necessary to their defence, and the inhabitants would be bound to ease their troops, and guard such Ports of the Towne as they pleased.

Soone after, the Marshall of Prallin arrived, who sent a Gentleman with a Trumpet to summon Prudent in the Marshalls name (who commanded the Kings army) to yeeld the place; perswading him to incline rather to obedience then rebellion. Prudent answered; That the place had become committed vnto him by the Grand Prior, and that hee would expect his commandement before he would resolve to leave it. This made Prudent look for a siege, and for that he had no Priests, he sent to demand two from the towne; but the Marshall would not suffer it, saying, That it was iust, seeing they were Rebels against the King, and guilty of treason; that they should all dye like beasts. To omit euery particular circumstance of this siege, the King gave commandment to the Marshall, to assault the Castle.

Vpon the twelfth, the King parted from Rouen, where hee learned by the Prince of Ioinville, that the Cardinall of Guise his brother had failed of his promise to his Majesty: And that it was reported hee was gone to ioyne with the Liegeois which should come for the Queenes party; for the which the Prince seemed to be much grieved: He continued his journey towards Caen, and came to Dues, which is within fuge Leagues vpon the Sea. There the Earle of Sardiny coming from Angiers, presented himselfe suddenly to his Majesty, to deliuer him a Letter: but he said vnto him, that hee knew well what it contained: That it had beene drawne at Paris: and that he would not receive it: That there were men of quality about the Queene his mother, whom she might acquaint with what he desired for her content. Whereupon he presently sent one to Angiers to aduertise his Deputies of the reasons which had moued him to refuse the Queenes Letters by the hands of Sardiny, commanding them to assure her, that he would never faile of his affection towards her, notwithstanding the pretexs which the suffered turbulent spirits to take for the troubling of his Realme.

D Some of the chiefe inhabitants of Caen came thither vnto his Majesty, to know the order of the ceremony he desired they should obserue at his entry. The King received them graciously, and spake much vnto them in few words, I will haue no ceremony, continue in seruing me well, and I will be a good King vnto you. Before the King would enter into the towne, he went to visit the Trenches which were brought vnto the Castle Ditch. Within an hour after his entry, hee sent Les Clusiaux with a Trumpet to summon Prudent to yeeld the place vnto the King, who was then in the Towne. At this summons hee made shew that he would maintaine the siege generously, and seemed ignorant of the Kings being in Caen, Les Clusiaux going out of the Castle, and passing by the Corps de guard, said aloud, that there was 10000 Crownes to bee gotten for him that should bring Prudent E head vnto the King. This liberty of speech did much discontent Prudent, yet hee knew well that Heralds were sacred persons, and that to wrong him were to violate the law of Nations: He therefore heard him without anwer.

Whilest the Kings men laboured in the Trenches, there grew some alteration in the castle. It began by the Souldiers which were in guard vpon the Bulwarke towards the towne, who were discontented for that they were too often visited. This murmure was soone dispersed to the Corps de guard, so as all the souldiers of the garison protested that they would not grow obstinate to maintaine a siege against the King. In the morning, they of the castle made a call, and Parfay Lieutenant to Prudent, desired to parlee with Monseur de Crequy. The King was aduertised hereof, and commanded him to goe. Parfay he sought him to tell him if the King were in person within the towne: whereof being assured, he made answer, that they were ready to open the gates to his Majesty without any capitulation. The King hearing of their intention, he sent the Seigneur of Crequy to grant them a pardon for their rebellion, in his Majesties name; and drew in two companies of the French Guards; and one of Swisses.

A little before this Treary, Prudent had retired into the dungeon with the Souldiers of the garison. Within halfe an hour after, Parfay went out of the Castle to crave pardon of his Majesty, the which he obtained; and receiued 1000 Crownes in recompence of his goods.

goods. On the eighteenth, the Garison came forth without any order. After dinner, the King went to see the Castle, being assisted by his brother, the Prince of Conde, the Duke of Luynes, and many other Noblemen. Prudent presented himselfe to the King, and craved pardon. His Majesty full of clemency, who forgets nothing but injuries, granted it.

Having well viewed and observed the place, finding it much stronger then they imagined, they beganne to smile at the weaknesse of Prudent, and the basenesse of such as had bene with him, who had yielded at discretion, without any capitulation or marke of honour: That if they had but lye upon their bellies, they might have stayed the Kings armie a month, and wonne themselves great reputation. This was their opinion of the Castle, saying in it, Thats hereafter to keepe places well, they must choose Foibles, for the Prudent were nothing worth.

In the evening Prudent left the Castle and Towne to goe make his excuse to the Grand Prior of France. Presently after this reduction, many Noblemen of that Country came vnto the King, and all the Townes of base Normandy brought their keys. It was thought that the iudicious carriage of the Councell of the towne, had much advanced his Majesties happy successe: for the destiny of France did in a manner depend of the fidelity or disobedience of this towne.

It was propounded in Councell, whether they should raze the Castle towards the Towne, to leaue this marke of libertie to the ancient fidelity of the inhabitants, and to give courage to other townes to follow their example in the like occasion. But it was not held necessary being so neere the Sea, and the passage from England to France, considering the danger the towne should be exposed vnto, if it were destitute of this reliefe, vpon the sudden descent of strangers; whereupon it was left untouched, and the Governour was given to the Marquis of Mauny. The inhabitants were gratified with diuers priuiledges, and some particular men were ennobled, leauing for cuer in the said Towne an honorable marke of their fidelities, and a glorious reputation to the King to haue preferred them from the danger wherein they were.

The King sent presently to Angiers to aduertise his Deputies of the reduction of the Castle of Caen. These newes troubled the Princes which were with the Queene, thinking they should soone haue the King with them to reduce them to obedience. Vpon the losse of this Castle, the Earle of Rochfort, the onely sonne of the Duke of Montbazon, was stayed in Angiers. The Duke himselfe retired to the King, and then to Paris, where he continued during this alteration as Governour of the Ile de France. They also caused the Duke of Nemours sonne to be seized on in Paris, and two of the Duke of Vendomes children by way of reprisall; but within few dayes after, they were all freed of their detentions. The King doubting the Castle of Alencon, sent Monsieur de Crequy with certaine troops to assure it: after which hee marched speedily to Mans, being called by the Marquis of Marigny their Gouvernor, who feared an enterprize, the which hee preferred happily for the Kings seruice and the whole Prouince.

The King desiring to goe directly to Angiers, to free all that was held by the discontented Princes and Noblemen, had sent Monsieur de Crequy before by the Duchy of Alencon, and County of Mayen: he himselfe parted from Caen on the 21 of Iuly, and tooke the left hand, to cleane the Country of Perche, where Dreux and diuers other Castles were held for the Earle of Soissons; and the Castle of Verneuil, with diuers other thereabout, for the Duke of Vendosme: as also to ioyne with those troops which Monsieur de Bassompierre had brought out of Champagne. Soone after, the Castles of Dreux, Verneuil, and La Ferté Bernard, yielded to the Kings obedience. The King being at Bellesme on the 28 of Iuly, he made a Declaration to the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne, which were retired vnto the Queene mother, to lay downe armes, and to come vnto him vpon paine of high treason: After repetition of many breaches made by them, he concludes, That in regard of the Queene his mother he could not beleue nor perswade himselfe that she had forgotten the loue whereunto Nature bound her, and the memory of his deceased Lord and Father required of her, and which hee himselfe had sought to deserve: And although he should carie her selfe otherwise towards him then she ought, yet would he haue no other feeling then a religious patience, and that approaching with his forces neere vnto them which borrowed her name, hee meant not to employ

A ploy them, but to free her from those which (to his prejudice and his Realmes) did captiuate her mind and will, and to hinder the designs they had to the ruine of his Estate. As for his Cousins, the Earle of Soissons, and the Countesse his mother, the Duke of Vendosme, and the great Prior of France, the Dukes of Longueville, Nemours, Mayen, Espérnon, Retz, Tremouille, Rohan, and Rohannois, the Marshall Bou-Dauphin, the Earle of Candale, the Marquis of La Vallette, the Archbishop of Thoulouse, and other Officers of this Crowne, he commanded them expressly to lay downe armes, and to forbear all acts of hostility against his subjects, to relinquish all leagues and associations both within and without the Realme; and within one month to come vnto him, and to giue him more ample assurance in person: promising (in so doing) to remit all crimes and offences committed against him in this last alteration, and to receive them into grace and fauour. And likewise to pardon all such as had followed them in armes, if within the time prefixed they retired to their houses, and made declaration thereof to the next Iudge. For not performance hereof, he declared them all guilty of treason, and troublers of the publique peace: To bee degraded of all their Honours, Governments, Dignities, Offices and Benefices, and their lands and Seigneuries to be vntied to his Crowne.

In the end of the month, the Castle of Vendosme was abandoned by him that kept it for the Duke, and the Grand Prior had a repulse with some losse, going to charge the Carabins quarter neere Mans; whereupon their army retired somewhat hastily towards Angiers and Pont Cé, which was some blemish to the Princes reputation, being done as it were in feare of the Kings army, which encreased daily both in horse, and new Regiments of Foot.

The King being come to Mans, the Archbishop of Sens (one of the Deputies which he had sent to the Queene his mother) came vnto him with father Bernier, and told his Majesty, that the Queene his mother desired peace: but she would treat in general, and haue some respite to make them resolute, which had declared themselves in her fauour. To whom his Majesty said, Doe my commendations to the Queene my mother, and assure her that I will alwayes haue my heart and hands open to receive her, and will not cease to entreat her to come vnto me, nor to honor her in my Court, and throughout my whole Realme. As for those turbulent spirits which oppress my subjects, and will share my authority by their faction, there is no danger which I will not vndergoe to driue them out of France, or reduce them to my obedience. God will assist me: pray for me. The Prince said also vnto the Deputies, That he had no other desire in his heart, but to see the Kings authority so respected, as it might prescribe a law to all the world. Hee coniuired them to assure the Queene mother of his serpeice; and that he would thinke it a great happinesse to see her in Court, and to receive all sorts of gratifications from his Majesty. As for Monsieur de Luynes, he entreated them to represent vnto her what his great desire had bene to seeue her since her departure from Court, and the care hee had taken to draw her from Angoulême to Tours, to the end she might not bee farre from his Majesties presence: protesting that he had no other ambition, then to see their Majesties vntied in one desire, and that the Queene might assure the peace of her mind for euer. This shew could not hope for being retired from the King; considering the priuate interests of such as entertained her ialousies. Hee coniuired them not to regard any thing which concerned himselfe, but to labour that a peace might bee concluded, with the Kings dignity, and the safety of the Estate: and after this, not to spare any thing which might giue the Queene content.

On the fourth of August, the King vntied all his Forces into one body, and mustered his army neere vnto La Fleche, consisting of 12000 horse, and 1200 foot, and then went to lodge there. They write that there was some diuersity of opinions: It was propounded, that (after her retreat from La Fleche to Angiers) shee should goe with a part of the armie to ioyne with the troops of the Dukes of Mayen, Espérnon, Thouars, Rohan, and Rohannois, on the other side of Loire, and should leaue the other part on this side, for the guard of Angiers and Pont de Cé: That one of the greatest of the Country of Anjou, had promised the Queene to preserve Angiers in her absence, and to defend it in case of a siege to the last gaspe: That this Nobleman, hauing afterwards considered of the proposition which he had made vnto the Queene, and hauing conferred thereof, they let him vnderstand, that he should engage himself in an action wherein both he & his children 1620 should expose themselves to an inevitable ruine, and purchase the Kings hatred, which A would be irreconcilable, in seeking to oppose himselfe to the first exploits of his armes, and to stay the course of his victories. In like manner, neither the Souldiers which hee should draw into Angiers, nor all the rigorous hee should vse vpon the inhabitants, should euer be able to change the loue and affection which that people (who said already they were afflicted) beare vnto the King. That all the officers of Iustice, the Magistrats, and all men of quality within the towne, sayd plainly, That they were resolu'd to maintain their allegiance vnto the King. If they spake in this manner the Queene being present, what would they not say or doe if she were past the Loire? Wherefore there was no assurance to engage himselfe in a Towne, hauing the inhabitants for enemies, transported with loue and affection towards their King. Moreouer, victuals beganne to grow deare, the which they could not recouer but by Pont Cé, and from Poictou, the nurse of Angiers. Finally, to attempt to defend Angiers against the King (if the Queene mother retired) was to imbarke himselfe in a ship to make a long voyage, without munition and bisket. That vpon this consideration the Nobleman did afterwards tell the Queene, that he was most affectionate to her party, and would serue in her army whithersoouer shee went, but to command in Angiers during her absence, he entreated her to giue him leaue to recall his word.

Hereupon the Queene hauing demanded aduice from one of her Councell, what was fittest to be done, he said vnto her, That as a Clergy-man he had alwayes besought her to vnit her selfe in will vnto the King, for that all those great Personages (as well as he who had promised to keepe Angiers) had left the Court and vnited themselves to her party, for their priuate interests, the which they alwayes preferred before hers, or that of the State. You are now, Madam (said he) free to treat with the King: If you passe the Loire, you shall not be so. Peace or warre shall be at the disposition of great men, who shall be armed vnder your name, and will not be so easie to content as you imagine. So many examples in the like case happened in France within these threescore years, should serue you as faithfull Councellers.

Besides, Madam, when you haue past the Loire, thinke not that the Duke of Mayen can come so soone vnto you: he is yet vpon the banks of Garonne, and is doubtfull to leaue it, seeing the Marshall of Thennas leaue troops in Quercy, to enter into Guenne; and the Parliament of Bourdeaux, who attended onely his departure to resume their authority: the which you may coniecture by the Packet you sent vnto them, the which they conuained vn-opened vnto the King.

The Queene hauing considered of all these things, she opened her intention vnto the Kings Deputies, whereupon the Duke of Belgard, the Archbishop of Sens, and father Berale, went to his Maiesty at La Fleche, and told him that the intention of the Queene his mother was to liue hereafter in Court: and that she desired to separate her selfe with honour from the party wherein she was engaged, and to passe the remainder of her dayes in safety, and in his Maiesties good fauour.

The King said vnto them, That it was his greatest desire to see her liue after that manner, and that he had nothing to doe to contest with that which concerned her pleasures, and would yeeld to any thing that might serue for the assurance of her peace and happiness. But he should consider, that the dignity of the Crowne could not endure so pernicious a faction as that which attempted against his authority: That if shee would leaue it for euer, shee should find whatsoeuer she could lawfully desire in his Court and heart. After which, the Deputies returned to the Queene mother with certaine propositions of an Accord, and hope of peace.

On the fifth of August, his Maiesty held a Councell of Warre, and disposed of the quarters of his army within three leagues of Angiers, resolu'd to draw neere vnto it: But they laid before him, That the Towne was very great, and that whatsoeuer good men were on this side the Loire for the Queenes party, were within it: that if he did assault it, and faile to take it, the great reputation which he had gotten in the taking of Caen and others where he had past, would be blemished.

They shewed him the inconuenience which had hapned vnto the Duke of Anjou at the siege of Saint John D'Angely, and to the Prince of Conde at Poictiers, where hee ruined his army, which might haue kept the field against the Duke of Anjou, who commanded

A ded vnder Charles the ninth. Many other strong reasons were deliuered to dissuade him from this enterprize.

The King interrupted this conflict of opinions, saying, I desire not you should resolute presently whether we should assault or leaue Angiers: we must first know whether the Queene my mother will stay there, or goe her way. If she leaues Angiers, and goes into Poictou, we must cast the scabbers of our swords on this side Loire, and follow her. If she remaine, we shall haue a peace speedily. In this incertitude, I am of opinion to aduance as neere as I can to Pont Cé. The place is of great importance for the preservation of Angiers, and without doubt the bruest of all their army will cast themselves into it to defend it. It is not fit for me to haue enemies in field, and to see, without making them to leaue their Armes, or their Trenches. Let vs embrace this resolution presently, and after we haue seene what God will giue vs at Pont Cé, we will aduise of the rest: In the meane time we must send to Saumur, to haue foure Cannon from Monsieur de Plessis, and to Orleans to accompany the Cannon and Munition which shall bee embarked there. And that the Marshall of Praslin passe the Loire speedily at Saumur with foure thousand Foot, and foure hundred Horse, to lodge himselfe at the end of Pont Cé, and to hinder the succours which might come from Poictou. All which was concluded as his Maiesty had propounded.

The Queene mother hauing foreseene that they would attempt Pont Cé, she lodged therein three thousand foot, and foure hundred horse, with three pieces of Ordnance to defend it. As for the other part of her armie, she caused them to barricado themselves in the Suburbs of Angiers: and they of Pont Cé had laboured six dayes together to make a great Trench at the end of the Bridge towards Angiers.

Pont Cé is a long street in an Island vpon the Riuer of Loire, with two great Bridges which containe halfe a mile in length; that toward Brillac is a third part longer then that towards Angiers; vpon the which there are draw-bridges, which being drawne vp, there is no entering but by boat: It hath a good Castle to defend it, the which commands all the approaches of the Bridge: the houses within the Island haue no wals.

The Kings army approached, and gaue an assault to the barricadoes of the suburbs without the bridge, and recouered their Trench, and in the end beat them from the bridge, and entered the Town with them, there remaining nothing vntaken but the Castle, who seeing themselves without hope of succours, and ill furnished with things necessary for a siege, they resolu'd to parley: whereupon the next day morning they entered into treaty with Monsieur de Cregny: which being concluded, the King sent the Prince of Conde to signe the Capitulation, which was to depart with their armes and baggage, their marches out, and their Ensignes remaining to the King, the which he sent to Paris to the Queene Regnant, reseruing those which had the Queene mothers colours and chiflers, the which he sent backe vnto her with all the prisoners (which had beene taken vpon the bridge) that were of her household, hauing a special care of those that were wounded. He commended such as had fought valiantly, and shewed their valour, hoping they would one day doe him good seruice, and blamed such as had fled basely.

The Duke of Belgarde, and the Archbishop of Sens, being come from Angiers to the King, he sent them backe to the Queene mother, to tell her, That he respected the place too much where she did reside, to discharge his Cannon against it: but he coniu'd her in the name of God and all France, to cast her selfe into his armes, where she should find an assured rest; offering her for her particular, all that she could iustly desire of his Maiesty.

On Sunday the ninth of August, the Cardinall of Sourdis and the Bishop of Luson came vnto his Maiesty from the Queene Mother, with the Kings Deputies, to let him vnderstand, That shee was resolu'd to retire her selfe for euer out of these combustions, and that the onely doubt to bee oppress had drawne her to take armes. To whom answer was made, That the King had neuer given her occasion, his iustice and bountie being so apparant, as no man within his Realme had any cause to complaine of oppression. The Queene also desired, that for her sake he would pardon all those which had assisted her.

The King represented the interest of such as had assisted her, who aynded at other ends then the Queene his Mother: Notwithstanding, at her entreaty hee pardoned them:

them: So as within eight dayes after signification of the Peace, they did disarme and A yeld unto his Maiesties obedience: also that the Kings intent was not to restore the Governments and charges of those which had left them, and whereof he had already disposed, as that of Caen, the old Palace of Rouen, and the twelve Companies which had cast themselves into Metz with their Colours, and had abandoned his army in Champagne. But in regard of the Queene his Mother, he yielded to the delivery of all the prisoners (which were many, and of quality) promising to pay their ransomes, for that hee would not deprive them of their due, which had taken them with great hazard.

The next day the Articles being drawne and signed by the King, Monsieur le Creguy carried them to the Queene mother, with his Maiesties Letter full of loue and respect. The A B Articles were:

Articles granted by the King.

I. That there should be a Declaration of the Queenes innocency, and a discharge (in favour of her) for those which had assisted her party.

II. That the Treatie of Angoulesme should be executed in all points.

III. That all charges and governments should be restored, but such as hee had disposed of, and whereof he had made mention, yet notwithstanding it should be lawful for the Queene to be a sutor in that regard.

IV. That all Fees and Entertainments should be paid to the Governors and others which were restored by vertue of this Treaty, like unto those which had serued the Kings.

V. That there should be a discharge for all the Kings Reuenues which had bene taken or leauied.

VI. That it should be lawful for all persons of what quality soeuer, which had followed the Queenes party, to exercise the function of their charges freely: to goe and come to Court, or to stay in their houses and governments, with as much liberty as those which had followed the King.

VII. That all Prisoners should be set free on either side without ranfome.

VIII. That the Castle of Pont de Cé should bee deliuered to any one whom the Queene should name.

IX. That Dreux should be deliuered to the Earle of Soissons, Vendosme to the Duke, D who should ruine the fortifications which had bene made since his absence from Court, together with the Towne of Verneuil, Sablé to the Marshall of Bois-Dauphin, and La Ferté Bernard to the Duke of Mayen.

X. That all Officers on either side should be restored to their charges and functions, by vertue of the Queenes Declaration.

XI. That all their Companies of Light Horfe which had followed the Queene Mothers party, should bee restored and entertained like unto others which had serued the King: and that all pursuits of condemnation should bee disanulled, in regard of those which had not defended themselves.

XII. That the Queene Mother should haue thirty thousand pound sterling E presently, and as much more in the beginning of the next year, to helpe to pay her debts.

XIII. That by vertue of this Accord, made by the Queene mother and the Princes which assisted her, all places and officers should be restored to the same estate they were in before the first of January last past.

XIV. That they which had followed the Queene mother should be paid their pensions and entertainments like unto those which had serued the King.

These Articles being brought backe vnto his Maiestie on the 11 of August, and signed by the Queene, all prisoners were set at liberty.

It was supposed in the beginning of this warre, that the ieaiousies which should grow F betwene so many Princes and Generals of Armies, as were on the Queene mothers party, would be the cause they should neuer performe any exploit of importance; the effect hereof was seene at Pont de Cé, where the Dukes of Vendosme and Retz were, and the Earle of Saint Aignan, by reason of their ieaiousies who should haue the point: so as the Duke of Retz retired with a thousand and five hundred men before the Combat, the Duke of Vendosme during the fight and the Earle of Saint Aignan was taken fighting. They to whom their places and charges were not 1620

A restored by this treaty of peace, were much deceived of their expectations. Monsieur de Modene was sent vnto the Queene with a Letter of credit from the King, to let her vnder-stand that his Maiesty desired to see her, and would to that end attend her at Brissac. To whom he made answer, Assure the King that I will see him to morrow, and that I am very well satisfied with him, and desire nothing more then to please him, praying to God for his person, and the prosperity of his Realme.

The King sent the Marshall of Praslin as farre as Pont Cé to meet the Queene, who drew out the Kings garison, to deliuer it into her hands. Monsieur de Brissac, brother to the Duke of Luynes, and now Duke of Luxembourg (hauing married the only heire of that House) had commandement to receive her, betwene Pont Cé and Brissac: And the King himselfe, impatient to see her, went forth to meet her about 3 quarters of a league. The King and with Monsieur his brother, the Prince of Conde, the Duke of Luynes, and 200 Gentlemen. The Queene had in her company many Princesses and great Ladies, with about 300 horse. The King seeing the Queenes Litter, left his horfe, which the Queene hearing the likewise came forth, and advanced to receive him. At their first meeting the King said vnto her, That hee neuer had more impatience to see her, nor more affection to honour her. The Queene answered, That shee had made her daily vovues and prayers for him, and that shee desired nothing more then his fauour. The King presented his brother vnto her and the Prince: the first he embraced tenderly, and vied the other C very kindly.

Their Maiesties stayed three dayes at Brissac, during the which the King made a De- The King Declaration of the Queene mothers innocency, and of his pleasure concerning the Earle of Soissons, the Countesse his mother, with the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crown, and all others which had assisted his said Lady and mother, during those last alterations, receiuing them into fauour, as his good and faithful subjects and seruants, and suppressing the memory of all which had past in regard thereof. The chiefe points of the peace, was the disarming according to the Declaration: And notwithstanding that all the Princes and Noblemen which had taken armes, assured his Maiesty that they would dis-misse their troops according to his pleasure; yet the King was aduised to keepe his army
D together, and to make a voyage to Bourdeaux, and to the bankes of Garonne, to shew himselfe vnto those people, and to sende an order in Guienne, where it seemed that some, which held places of strength (as well of those which had continued in their obedience, as of others who had taken armes in fauour of the Queene) carried themselves so insolently, as his royall authority, and that of his Parliament at Bourdeaux was growne in contempt;
Finally, that he must assure the whole Prouince vnder his authority, and withall to force them of Bearne to obey his Edict and Decree, for the restitution of the Lands of the Clergy: That all things seemed to inuite him hereunto; first, the season of the yeare;
and secondly, his army was faire and desired employment.

The young Queene was carefull at Paris for the government of the City, and for the E dispatch of all matters which concerned the warre; but the King freed her of that care, sending her the Articles of peace: whereupon she parted the next day to goe to Tours, according to the Kings desire, where she should meet with the Queene mother.

The King desiring to hasten his journey to Guienne, left the Queene mother at Brissac, The King goes and came on the twentieth to Poitiers, where staying but one day, hee went to Tours to Poitiers. to meet with the young Queene. On the thirtieth, hee returned to Poitiers with his Queene, and the Queene Mother came thither. The King left her his owne lodging. The young Queene went forth to meet her, and the King came to visit her vpon her arriual: after some complements shee demanded newes of the Duke of Luynes, who was then sicke, and went to visit him, assuring him of her loue in the Kings presence.

The Queene
mother comes thither.

F The Duke de Mayen, arrived two daies after, and presented himselfe vnto his Maiesty, who said vnto him, I will forget what is past if you serue me faithfully hereafter: after which he led him to the Queene his Mother. The King still hastening his voyage, took his leaue of the two Queenes, who likewise left Poitiers: The Queene Mother went to Fountain-bleau, and the young Queene returned to Paris. The King past by S. Iohn him, whom the King reitell'd graciously, willing him not to withdraw himself hereafter from his obedience.

On the 16 of September, he arriv'd at Blay, whither the Cardinall of Sourdis, the Duke of Mayenne, the Marshall of Roqueleure, and many other Noblemen came vnto his Maestie: where embarking he came to Bourdeaux. The Count of Saint Paul, Duke of Fronzac, passing by Fronzac to goe to Bourdeaux to the King, the Seigneure of Arlesmont (whom he had plac'd Governor in the Castles of Fronzac and Caumont) would needs accompany him to goe and salute the King: his friends dissuaded him, telling him that the Court of Parliament might embrace this occasion to doe iustice for the wrong he had done to one of the Presidents of the Court at Caumont, and had caused one of the Vilers thereof to carie a basket at the fortifications of Fronzac, coming with a Deeree to forbid him the continuing of the sayd workes: That there were but too many complaints of burnings, violences, and concussions, committed vpon Merchants, trafficking vpon the River of Dordone, to make him lose his head. Nothing could dissuade him, but he would needs goe doe his duty to his Maestie. He was no sooner arriv'd, but the Court of Parliament complain'd of him to the King, who promised to cause him to be apprehended and deliver'd into their hands, which was done accordingly. The Earle of Saint Paul and the Duke of Mayenne sued for his pardon, and the Merchants whom he had wronged demanded iustice. The King refused the first, and told the others, hee had given them good Iudges, who within two dayes condemn'd him to lose his head.

Being vpon the scaffold ready to receive the blow which should separate his soule from the body, he demand'd pardon of God, the King, and all those he had wronged. It is written, that being perswaded by the Bishop of Aire, and a Jesuit, to suffer his eyes to be band'd, he said vnto the Bishop, Sir, put your selfe in my place, and then you may see what you please.

Hee was a resolute Gentleman, who saw death come without amazement, and offer'd his necke freely to the Executioner, to make an end of his life. It was reported that he had a hundred thousand Crownes in the Castle of Fronzac: but it is a wretched prosperity feeling it was followed with so fatal and tragical an end. This execution of iustice, contain'd many in their duties, and the people sayd of his Maestie, that he was another Heracles, which purged his Realme from Monsters.

During the Kings stay at Bourdeaux, he changed certaine particular Gouvernors, but to every mans content, for that such as were remou'd were advanced to offices of the Crowne, so as his Maestie assured this Province from combustions which he had apprehended. As for L'Estoure, which they of the Reformed Religion said was a place of safetie, his Maestie (having promised at the Assembly at Loudun, to take out Fontrailles, who was become a Catholicke, and to give them a Gouvernor of the Religion) caus'd Fontrailles to be treated withall, who left the place, and Blainville, a Gentleman of the Religion, was made Gouvernor.

The King goes
towards Beame.

All the Kings enterprises having succeeded happily, there remained nothing for his last worke, but the affaires of Beame. The long resistance which had beene made by them of the Country, against his will, and the Decrees of the Council, for the restoring of the Bishops and other Clergy-men to their honors and temporall estates, had much wounded his patience. Being at Bourdeaux he was prest daily to verifie this restitution. Monsieur de la Force Gouvernor of Beame, and the first President of the Council at Pau, being come to Bourdeaux to that end, assured his Maestie, that without doubt they would cause it to be verified: But the King was aduertised daily of contrary effects, and that some Gentlemen of the Country assembl'd in armes, and threatned those which should undertake the execution of his Maesties will. The King in this expedience stayed some dayes at Pregnac, a Village beyond Bourdeaux, where he endured all the discomforts which might be in a bad lodging, yet he surmounted all these discomforts: vntill the ninth of October, when as there came vnto him two Councillors of Pau, to aduertise him that they had not beene free in their consultations, but had beene forced by the Soldiers which the Baron of Benac had brought into the Towne. And for that they had oppos'd the power of Monsieur de la Force, whom it concern'd in regard of his charge, and his promise to the King, to make all things easie, and to suppress the popular mutinies of factious men vnknown: knowing also that he was strong and armed for the Kings seruice:

The

A The said two Councillors protest'd to his Maestie that Monsieur de la Force, being solicited by their company to ioyne with them in 'Council to give his aduice, and to maintaine obedience by his example: he not onely refused to appeare, but excus'd himselfe vpon his weaknesse, saying, that he was not able to hinder multitudes of strangers from coming into the Province vpon the brute of the Verification, as they had done at other times.

Hereupon the King commanded them to retire, telling them that his presence should assure the Clergie men for euer, for the enioying of that which did belong vnto them. The King resolv'd instantly, to part the next day towards Pau: And although there were a thousand discomforts of bad way, represented vnto him by the said Councillors, yet he neither apprehended feare of vicissitudes, or anything else which might hinder him, in his resolution for this voyage, as iudging that enterprise worthy of his undertaking, if there were no difficulty and hazard in it. He parted the tenth of October, and crossing the desert Country, he came on the thirteenth to Grenade, where the Advocate General of Pau, came and presented the King with a Decree of the said Council, importing the restitution which had been so often refused, thinking thereby to stay the Kings journey. Monsieur de la Force, came thither also with the like designe, presenting vnto him the troublefomnesse of the Voyage. But nothing could diuert the King, having a desire to make his power knowne, and to assure the Catholique religion for euer, in a Country, which seem'd to neglect his royall authoritie.

The King
enters into Pau.

His Maestie commanded them both to retire, assuring them that within two dayes he would be at Pau: For it behooves you (said hee) I should goe to assure your weaknesse. Coming to lodge within five Leagues of Pau, the chiefe inhabitants came vnto him, to know his Maesties pleasure, touching the Ceremonie of his entry. To whom the King answer'd: That he would enter into Pau, as Soueraigne of Beame, if there were a Church to goe vnto: But if there were none, hee would no Ceremonies, for that he would be visiting to receive honors in a place where he had neuer beene, before hee had given thanks vnto God, from whom he held his inheritance. On the fifteenth hee enter'd into Pau, without ceremonie. Few observ'd that his Maestie was not receiv'd with those acclamations, which subjects customarily make at the sight of their Prince: and some write that they had drawne away the vicissitudes to force him to dislodge speedily: and that they had given out, they would crosse the orders which should be set.

The King to prevent all inconveniences was forced to change some Gouvernors: and having stay'd two dayes at Pau, he went to Naurreux a place of importance, seven great Leagues from Pau.

Having visited the place, Cannon, Munition, and Armes: He commanded Monsieur de Meiden to acquire de Salles Gouvernor of the Towne with his pleasure: which was, That the King (vnderstanding what had past in the Province, and the many enterprises E had beene made to surprize that place) was resolv'd to free him of so painful a guard in his old age, being now almost fourscore: yet his intent was not to deprive him of the reward of his seruices, but to recompence him worthily, and give him rest. Whereunto de Salles oppos'd not, but seem'd ready to obey his Maesties will, who made him Marshall of the field in his Armies, and gave him a good reward.

He changed
the Governour
of Naurreux

In Naurreux, which is a little town but very well fortified, there were found by Cannons all mounted, and forty Culverins and smaller pieces, with great store of bullets, powder and victuals: besides the sluier place, which belonged to the Houses of Naurre and Albeze, and was kept there: the which in former times had beene very great, but it was wasted in the year 1587, and much taken away to supply the necessities of his Maesties Father.

The King made the Seigneure of Poyenne Gouvernor of Naurreux, and greatly commended this election, for the reputation hee had gotten both in Beame and Beame by his courage and fidelitie. And the King before his departure caus'd Mary to be lured in the Towne, which had been discontinued for the space of fifty years: The King returning to Pau, he resolv'd four things in 'Council: two for the restoring of the Catholique Religion, and other two belonging to the State, and the preservation of the publique peace in base Naurre, and the Souverainie of Beame.

1620

The King's fellowes four things at Pau.

The first was to restore the Bishops and Abbots of Bearne to their places in the Council of Pau, as their Predecessors had formerly held them: and to cause the said Council to verifie 47 Articles, containing an order for the free exercise of the Catholike Religion: the enioying of Clergy-lands, and in regard of their rights and prerogatives.

The second was, to restore the Catholikes to the possession of the great Church in Pau, where he would assist at diuine seruice and Proceffion.

The third, to make an Edict for the vniing of base Nauarre and the Souerignty of Bearne, to the Crowne of France, with an vniion of both Councils, and to make one Parliament.

The fourth was, for the suppressing of the Persians or Capitaines of horse in Bearne.

The first, concerning the admission of the Bishops and Abbots to Council, with the 47 Articles, were verified by the said Council on the 19 of October. The next day the King put the Catholiques into possession of their great Church, whereof they had bene dispossessed almost 60 yeares: the King assisted at Masse, after which there was a solemne proceffion. There was an Edict past, for the incorporating of these Prouinces to the Crowne, and the vniing of the Soueraine Courts of Pau in Bearne, and Saint Pallas in Nauarre into one body of a Parliament, which should be established at Pau, consisting of three Presidents, and 22 Councillors, to iudge souerainly, and with like power and authority to his other Courts of Parliament. Touching the suppression of the Persians, the Edict was verified by the Council, the Chambers being assembled on the 20 of October.

Garisons left in Bearne.The King returne to Paris.

Thus the King in five daies stay at Pau, having sealed the Catholique Religion throughout all Bearne; taken away all meanes from the factious to mutine; sealed an order, that none should leaue souldiers but by his commission; put good garisons into Nauarreux, Orthes, Saueterre, and Oleron; and vniited those Countreies to the Crowne of France, he returned to Bourdeaux, and from thence to Xaintes, where taking post, he came to Paris on the 7 of Nouember, where he was receiued by both the Queenes and all the world, with a thousand blessings and applauses. His army was lodged in diuers parts of Guienne and Poitou to winter in.

In the end of October, there was no speech in France, but of a generall Assembly, which they of the reformed Religion, should hold at Rochel on the fixe and twentieth of Nouember, by reason of the Kings voyage into Bearne. There were also many priuate Assemblies, where (as some write) they treated of meanes to leaue money, and to begin warre, but all was referred to the generall assembly at Rochel, where they should shew their grieuances touching the inexecution of that they said had bene promised them, at the dissolving of the Assembly at Loudun.

chel.

The King vpon his returne from Bearne, having bene aduertised of the propositions which were made in diuers parts of France, for the holding of a generall assembly at Rochel by them of the reformed Religion, he caused a Declaration to be made and verified in Parliament, by the which he declared, the assembly which his subiects of the Religion had called in his Towne of Rochel, to be vnlawfull, forbidden by his Edicts, and contrarie to his will and pleasure: enioying the Maior, Sherifffes, Peeres, and Burgessees of Rochel, not to receiue them into their Towne, forbidding also all Gouernors, Lieutenants, Maiors, Consuls and Magistrates of other Townes, to receiue or admit the said Assembly, or any other which should bee called, contrary to the tenor of his Edicts, and without his expresse leaue: & to all his subiects of what qualitie soeuer to goe vnto it, vpon any pretence whatsoever: declaring them which should contradict this his will, breakers of his said Edicts, disobedient, troublers of the publike peace, and guilty of treason, &c. The subiect of this assembly will be the leauen of much misery, and shall fill France with ciuill combussions. We shall see townes forced and razed; Forts and Castles ruined, Houses and Families dispeopled and left desolate; the country wasted; and the poore people oppressd by the insolent Souldier. Wee shall see intestine diuisions. Sonne against father, and brother against brother, kinsman against kinsman, and neighbour against neighbour, and the poore reformed Churches in danger of ruine, and at the brinke of despayre. We shall see an angry King exclaiming against the disobedience of his subiects of the Religion; and we shall see those subiects complaining of the inexecution of his Edicts. We shall see an incensed Prince, who (zealous of his honour) vovves that hee will haue his owne, and force obedience. And we shall see those subiects, who (like a ti-

merous

A merous man apprehending a Feuer, lets blood and takes Physicke, there being no alteration in his pulse, nor symptome nor signe of disemperature, yet zealous of their safeties, and fearing designs tending to their ruine; arme, fortifie themselves, and stand vpon their guard: when as voluntary obedience, and a diffinition of their Assembly at Rochel, had happily diuerted the storme, and they had not bene disarmed and lost their Townes of safety. The King should haue had no colour nor pretext to take armes against them who had obeyed his will: Foraine Princes, who had an interest in their preferuacion (seeing their dutifull obedience) should haue had iust cause to haue blamed the breach of his Edicts but newly confirmed. I will not presume to censure of the motives of these troubles; I leave it to the iudicious Reader: onely giue me leaue to set down what I haue receiued from a iudicious Gentleman of the same Nation and Religion: one that hath been much employed in those State-affaires: That the fiery zeale of some who had the guiding of their consciences, had thrust them into these desperate courses. But let vs now returne to our History.

The King having left many Garisons in Bearne and base Nauarre, there were foure strong Companies put into Nauarreux, the which is commonly called in France Nauarrins; being the only place of importance within the Prouince, and considerable for many reasons. Some Bearnois of the reformed Religion, much discontented for the change of the Gouernor of this place, especially the Benfins (nephewes to La Salle the last Gouernour) beganne to make many practices to surpise it; not so much for any particular zeale to their Religion, but for hope to make themselves masters of the place whereof their vncl had bene so long time Gouernor. To this end, hauing a house within a league and a halfe of Nauarreux, whither they came often, they made great shewes of loue to the three Capitaines which were there in garison, and commanded in the absence of the Seigneure of Poyenne; so as these Capitaines would rather haue suspected their owne Souldiers then these Benfins, with whom they liked like brethren, eating and drinking daily together. During this familiaritie the Capitaines had diuers aduertisements, that there would be an enterprife vpon Nauarreux; whereupon they doubled their guards, and searched diuers houses. Vpon the eight of December at night, one of the inhabitants which was of the Conspiracie, discovered it to a Souldier which lay in his house, (whether moued with loue to the King, or his fidelitie to the King, or vpon hope of recompence) and said vnto him, That for the execution thereof one of the Benfins was hidden within the Towne. This Souldier discovered it presently to the three Capitaines, who put their men in armes, and searched the houses of such as were accused, but found no man: they seized vpon the chiefe inhabitants, who denied all confidently: comming to the house of one Merous, whereas Benfin was, with many others, which hee had drawne into the Towne for the execution of the Enterprife; they slipped out at a backe-doore, hoping to saue themselves the next day. Notwithstanding in the search of this house, they found two in the hay; who being examined denied all. In the end they found some in the streets:

they take one to whom they promise his life so he will confesse; the which he did, telling them that there should haue bene two troops made within the Towne, the one of Inhabitants, who about midnight should haue killed the three Capitaines, and charged the Corps de gard in the market-place, whilst that Benfin and such as came with him, should haue fallen vpon the Corps de gard at the Port, and force it open to giue entry vnto fise hundred men which should be there ready. Whereupon they made such diligent search, as they found diuers; yet Benfin and most of his company got away ouer the walls, by cords and other meanes. The next day there were ten of them condemned and hanged in the market-place.

This Execution, and the feare of the like for many others, which were imprisoned, caused them of the reformed Religion to make many enterprises in Languedoc & the Countie of Foix; and among others in the Towne of Montauban, whereas all the religious men were imprisoned, as you may conceiue by this Letter of aduice which was sent vnto the King:

Sir, I cannot but grieve to see my selfe still forced to importune your Maiesties patience by my Letters, vpon the continual errors of your subiects of the reformed Religion, but the more I haue to enforme your Maiesty duly of the present estate of this Country, and the oppressions which your subiects receiue; and the contempt of your authority, blinde 1621 " me thereunto. Notwithstanding your Declaration against the Assemblée of Rochel, their " Deputations have beene made: and notwithstanding the Resolution of the Parliament of " Thoulouze, their Consultation about the same is held at Montauban; their Fortifications " are continued in an extraordinary fashion: for they goe voluntarily thereunto, both men " and women, and of all qualities; and are taxed in particular to performe at their owne " charges, certaine fathomes, by a certaine time, and of such a depth. This they doe in all " their Townes, and at Castles more then the rest. At Montauban they have committed a " new excesse on the 17 of this month of December, vpon aduice that at Nauarreux they " had executed tenne of the traitors which had intelligence to surprize it: They presently " imprisoned all the Clergy-men, and all the Catholiques they found within their towne; B " and sent to aduertise all those of their Towne, which were at Thoulouze for their private " affaires, to retire. They searched for all the Clergy-men in their houses, and caried them " prisoners to the Bishops palace, guarded by two Companies of Souldiers, where they " continued till the next day at five a clocke in the evening, and then were dismissed, with " charge not to depart vpon paine of death: the which was done by a resolution of their " Towne-house, and the abridgement of the generall Assembly.

" The first President of Thoulouze blamed this fact much by his Letters; That to the " preiudice of the publique and private safety, they had treacherously abused the Catho- " liques, nothing apprehending the danger of them of their Religion, dispersed throughout " the Realme, who might runne the like fortune, if the faith of the Edicts were not religio- C " usly obserued by the Catholiques, who conform themselves to your Maiesties com- " mandements. At the same instant the first President forbid all reprisals, whereby hee assured " them which were of the Religion in Thoulouze. After this, the Clergy-men were freed " from the present danger, vntill that the factious of the said Religion finde some new oc- " casion. It is true, that some of the Magistrates, Consuls, and Burgeises, disliked of this " proceeding, but they are subiect to the law of the factious. Your Parliament hath here- " upon interposed their authority, and often forbidden them to continue their Assembly, " but they desist not. This disorder of Montauban hath been followed with the like insol- " encies in the County of Foix, where they shut the gates of Saierdun, Cazeres, and Pamiers, " taking the Catholiques, & seizing vpon some farms, into which they haue put souldiers, D " who haue robbed passengers, and haue failed to surprize a strong place, belonging to the " Bishop of Pamiers, putting the whole country into combustion. Wee hope your Maiesty " will prescribe them their duties; and provide that your subiects may be freed from the in- " conueniences which may follow in their weak and turbulent resolutions. Their fury for " the fact of Nauarreux is great, proceeding from the resolutions of the Assembly of Milhau, " and it is doubted that they of Montauban will be drawne to the like enterprizes. In the " meane time it is a great toyle to your Catholique subiects, to be alwayes vpon the defens- " sue, fearing the attempts of men which are in perpetual councell and armies. Wee will " attend your commandements, and remaine, &c. From Thoulouze, Decemb 22. 1620.

The King visits his Promi-ters of Picardy.

About the end of this year, the King went to visit his frontiers of Picardy, as Abbe- " ville, Montreuil, Bullen, Calais, and Ardres, putting two Companies of his Guards into " that Towne, wherewith some were not well satisfied. This voyage continued from the " 14 of December to the 13 of January, in a very hard and vnseasonable time for his traine. " The Archduke Albert, hearing that he was vpon the frontiers, sent to visit him by an Earle " of the House of Granvelle. The King sent the Marshall of Cadenet, brother to the Duke " of Luynes, in Embassie to his Maiesty of great Britaine: hee parted from Calais on the " first of January, being followed by a gallant troop of Noblemen, and had a very honou- " rable reception from the King at his coming to Court. Within few dayes after his re- " turne to Paris, hee was receiued in Parliament Duke of Chaune and Peere of France.

In the beginning of this year, the Deputies of the reformed Religion assembled at F " Rochel, came to Court, where they published their Remonstrances vnto the King, touch- " ing the causes of their assembly: the which although it be long yet I am enforced to in- " sert it, being the subiect of all the following miseries, whereby the Reader may bee the " better satisfied.

The Remon-
strances of the Deputies of the Assembly
at Rochel vnto
the King.

S I A, wee doe not thinke that the outrages of our ill-willers, who it may be will seeke to " stop your Maiesties cares to our most humble petitions, should also stop our mouths: " neyther were it iust, that during the liberty of our enemies, to slander our actions, and " make

A make them odious, they should impose vs silence: or that hauing hindered the effects of " your sacred word and royall bounty, they should blame vs, if wee insitt at your Maiesties " feet to demand the accomplishment of that which it hath pleased you to promise. Where- " fore Sir, in confidence of our iustice and your bounty, we present vnto your Maiesty our " most humble requests by writing, which is now all the meanes we haue, since our access " into your royall presence is forbidden vs, by a Declaration published against vs, for " our being here assembled vpon the only subiect of our complaints. But for that this action " of ours is repured a crime, and our proceeding defamed ascending vnto some rebellion, " wee should iudge our selues vnworthy of the fruit of your gracious regard vnto our peti- " tions; or that we should make any, if our consciences accused vs to be culpable of any " crime; or if wee had not both before God and your Maiesty our iustifications ready to " exhibit.

We haue assembled Sir, heretofore vnder the permission and authoritie of your Mai- " esty, in your Towne of Loudun, about the same subiect of our complaints, and to procure " from you the reparation of so many grieuances, by which our liberty and assurance " are continually impaired, and the authority of your Edicts from day to day weakened. " The long suffering of our euils, the apprehension of their increase, the knowledge of our " enemies audacious pride, which swells with our disgrace, the expresse charge of those " which haue sent vs, and the general consent of all men, that your Edicts (the fundamen- " tall Lawes of your Estate,) cannot bee undermined, but it will fall, caused vs to attend C " six whole monthes, with perseverance proportionable to our necessity, to obtaine of " your Maiesty some effects of your good will towards vs. In the end, after this long in- " stance, your Maiesty was pleased to command vs to name our Deputies, and to separate " our selues, and that the Prince and the Duke of Luynes, should giue their words to the " Duke of Lesdiguiers and Monsieur de Chastillon, and by them to assure vs, that separating " our selues according to your commandement, your Maiesty would within six monthes, " cause some principall points of our demands to be faithfully executed, and faithfully " answer our grieuances: and that within seauen monthes the Deputies of Beame should " be heard, a month after the execution of the said points. And that if the said promises D " should not be fulfilled, the same persons might assemble againe, or others delegated; " whereof the Prince gaue his word, to procure vs this permission with effect; and Monsieur " de Luynes assured that his word should be as good as a Brieffe, and it might be better. They " added on your Maiesties behalfe, that this was the first word you had giuen to your sub- " iects of the Religion since that you held the helme of your Estate, and therefore wee " should giue credit vnto it, hauing beene neuer violated. This onely consideration stirred " then all the rest, found no resistance in our consent, and shewed our speedy obedience.

After the nomination of our Deputies, your Maiesty confirmed to those which brought " the names, that you would effect the promise which the Prince and Duke of Luynes had " giuen vs. Thus separating our selues, we drew an Act of our obedience, containing all the " E fore said conditions and promises, according to the which, the Deputies of Provinces in " their particular Assemblies, according to the order allowed by your Maiesty, hauing giuen " an account of their employment, haue confirmed or subrogated all those which are here " at this present, after the six monthes, in case the points accorded were not executed. This " hath not beene done in secret, your Maiesty might easily know it, and the Lords of your " Councell were notignorant of it.

All these things promised being vnexecuted after the six monthes, they haue notwithstanding " standing pressed your Maiesty to goe into Beame, before the thauenth, contrary to your " Letters written to the Parliament of Pau, the 21 of September. So as contrary to those " expresse promises, they haue anticipated the execution of the destitution of the Clergy- " F lands, which hath been followed with a great alteration in the Country, and the total ru- " ine of the safety and liberty of those which make profession of the same religion with vs.

For these causes Sir, according to the order taken amongst vs, vpon the assurance " giuen vs on your Maiesties behalfe, the case so hapning; wee haue beene called to this " place, whither we are come with charge from all your subiects of the Religion, with desire " to obtaine by our humble petitions vnto your Maiesty, the accomplishment of what " was promised; reparation for the important grieuances which haue since happened; and an " effectuall assurance of your good inclination to our protection against the threats and " alarms alarms, which are generally praftised with a defigne of our totall ruine. Wherefore Sir, A we lay out of a good confcience, that we are in no fort culpable of the contempt of your authoritie; but contrariwife that the caufes of our reunion in this place are lawfull, and our proceeding without crime, being authorifed and fupported by your fared word. If our enemies haue prezailed fo much, as by a Declaration published againft vs, they call in queftion the word which hath bene given vs in your Maiefties name, and make vs guilty; it is a new fubiect of bitter griefe, and of iuft complaint. We are not culpable, but in beleeuing the word of the firft Prince of the blood, and of a Nobleman whom your Maiefty doth cherifh dearly. We are not guilty but for renewing the purfuit of our humble petitions, authorifed by the firft inuolable word which it hath pleaſed your Maiefty to giue B vs, the which we haue taken for pledge and caution after fo many delays, and by the iuſtice which the appearance of fo many grieuances hath made fo publique. May it now pleaſe your Maiefty to haue conſideration of our innocency, and not to fuffer our enemies thus to oppreſſe vs before you. They taxe vs to haue violated your authoritie: but it is caſie to iudge whole adions tend moſt to the preferuation of your authority, and the ſetling of your Crowne. When as we purſue, by the formes of reſpect and reuerence due to your Maieſty, the execution of your Edicts, the reparation of fo many breaches, and the meanes of our preferuation; they command vs to be ſilent, and then oppoſe the name of your authoritie to our perſeuerance, as if we fought to croſſe it. But where your authoritie is truly and really engaged, as in the maintenance of your Edicts, and the affurance of C your word: what care haue they to preferue it? nay what doe they not to ruine it?

Is there any thing which doth more wound your Maieſties authoritie and reputation, then that after ſuch ſolemne promiſes, we could not obtaine deliuerance of the eſtate of the places of ſafety in Dauphine, the deniall whereof tends to make vs loſe the chiefe Towneſſe? In the meane time they haue given vs your word, the which they might free in falſe, and ſhame. They haue promiſed vs faithfully vpon your word the reception of two Counſellors in your Parliament of Paris, ſo long delayed contrary to your Edicts, the which is not yet accompliſhed but in port. But which is worſe, this faith promiſed is fruſtrated in this point, in the moſt important, and which we vrge moſt; by a Decree which the Court hath made, that the Seigneur Le Cuy ſhould not reſigne but to a Romane Ca- D tholique: whereby our liberty is oppreſſed, being granted to them of our Religion by your Edicts, leaue to enter indifferently into charges. They aſſured vs in your Maieſties name, that the reſtitution of the Clergy goods in Beame ſhould not be put in execution before ſeaſon moneths; and that within one moneth after the execution of the points accorded, they ſhould be heard in their Remonſtrances: but contrariwife they haue anticipated the time, and drawne your Maieſty into Beame before that any of the promiſes tooke effect. And without hearing their grieuances, the reſtitution hath not onely bene executed, but to ſay truly, hath ſerued as a pretext for the entire deſolation of thoſe of the Religion, and the liberty of the Country; although their obedience and chearfull reception of your Maieſty did merit a more favourable viſage. But what greater violence to your authoritie, E Sir, then after our laſt ſeparation made vpon ſuch ſolemne promiſes, with liberty to requite our ſelues in caſe of failing, to preſent our petitions and grieuances to your Maieſty, being now in theſe termes, in ſtead of hearing vs, they cauſe vs to be declared guilty: they deny that we had eyther promiſe or permiſſion to aſſemble, and the words which ſhould be as good as Briefes, are made fruſtrate. They indite vs becauſe wee haue beleued: and which is worſe, they threaten the towne wherein we are aſſembled with ſiege and ruine, that is to ſay, your whole Eſtate with a dangerous accident, whereof your Maieſty, and your wiſe Councell may fore-ſee the conſequence.

What ſhall we ſay touching ſo many points of your Edicts infringed, yea, ſince your Maieſty ſate at the helme of your Eſtate? with what inſtance haue we purſued the reſto- F ring of our Religion in Clermont of Lodoue, a place of ſafety, whereas our enemies (to the outrage they haue done vs) haue added a contempt of your authority, hindring by armes the execution of the Decrees of your Councell, and expelling the Commiſſaries which your Maieſty had ſent to that effect. They made ſhew to preuent our complaints with reſtitution. They called it your Maieſties buſineſſe. They acknowledged that your reſpect and authority was ſenſibly wounded: yet they had rather haue it ſuppreſſed; then in railing it, they ſhould repara the breaches which are done vnto our liberty. Thus by a violence

A violence vnreſtrained and not puniſhed, the exerciſe of our Religion is baniſhed from a place which hath bene conſigned vnto vs for the maintenance thereof. They haue taken from vs the guards of Priuats in Viaretz, one of the places where nothing ſhould be altered according to your Edicts and Briefes. And to the end all the reſt ſhould bee made vnpoſſible and without any ſafety, the moneyes appointed for the Garriſons and Mi- niſters, haue not bene paid theſe eightene moneths. Finally, Sir, contrary to your will and authority, and to the preiudice of the peace and publique tranquillity, they preach ſeditiouſly againſt vs: they publiſh bookes to the ſame end: whence comes it, that of late in diuers places they vnbury our dead; they burne our Temples; they chaſe away our B Paſtors, and they will not ſuffer thoſe places which are given vnto vs neere vnto Townes for the exerciſe of our Religion, to be deliuered vnto vs. The which we haue and doe ſtill ſuffer in diuers parts of your Realme, and namely, at Moulins, Bourges, Baux in Pronence, at Lyons, and at Dijon, and yet we can obtaine no iuſtice.

We will adde no other particular grieuances, wherewith the Articles of our complaints are charged, ſome without answer, and ſome answered contrary to the intention of your Edicts: and for reparation whereof, they make no accompt after all our purſuit to ſend Commiſſaries into the Prouinces, notwithstanding any promiſe which hath bene made; and ſuch as haue bene ſent, reſuſe to doe their charge when they are ſummoned. By theſe contrauentions, Sir, your ſacred authority and the reputation of your iuſtice are C highly intereſſed.

But all this is little in regard of the pernicious accidents which they endeavor to produce: for theſe men, Sir, whom all your good ſubiects Romane Catholiques well affected to your Crowne, doe hold for enemies; and all thoſe whom they haue corrupted in your Eſtate, to ſerue a foraigne command, whoſe Miniſters they are, ſtrive now more then euer to raiſe vp that Engine in your Realme, by the which they haue ouerthrowne (as wee ſee) ſo many Eſtates in Chriſtendome; and by the ſame practices ſeek to draw yours into the like conſuſion. Euery man knows how by their ſeditious Sermons and the ſecret drifts of their Congregations, they daily more and more ſtirre vp the peoples hatred againſt vs, with deſigne to ruine vs. They are ſo inſolent as to vaunt to haue an abſolute Empire ouer your conſcience, to be able to poſſeſſe your eares and mind D with what they pleaſe, and to haue already induced your Maieſty to hate vs: ſo as aſſuring themſelves of our diſgrace with your Maieſty, they haue plotted (what wrongs ſouer are done vs) to hinder ſtill the reparation. Whereby in the end hauing made the vigour of your Edicts fruitleſſe, they take occaſion to make our complaints to be held a crime, as they doe at this preſent, and thereby to ſtirre vp a generall perſecution. And would to God their deſigne were not ſo farre advanced, they ſhould not then proceed againſt vs as offenders: they ſhould not heare throughout your Realme (as they doe) war pronounced againſt vs, ſaying that the Dice are caſt; that preparations are made in all parts, and your countries of Poictou and Guienne full of troops, which already in hope diuide E the ſpoile of this Towne.

Theſe alarms, Sir, theſe fatal accidents wherewith your Eſtate is threatened, are the chiefe moſtues which make vs humbly to beſeech your Maieſty to diſcerne our iuſtice from the ſlanders and hatred of our enemies. And that it would pleaſe your Maieſty to cauſe the Declaration published againſt vs to be diſannulled, and to giue vs free acceſſe vnto you to preſent our complaints and humble petitions: to the end that returning with an aduall teſtimony of your good inclination towards vs, wee may inſiſte into the hearts of all men, ſome ſeeds of better hope; that as your Maieſty doth acknowledge vs for your faithful ſubiects, you will protect vs againſt all the deſignes and enterpriſes of ſuch as hate vs: and that our liberty, goods, and liues, being thereby aſſured, wee may employ them F for your Maieſties ſeruiſe: Proteſting religiously before God and men, for our ſelues and all thoſe whom we repreſent, that we deſire not the liberty of our conſciences, and to ſerue God, with any other intent, then to remaine inſeparably tied to your obedience, and to the good and aduancement of your Eſtate and Crowne, and your Maieſties long and happy reigne, whoſe proſperity recommending with all our vovs to God, we beſeech him, that he will make vs find fauour with your Maieſty, and inſpire your mind with the knowledge that we are your Maieſties moſt humble, moſt obedient, and moſt faithful ſubiects and ſeruants, The Deputies of the Aſſembly at Rochel. Theſe

is interpreted againſt the Breſtians.

These were the reasons whereby they pretended to iustifie the calling of their Assembly, the continuing whereof proued the subiect of all the ensuing miseries: for what can complaints and iustificacions preuaile with an incensed Prince, who is possessed with other counsels? They giue him to vnderstand, That the calling of this Assembly is an affront done to his authority: that it was a breach of his Edicts: that it was a president of dangerous consequence for his state: and that it was an act tending to rebellion: That if he suffered it, it would blemish his reputation, and make him contemptible both to his subiects and strangers. These were strong motives to thrust a young Prince into choller: but you shall heere an answer which was published in the name of the Duke of Ledsiguers touching the said complaints, and sent vnto the Assembly.

The Duke of Ledsiguers answered to the Assembly at Roan.

My Masters, the Letter you wrote vnto me on the 28 of the last Moneth, inuited mee to make this answer: I pray you take it in good part, comming from the heart and hand of one who alwayes will wish honoer and prosperitie to your iust designs. You are assembled according to the resolution you tooke at your parting from Loudun: but you cannot shew that you haue leaued. It is true, you required a Brieffe for it, but could not obtaine it. Wherefore our generall Deputies should first haue made instance to the King to allow of it, and their humble petition should haue bene grounded vpon the necessity there was to assemble. This hath not bene done, wherefore my opinion is, That hauing not obserued this forme, his Maiesty hath iust cause to be incensed against you, and against those which haue receiued you. As for the occasions of your Assembly, they are so small, as they scarce make any shew. The King had promised you, that within fixe Moneths he would cause L'Esfoure to bee restored: that two Councillors of the Religion should be admitted into the Parliament at Paris: That a Brieffe should bee giuen for the guard of places of safety, the which was deliuered soone after to our Deputies: And touching the affaires of Bearne, that within fouen moneths the Deputies of the Countrie of Bearne should be heard by his Maiesty. There was a moneth more of time giuen, not so much in consideration of that businesse, as for that they imagined the action of L'Esfoure would proue difficult, and that they would not meddle with Bearne before they had ended the other: and of this intention Monsieur de Blainville is a true witnesse, being the inventor of this delay granted by his Maiesty, to the end hee might haue time to make L'Esfoure obey, before he required obedience from them of Bearne. You know that L'Esfoure hath bene deliuered to a Gentleman of the Religion: that the Councillors haue bene receiued: and a Brieffe for the places of safety deliuered: There remains nothing to giue you but an Estate of the places in Dauphine: This was not so hasty a businesse as you must needs assemble to demand them: for we hold them, and no man contests them.

I know that the clamour of them of Bearne, hath bene a powerfull motive for your Assembly: but I thinke before you should haue done it in regard of these points about mentioned, you should haue made petition by our Deputies, or haue required Monsieur Chastillon and me, to beseech the King to remember what we had promised you in his Maiesties name, confirmed by his royall mouth at Fontaine-bleau, to the Deputies of the Assembly at Loudun, when as they aduertised him of their separation.

I haue briefly touched these points, in answer to that you haue written vnto me; that I am not ignorant of the inexecution of most of the important things which had bene promised you: and I represent vnto you what I know, the which you should call to mind, to the end that you your selves might iudge that your Assembly hath bene somewhat too hasty: and I say with griefe, that it may be held vnlawfull: This is the reason his Maiesty hath so declared it: but his indignation may be mitigated and turned into grace. I know no means to attaine vnto it but by your separation: for although your pretended grievances were apparant and full of reason, yet could you not present them to the King to doe you iustice: but by the lawfull means which admit the Subiect to his Soueraigne Prince; otherwise it is a blemish to authority, a sharing of the Royalty, and the making of a good cause bad. Moreover, it doth incite by a bad example his Maiesties Subiects, to shake off the gracious yoke of his obedience. This fault must not proceed from vs; I fly from vs, who haue alwayes obeyed our Kings in all things, and haue onely retained that which belongs to GOD, to yeeld it vnto him

A him by their Maiesties permission. He that reignes ouer vs at this day will nor deny it: He will obserue his Edicts, and heare our Complaints and Remonstrances, when we shall addresse our selues vnto him with those submissions which are beseeching vs; and due from vs to him. I beseech you and exhort you as much as I can and ought, to put your selues into this posture after your separation; and I will ioyne with our Deputies, humbly to beseech his Maiesty to grant vs that which we may lawfully demand, be it for our selues or our bretheren of the Countrie of Bearne, who haue drawne their miserie vpon them by their owne fault. I had diuerted it, if they had giuen me credit when I was in Court. I presse your separation, for without it, I see my selfe (to my great griefe) deprived of all means, to ayd and serue you with the King: But if you will beleuee my aduice, and separate your selues, I dare promise that his Maiesty at my humble sute, will forget the fault which he conceiues you haue committed against his authority; will take regard of our complaints and humble petitions by our generall Deputies: will call his troops out of Poictou, Guienne, and other places which hold our Churches in continuall alarme: will remoue the crime of the Deputies of the Assembly, to the end they may returne with all safety: will make a new Declaration in our fauour, according to the graces which haue bene granted vs, to quench all ieaiousies: and finally, will giue all reasonable content, seeing a firme and assured peace in his Estate, to maintaine his reputation with his neighbours and allies, and to make himselfe a necessary Arbitrator of all their differences: the which we should desire about all things, and not to hinder him as wee doe, by any ciuill combustion, whereof the cause might be imputed vnto vs. If I may be beleueed, there will be no need for me to send any body vnto you, nor may I doe it, because you are assembled without the Kings permission; nor that I will leaue to be of your vnion, for I will remain firme in the seruice of the Churches of God, and of the profession of our Religion vnto the last gaspe; continuing still in the obedience due to his Maiesty, as a thing conuenient.

In this affection I will rest, by the helpe of God, whom I beseech to cause you to receive my aduice, and the assurance of my promises, grounded vpon the hope I haue of his Maiesties goodnesse, that we may continue in his fauour with all surety, and his Realme in peace. And so I will remaine your humble and affectionate seruant, Ledsiguers. Grenoble the first of February, 1621.

This yeare there fell out an accident at Priuas in Viualetz, which disquieted the peace of the Countrey. After the death of the Seigneur of Chambault, Lord of Priuas, being of the Reformed Religion; his onely daughter and heyre, widow to a Gentleman also of the Religion, married with the Viscount of Cheylane, a Catholique, sonne to the Seigneur of L'Esfoure, who hauing taken possession of the Castle of Priuas, and the Tower of the Lake, put Catholique Captaines and Souldiers into them; the which had the last yeare put all the inhabitants of the Religion in Priuas, Viualetz, and Seuenmes into alarme, which caused great combustions on either side: they of the Religion pretending that it was a Towne of guard, although none of the hostages of surety, and that the Castle and the Towne appertained vnto them. On the contrary, the Viscount of Cheylane maintained that being Lord thereof, and that his vassals, the guard belonged to him. This trouble was for a time appeased by an ordinary course, That things should remaine in the estate that they were, vntill that by an Assembly vnder the Kings authority the businesse were agreed. Notwithstanding the inhabitants of Priuas, impatient to see Catholique Souldiers put into the Castle and Tower of the Lake, made many instances and complaints, as well to the generall Synode of the Ministers which was held in October last at Alez, as to Monsieur de Chastillon at Montpellier. The Duke of Vantadour, Lieutenant generall for the King in Languedoc, sent his Prouost to take information thereof.

F In Ianuary this yeare, they fell to armes, the Towne against the Castle. Whereupon the Duke of Vantadour sent two Gentlemen with his Letters for the pacifying of this combustion, offering them his succour and assistance, either by his authority as the Kings Lieutenant Generall, or by the mediation of the Chamber of the Edict of Castres, and the Presidiall Court of Nismes their naturall Iudges, from whence hee would draw Commissaries to doe them iustice, and punish the delinquents: But this preuailed nothing: for the seditious continued their attempts. Whereupon the Duke of Vantadour was forced to goe to Armes to maintaine the Kings authoritie, for that the Castle of Prius was besieged by the Seigneurs of Buison and them of the religion, A who had seized upon diuers other Castles. Thus they take armes in Viuzaretz on all sides: The Duke of Montmorency, Gouvernor of the Country, hearing that Buison with the Consuls and Inhabitants of Prius, had besieged Saint Palais in the Castle, seeing the Kings authority contemned by this action, and his honor engaged, hee resolved to goe to Prius. Passing by Montpellier, the Earle of Chastillon with the Consuls of Montpellier, Nismes, and Vzes, and the Deputies of the Assembly of that Circle being then at Lunel, came vnto him, entreating him not to proceed to extremities: that they disauowed Buison's action, and would labour to draw him to obedience: That he should cary himselfe as prudently in this, as hee had done powerfully the year before. To whom hee answered, That he could neither stay nor retire, and that the affront was such, as hee must maintaine the Kings authority and his owne honour, in punishing Buison and the inhabitants of Prius in such sort, as they might serue for a president to posterity, hauing rebelled against their King, and broken their word with their Gouvernor; but at the entreaty of Monseigneur de Chastillon, he would goe thither with a spirit of peace, and should be glad that they themselves would reduce Buison to his duty.

The D. Montmorency words to Monseigneur de Chastillon.

La Banne sent to the King.

Vpon the way he was aduertised that the Castle of Prius was deliuered vp by Saint Palais, vpon an honorable composition to depart with their full armes: the which did much trouble the Duke, who sent presently La Banne to aduertise the King thereof, and to attend his pleasure; who presently returned him with Letters whereby he did much commend his fidelity and care, recommending vnto him especially the publique peace, but yet he desired to be obeyed.

The Duke, finding that he could not satisfie the Kings expectation without force, he employed all his meanes, credit, and friends, and in five dayes drew together eight thousand foot, and foure hundred horse. The Assembly at Lunel commaunded Monseigneur de Chastillon to arme, who with the like speed leauied three or foure thousand horse and foot. Buison fortifies himselfe, and is assisted with men from the Assembly. The Duke marching towards Prius, the Duke of Lefdiguiers going towards the Court, desired to conferre with him about this business; whereupon he went to Valence with the Duke of Vantadour, but they could not find the meanes to settle the Kings authority in Prius; D whereupon they retired, yet with this resolution, not to attempt any thing against Prius untill they had receiued his Maiesties intention.

Villeneuve de Berg taken by the Duke.

The Duke, in his Councell of warre, resolved to besiege Villeneuve de Berg, into the which the Assembly had put some Companies of Souldiers, being a very conuenient place to receiue the succours which the Seuennes should send to Prius, if it were besieged. This Towne was inuested on the fifth of March: Buison seeing the Kings army had left him, and was turned thither, hee presently sent an hundred Musketeers to relieue them; but they found the Towne so besieged as it was not possible to enter.

The next day the Duke summons the Consuls to open their gates: who seeing themselves too weak to maintaine a siege, and without hope of succours, they caryed him their keyes, beseeching him to let them enioy the liberty of the Edicts. It is the Kings will and intent, (said he) that his subiects should enioy the free exercise of the one and the other Religion; you shall not be troubled in yours, and I will keepe you from molesting the Catholiques. Hereupon hee sent certaine Companies to seize vpon the gates, and went himselfe to lodge in the Towne; where the next day hee caused Masse to be restored, whereof they had bene deprived 62. years. The same day the Seigneur de Reaux Lieutenant of the Guard, arrived at Viuzaretz, sent by his Maiesty, to cause as well Monseigneur de Montmorency as Monseigneur de Chastillon, and the Assembly at Lunel to disarme; which they did in shew: yet afterwards M. Montmorency went and besieged Vualz; and the reason was, for that they had refused to lodge Montmajor brother to Collonel D'Ornans, F who led the Regiment of his brother Macargues, to whom the towne belonged, with an intent to vse his subiects more kindly then another would: vpon this repulse (thinking his honor to be interested) he intreated the Duke to make good the quarter which he had giuen him. Vualz is strong by situation, being among the mountaines, and hath a Castle of aduantage: the inhabitants are all of the reformed Religion, and there were likewise 400 Souldiers sent them from the Seuennes, so as they refused to defend the towne, and not to lodge any Catholique troops. They fortified a Mill with an hundred of their best Souldiers,

A Souldiers, whereby they might hinder the passage of the river of Ardeche. The Marquis of Portes charged them, and in the end forced them to retire to the Towne, which was presently inuested, so as after some volleys of Cannon, they desired to parley with De Reaux, to whom they said, they desired to obey his Maiesties commandements, and to be maintained according to the Edicts, beseeching him to be mediator for them vnto the Duke: who considering the strong situation of the Castle, was content to receiue them to grace, vpon condition that they should haue three hundred men of Macargues regiment in garrison: that the Castle should be deliuered into the hands of an Exempt of the Guard: that the Souldiers should be conducted to a place of safety: and that the Consuls should vpon their knees for the inhabitants, demand pardon of the King in the person of the Duke, who should maintaine them in the liberty of their religion.

Vualz yielded to the D. of Montmorency.

The Seigneurs of Autiege had bene sent by the Assembly of that Circle, with twelue hundred men, to defend Vualz; but hearing vpon the way that it was lost, he put himselfe into Valons, and expelled the Exempt of the Guard whom de Reaux had placed there. This action caused the Councell of warre to resolve to besiege it, to repair this affront done to the Kings authority. The Duke caused the army to march, and the towne was inuested and battered: a reasonable breach was made, & the Marquis of Portes lodged with his men vpon the walls. Whereupon Autiege finding that hee should be forced the same day, he demanded a safe conduct to parley with the Marquis, who conducted him to the Duke; by which this Composition was made: That within one houre after, hee and all his Souldiers should depart out of Valons, with their armes onely, without Drumme or Match light, like vanquished men: That they should not cary armes for six moneths in the Prouince: and that if there were any Inhabitants of Valons amongst them, the Captain in whose troope they were found, should be stayed and punished. The Souldiers retired presently through the Army to Monseigneur de Chastillon, and the towne was abandoned for one whole day to the spoyle of the Souldiers.

Valons yielded to the Duke.

In January there was a Letter presented vnto the King touching the Assembly at Rochel, in the name of the Marshall of Bouillon, as followeth.

Sir, I was refused to remaine in silence, seeking to ease my ordinary indisposition in the quiet rest of my family: but now I thought that I ought not to concele from your Maiesty, That of late the Deputies of high Languedoc and high-Guienne assembled at Millaut, haue sent a Gentleman vnto mee, to aduertise mee of the feares and distrusts wherein your subiects of the Religion are in those parts, as well as in other Prouinces, by reason of the threats they vse daily in all the parts of your Kingdome: That they will breake the Edicts, take from them the liberty of their consciences, the safety of their liues, and the quiet enioying of their dignities: moued hereunto (they say) by that which hath passed in Beame, for that they had anticipated the execution, contrary to the order, whereof they had giuen assurance in your Maiesties name, at the last assembly of your subiects at Loudun; they hauing committed no act contrary to their duties. Whereunto they added the inexecution of those things which had bene promised: the iaculosity which the Garsions giue them which haue bene left in diuers places without necessity: the rigorous Inimities made against the Assembly at Rochel, which they hold to be grounded vpon the word, which (they beleue) had been giuen in your Maiesties name to the said Assembly at Loudun, as the Deputies thereof haue reported to their Prouinces: and diuers other occasions arising daily, which makes them doubt there is a generall designe to ruiue the Religion, and all those which make profession thereof within your Realme. And hereupon, Sir, protesting that they will neuer depart from the duty and obedience whereunto their subiection and conscience doth binde them to your Maiesty: I cannot but suffer in their miseries, being bound thereunto, by the profession of that Religion which I haue in common with them. They inuite mee to giue my aduice, and to send some one to the Assembly at Rochel, to ioyn in their humble complaints they desire to make vnto your Maiesty: I thought it my duty first to aduertise you before I made any answer, and to beseech you to giue me your commandements thereupon. Sir, I will presume to tell you with that humble respect which I owe, and the liberty which my age, and former experience hath giuen mee, That Remonstrances being the onely and lawfull meanes by the which your Subiects of the Religion should adresse themselves vnto your Maiesty, who by your equity may iudge of the iustice or iniustice thereof, and haue have more contentment and profit for your service by receiving them, then in rejecting, especially how when they are so full of distrust, as they think their ruine is resolved, and that they will thrust them into despair to vendoe them. The remedy cannot be applied but by your Maieſtie, who alone after God may diuert this mischiefe, and prevent it by your wisdom and authority, in continuing your royall protection to your subjects of the Religion, and not suffer that to aduance the ruine of so many innocent persons, who breathe nothing but the prosperity of your reigne, and their faithfull obedience to your service, they should offer violence to the Edicts of Kings your Predecessors, the which your Maieſtie hath oft confirmed. I cannot beleue, Sir, they giue you such hurtfull counsels, and so preiudiciall to your Estate, and much lesse, that your Maieſtie will put them in practice, to kindle a fire of civill warre in the midst of your kingdom, which the decaied King your father quenched with so much pains and wisdom, knowing well that the conscience cannot be forced by the power of sword or fire, nor the spirit constrained to beleue that which it beleueeth not: It might be rather feared that by a doubtfull and vncertaine hope (which the passion of some ill-willers vnto your subjects of the Religion may giue vnto your Maieſty to re-vnite by armes all your subjects) beleueing your authority would be engaged in most dangerous inconueniences. And I pray God to remove from about your sacred Maieſtie all those which would enduce you to this violence, and together with them the dreadfull prodages which may come of such counsels. That if in these present occurrents, which have given mee occasion to write vnto you, touched with a liuely feeling which I haue of the mischiefe these distrusts may breed, and wherein I attend the honor of your commandements, I may be so happy to be able to contribute any thing to helpe to maintain the publick peace, and tranquillity, all which your Maieſty may expect of me, and of my deuotion and fidelity to your service. I most humbly beseech you to excuse me, if by reason of my infirmities of the gout, I haue beene enforced to borrow my sonnes hand to signe, rather then to faile of my duty, beseeching God to poure all his blessings vpon your Maieſtie, and to giue you a long and happy life. From Sedan the second of January, 1621.

The D. of Lefdiguiers from the Letters to the Assembly at Rochel.

The Answer of the Assembly.

Monsieur de la Force Gouverneur of Beame, wrote a Letter about the same time to his Maieſtie, and to the same effect. The Duke of Lefdiguiers wrote a second Letter vnto the Assembly at Rochel on the 22 of February, giuing them to vnderstand, that he went to Court according to the Kings commandement, where hee would see the Churches with all his power, to the end they might be maintained in peace according to the Edicts; but hee could not comprehend the subject of their Conuocation, nor of their stay at Rochel, seeing that what had beene granted at their separation from Loudun, had beene fully executed.

To these two Letters of Monsieur Lefdiguiers the Assembly at Rochel published an Answer in Print, whereby they did insinuate that their Assembly was lawfull, and with the Kings permission; they being promised at the time of their separation from Loudun, that if the Articles granted, were not accomplished within the time prefixed, they might sit againe: whereof he himselfe (they sayd) had giuen them assurance in his Maieſties name, and that the King himselfe had confirmed the same at Fontaine-beau, to the Deputies of the Assembly, when they did aduertise him of their separation: so as they thought they had no need to craue a permission of more force, or a more firme assurance then his Maieſties most sacred word: and to confirme the reasons of their Assembly they said that nothing had beene executed within the terme of six moneths prefixed, but only the delivery of the Briefe for the places of safety; and in the mean time the King had gone into Beame, during the delay granted for their Remonstrances, which had not beene heard; where the restitution was not onely executed, but their Churches had lost their safety and liberty which for many years they had enjoyed in those parts, and in an instant had followed the euent of all those dangerous consequences which they had doubted from the beginning.

Hereunto they added many other Grievances, humbly beseeching him to assist them with his fauour to his Maieſty, that he would be pleased to heare their complaints so necessary for their preservation and peace.

Monsieur de la Force continued in his Government of Beame, and Nauarreux was committed to the fidelity of Monsieur de Poynne, betweene whom there grew jealousies.

They

Certaine Letters to the Assembly at Rochel.

A That the Religion held an Assembly at Pau: from whence Captaine Benſins with some others, went and put himselfe into the Towers of Montgiscard, neere vnto the bridge of Berence, about the end of February, hauing before secretly sent thither store of munition and victuals. The Gouvernor of Nauarreux found presently that Benſins had not put him selfe into Montgiscard, but by the commandement of Monsieur de la Force, and of the said Assembly, to the end that this place might quer-looke Nauarreux; it being held impregnable; being seated vpon an high steepe Mountain, whereunto there is no passage but for one man going bias wise. On the top there are two Towers in the middelt of a round platforme, being sixscore paces in diameter, enuironed with great ditches, which Benſins had suddenly fortified within the platforme, with a high Pallisade filled with earth. To haue a pretext of a quarrell, Benſins caused the Abbot of Caignone and one of Poyannes horsemen to be stayd vpon the bridge of Berence, whereupon he presently sent Latanlade his Lieutenant to Monſi. de la Force, to acquaint him with Benſins actions in Montgiscard, and to tell him plainly, that if hee would not contribute, for his part hee was resolved, to doe his dutie for the Kings service. Latanlade returned without any other answer, but that Monsieur de la Force knew not what it meant, but would refer himselfe to that which Monsieur Poyanne should doe.

Hereupon he drawes what Forces he can about Orres, where he found a Gentleman belonging to Monsieur de la Force, who told him, that if he went to Montgiscard, it would alter the Kings service in Beame; to whom Monsieur Poyanne answered, that hee went not to Montgiscard but to see the King, to whom hee must giue an account of his actions, assuring himselfe that he would rest satisfied therewith as of his fidelity: and seeing that Monsieur de la Force had referred the action to his discretion, he was resolved to see the end, and oppose himselfe to the rebellion of factious Benſins.

Before his coming thither, he sent to summon him to leave the place; whose answer was, That he had beene put into the Towers of Montgiscard by the Assembly of Pau, and that he would not abandon it but by their commandement: whereupon they were instructed, and notwithstanding the difficulty of the hill, they made their approaches neere vnto the Towers. During this siege, Monsieur de la Force takes occasion to draw together what forces he could, and the Marquis his sonne was coming out of Perigord with some troops of horse, and Regiments of foot. Monsieur de la Force told a Gentleman, sent vnto him from Monsieur de Poynne, that he would be Master in his Government, and that he would come to Montgiscard to play his part, seeing that Monsieur de Poynne took vpon him his place. Thus the Nobility and Gentry of the Country were diuided into two factions, according to their affections in Religion. Monsieur de Poynne had drawne together 2000 foot, 500 Masters, and as many Harquebussiers on horsebacke. In the meane time they presse the siege, and winne the first ditch, so as Benſins (seeing the danger that it could not be long before he were forced) desired a Parley, at the which he made no difficulty to offer the place, so as he might depart with a little honour. This being reported

B To Monsieur de Poynne, he made answer, That he had neuer fought for vanity nor spoile. The composition was made, that yielding vpon Montgiscard, he and his Souldiers should depart with their liues and baggage, and be conducted to a place of safety; so as on the 11 of March he went forth of the place with about threecore Souldiers, which Monsieur de Poynne caused to be presently ruined.

The King being aduertised of these alterations in Beame, he sent the Seigneur of Salady to Monsieur de la Force, with commandement to disarme: and if hee found him not well inclined thereunto, he should deliuer a Commission vnto the Duke of Epemron, to goe into Beame with 2000 foot and 500 horse, to make them all disarme which had not speciall warrant. His Maieſty also sent Letters of commandement to the Seigneurs of Montepan, Gondrin, Vignolles, Miossens, and Grammont, to assist him with their troops and friends. Saladie deliuered his charge to Monsieur de la Force, commanding him to disarme his troops to whom he answered, That he must first accommodate the enterprise which Monsieur de Poynne had made, in taking armes in his Government without his leave. Saladie replied, The King hath aduowed him, considering the importance of the action. Now the question is, said he, that you tell me whether you will obey his Maieſties commandement or no: whereupon Monſi. de la Force said vnto him, The Kings meaning is, that no man shall attempt vpon my Government: I desire to know his Maieſties pleasure.

returne vnto him and hauing brought me word, you shall finde that I haue alwayes beene and will be most obedient to his commandements. This delay makes Saladie deliuer his Commission to the Duke of Epemnon and the rest, so as in an instant Guicenne was in armes, and on the 21 day of April entred into Bearne, with whom Monsieur de Peyran ioyned with 300 horse and good troopes of foot. This storme approaching, Monsieur de la Force and all those of his partie retired speedily out of the Countrey, some hiding themselves in the mountaines, and hee himselfe with others retired into Guicenne towards Nerac.

A peace sealed in Bearne.

Monsieur de la Force and his Sommes dismissed from their places.

The D of Epemnon comming to Pau, he acquainted the Parliament that his commission was onely to haue the King obeyed: He assured himselfe of diuers Castles in the coun-trie, and caused such to be pursued as were fled into the mountaines, where many were slaine in diuers encounters, and others taken prisoners: so as in fiftene dayes hee sealed a peace vnder the obedience of the Kings Edicts, causing euery man to enioy the libertie of his religion. As for Monsieur de la Force, he lost the gouernment of Bearne, which was conferred vpon the Marshall de Themines: His eldest sonne the Marquis, who was captaine of the Guard, was dismissed from his place, and it was giuen to the Marquis of Maunoy. He had a yonger sonne, whose name was Montpaulhan, whom the King had alwaies affected, but now he was commanded to retire from Court.

The continuance of the assemblie at Rochel, had much incensed the King against them of the religion: the late Combusions in Viuretz and Bearne, had increased his dislike. He thinks his authoritie blemished and troden vnder foot: He therefore resolues to arme, and to force them to obedience; but there wanted the sinewes of warre: An Army cannot subsist long without money; it supplies the wants both of backe and belly, which are of more force then any command. It must be found out, before he goes to this warre:
but by what meanes? To draw it from the people, were to adde affliction to affliction:
They haue smarted too much in the late ciuill combusions: so as in the end hee resolues to make vse of his owne, and to alienate some of his Reuenues: and to that end his Maiestie went on the third of April to the Parliament, to verifie an Edict, by the which he declared that for the entertainment of his armies, and the reliefe of his poore subjects, (much oppressed by the calamities of former wars) he was resolved to alienate part of his imposts by way of a rent-charge to the value of 40000 pound sterling yearly; the which should be sold to the Prouost of Merchants and the Sheriffes of Paris, for the summe of 600000 pound sterling; which rent should be taken out of the Imposts of Salt, which should be bound and pawned for the payment and continuance of the said Rents. And his pleasure was, that sales and priuate assignations should be made by the said Prouost and Sheriffes, to the particular inhabitants of Paris, and other his subjects, which were willing to buy, paying three parts in ready money, and the other fourth part, in discharge of those debts which were lawfully due by him, the which they should freely and peaceably enioy without any restraint vntill they were actually satisfied at one entire payment of the whole summe, for the which they had made their purchases, notwithstanding that a fourth part had beene paid in debts. There were also other Edicts verifed for the making of money, the which was thought would bring in a Million of pounds sterling euery yeare for the maintenance of the warre against them of the Reformed Religion, and against the towne of Rochel, which contrary to his Maiesties will had suffered a general Assembly to be held there.

The Office of Constable addressed to Lesli-giers.

The King fore-seeing in the beginning of this yeare, that hee was to enter into a great warre, resolved to settle the place of Constable, and according to his first intention, he had sent a Briefe to the Duke of Lefdiguiers, who was at Grenoble for the same, vpon condition that he should become a Catholique: This was one of the two reasons which drew him to Court: the first was to thanke the King for the honour he had done him in offering him the first office of the Crowne: and the second was, to employ himselfe to accomodate the disobedience of the assembly which was held at Rochel without his Maiesties leave. The Dukes Catholique friends exhorted him both by word and writing to accept it, saying that this charge was due vnto him, as to the greatest Captaine of our age, and the most faithfull of the Kings subjects, most happy in his successe in all his enterprises, and the man who had most obliged his Country: and as he was without companion for those qualities, so he needed not feare any coruiall in his pretension; but to these qualities he must make

1621

A make profession of the Romish religion: which they said was so necessary, as the King would rather forbear to make a Constable, then to doe it without this condition.
That they of the reformed Religion had by the Graunts and Edicts of their former Kings beene made capable of all Offices: but this (which makes him that enioyes it, the second person in the State, and giues a power in a manner equall to the royall authoritie,) must be excepted. They of the religion said, that it was sufficient to haue deferred this honour, although he did not enioy it, with that condition, which if he did, he would lose all his ancient seruants and friends, and his credit with them of his religion. The Duke being come to Paris, he thanked the king for the Briefe he had sent him for the office of Constable, and excused himselfe vpon many great and important considerations, pro-pounding vnto him the Duke of Luynes, who was in speciall grace with his Maiestie; whereupon with the approbation of the Prince of Condé, the Duke of Guise, and many other great personages, the Duke of Luynes was made Constable of France, and took his oath: his letters being verifed by the Court of Parliament: After which, the Duke of Lefdiguiers was made Marshall generall of the Royall Armies.

Duke of Luynes made Constable of France

The King desirous to aduertise all the chieft of his realme of the estate of his affaires, through the disobedience of the assemblie at Rochel, and that hee had made the Duke of Luynes Constable of France, he wrote this following letter to the Marshall of Bouillon.

The Kings Letter to the Marshall of Bouillon.

Cousin, seeing the Assembly of Rochel yeelds mee not the obedience which they ought, and that I haue as you know, attended it hitherto: That in Bearne they haue made publique enterprises, and drawne souldiers together against my authoritie and expresse commandement; And that it seemes that some of my subjects endeavour to trouble the publique peace; to ouerthrow the order I haue taken with so much paine and trauaile to assure and establish the same in my kingdom: I am resolved presently after Easter to goe to Tours, where I will aduise of what I haue to doe, and to provide for the maintenance of my authoritie and Edicts, which is the end of my iourney and my intentions; Hauing the like will to preferue and fauour those which shall continue in their duties, as to reduce such as shall forget their obedience, not regarding herein religion, but onely the faction; whereof I will hereafter aduertise you more particularly when I come to Tours. In the meane time I thought good to acquaint you herewith, being assured that you will allow of my designe, blaming these disobediences and disorders, and continue in this occasion and all others to shew your good will, for the maintenance of your autho-ritie, and the publique good of this businesse. I will adde hereunto, that I haue advanced my Cousin the Duke of Luynes to the charge of Constable of France, iudging that the re-establishment of that place will be greatly profitable and behouefull to my affaires and Kingdome, putting the same into the hands of a Personage endowed with so many good parts. Whereby I assure my selfe the successe will be answerable to my hopes, and to the contentment of such as loue my person, and the good of my seruice, and particularly of you, Cousin, whom I pray God to preferue. Paris the 4 of April.

E Vnto this Letter the Marshall of Bouillon made this answer. Sir, I receiued the Letter which it pleased your Maiesty to send me of the fourth of this present moneth, by which I vnderstand to my great griefe, the discontent which your Maiesty continues to receiue from your subjects of the Religion assembled at Rochel; and your resolution to goe to Tours, there to aduise of the meanes how you may maintaine your authoritie and Edicts.
Whereupon Sir, I most humbly beseech your Maiesty to pardon me, if I make bold to say vnto you, that you might receiue more contentment in this troublesome businesse, vifing your bounty and clemency, rather then the rigour and force of armes, in causing (without any other consideration) that immediately of your selfe, by your iustice and goodnesse, the fore-passed inexecution of your Edicts may be executed; & that for the time to come,
F they may be maintained and obserued: for by these meanes you will take away the feare which almost all your subjects of the Religion in all the Provinces haue: that contrary to your Maiesties intention, they will breake the Edicts; and that they make but their pretext of this disobedience of those of Rochel. That hereunto tend all the oaths which haue been lately taken in diuers places, yea, in the presence of your Maiesty. And this apprehension which is almost generall, making them beleue, that their ruine is intended, cannot but produce dangerous inconueniences, which might be auoided, by causing them to see the contrary in effect. For this feare being taken away, a notable disobedience would appeare,

 diguier feels to reduce the Assembly at Rochel to obedience

The Assembly
 answer

The King going from Paris on the fifth of April, hee stayed at Fontaine-bleau vntill the nine and twentieth, to giue the Duke Lesdiguier time (as hee had intreated his Maiestie) to imploy his credit (if it were possible) to reduce the assemblie of Rochel to obedience. The Duke had sent two seuerall Gentlemen with Letters to Rochel, reproaching their disobedience, which deserved a sharpe punishment; and exhorting them to consider of the afflictions which might fall vpon their Churches in diuers parts of France.
 To his letters they published this answer. Wee know Sir how much wee should attribute to the aduice which comes from so great an experience; but wisthail, remember if you please, what hath followed against your expectation and ours, after your mediation C at Loudun, and to what dangerous inconueniences our facilitie hath brought vs, being in danger to fall into the like, if we follow the same courtes; to the end you may beare with vs, if that wound which it hath giuen vs in our preservation, makes vs incapable of the separation which you require with such instance, adding to your aduice reproaches of disobedience, and the threats of a sharpe punishment; which we should not finde strange in the enemies of our profession; who diuerting his Maiesties good inclination, take delight in slanders and violence, and whose spleene we know, will not bee restrained with the ruine of the Churches of Bearne: but when as they (which are so much bound to the peace of Gods houles, in the which they haue taken their being and must leaue an Honorable memorie to posteritie) lift vp their armes against vs, this is an affliction which wee cannot D expresse, &c.

Notwithstanding the sharpnesse of these Letters, the Seigneurs of Fauas and Chalas deputies of the reformed Churches, being commaunded to pursue their complaints in the name of the Churches (because that in Court they would in no case heare mention of the said Assemblie) aduertised the said Duke Lesdiguier of all their former grieuances, and pray him once for all to giue peace vnto the Churches. The Duke hauing treated hereof with the Kings Councill, he gaue them this answer, first that the King was resolved to maintaine his Authoritie, and not to suffer any assembly within his Realme without his permission. Secondly, to cause his Edicts of pacification to bee observed; Thirdly, As for the assemblie at Rochel his Maiesties pleasure was, that the Deputies should craue E pardon, and then they should proceed to their separation. Fourthly, that in regard thereof, his Maiestie would cause his Souldiers to retire from those places which might giue any cause of distrust. Fifthly, that for the places of Iuretic in Dauphine, his Maiestie would ordaine that within fixe Moneths, they should haue what they could iustly and reasonably demand in that regard. Sixtly, touching Bearne, that there should bee an order effectually performed, if it were not already done, for the payment of the money which his Ma-jestie had graunted in stead of that which had beene receiued out of the reuennues of the Clergie. Seuenthly, That Monsieur de la Force, should enioy his Government of Bearne and his Children their places, with all Honors belonging vnto them: or else his Maiestie should giue them recompence, or suffer them to receiue it from such as should bee pleasing vnto him. Eightly, And touching the Government of Ortez, it should not bee taken out of his hands who commaunded therein; his Maiestie being aduertised that hee had not swarued from his obedience: And to witness his Maiesties will to make vse of his seruice, he would send him a particular Letter.

The Deputies at the reading of these Articles, shewed that the assembly at Rochel would neuer accept of these Conditions, yet they intreated the Duke that nothing might bee attempted against the Churches vntill the returne of Monsieur de Fauas from Rochel, the

A which he promised, desiring his speede: but all this wrought no effect; but they sent Letters to the Duke reiterating their former complaints with that which had past in Bearne and Vannes.

The King hearing of their proceedings and intention, halted his journey to Tours, from thence to go into Poitou. And to the end they of the reformed Religion should not grow irascions of his journey, on the second of April he published a Declaration in fauor of those which should containe themselves in their dutie and obedience; taking them into his protection. During this Declaration which was made at Fontaine-bleau, there hapned a great combustion in Tours against them of the Religion, about the buying of one Martin

B le Noire an Inn-keeper. They going to intetie him on Sunday the 13 of April, the people and children flocked together, singing of songs against the party deceased, who they said was a man of a lewd life. The base multitude increased stilly and animated the children, who followed them with stones and twillings, so as they were forced to retire themselves into an house neere vnto the Church-yard, where as this rascall table held them in a mariner besieged. Some got into the towne and complained vnto the Maior, who came presently to the place, and freed them which were in the house. Hee being retired, the multitude grew greater; for that many rascals were joined with the boies, and came into the Church-yard, where they drew the bodie out of the graue, with an intent to burne it; if the Maior and other Officers had not come and caused the bodie to be re-interred. Notwithstanding all their endeours, this insolence continued the next day, and they spoiled

A multitude of

C and burnt the houses of them of the Religion about the Church-yard, & their Temple. The King being aduertised of this Edition from the Maior of Tours, he presently gaue Commission to Melleuille le Doux Master of Requests, to goe thither and informe of the fact, being accompanied by an Exempt of the Guard and two Archers. Hee also commaunded the Secretaries of State to write into all parts, that this disorder should be punished ex-emplarily. In the meane time the Lieutenant criminal and the Kings Proctor had committed five of those seditious rascals to prison, which had assisted the boies and helped to burne the Temple. Melleuille comes to Tours; and beganne to proceed against them.

The violence of the seditious multitude.

The people hearing that they would hang the prisoners, a multitude of the base sort came before the Palace, and with a sudden violence entered, brake the doores and windows of the criminal Chamber, freed the five prisoners, and forced the Iudges to faine themselves as they could. After this they spoiled five houses belonging to them of the Religion. Vpon this great disorder the inhabitants began to shut vp their shops, to goe to armes, and to make barricadoes, threatening to shoot at the seditious, who were nothing amazed, but desired to speake with the Maior; who being acquainted with their demand, he gaue them to vnderstand, that if three or foure would speake with him, they should be conducted with all safetie: the multitude allowed of it, and three great Rogues offering themselves, past three barricadoes without armes. At their first approach they insolently demanded three prisoners which were yet detained. My friends said the Lieutenant crimi-nall, you haue them all. Wee haue but two said they, and there remaine three: but being assured of the contrary; This is not all said they, we require, that you and the Maior shall signe it vnder your hands, that if there be any of ours found in your prisons, you shall fet them at libertie; and that hereafter (vpon your soules and bodies) there shall neuer any in-quirie bee made for that which is past, the which was granted and presently signed. At night Melleuille and others came out of those places where they had hidden themselves to auoide the furie of the multitude, taking poste to goe and aduertise the King: who was come to Blois with an intent to make some stay there; but hearing of this mutiny, hee departed the next day, and came to Tours on the sixt of May. The Grand Prouoost committed 25 or 30 of this seditious multitude, and a day was appointed for the execution of F five of them which were most culpable, and the rest were pardoned.

 The day before this execution, the King parted from Tours towards Saumur, vpon a certaine intelligence which he receiued from Rochel, that in their assembly it had beene resol-ued to put 6000 souldiers into that Town, and to surpris Monsr. de Pliss, and the Siegne of Armagnac gouernor of Loudun, to the end that if the King marched into Paris with an army, they might cut off the intercourse betweene Paris and it. Moreover, that they of the Religion of Mayen, Perche, and Beaufe should ioyne together, and execute their designes, vpon Chartres, Vendôme and Planciers.

Advertisements given to the King touching
the Assembly.

They write that the King shewed this advertisement to the Duke of Lefdiguiers, who was of opinion that he should prevent the danger, and specify assure this Towne and passage of Loire to his obedience. Hereupon his harbingers come on the 10 of May, where they began to make out the King and Queens lodgings. In the evening some companies of the Guard arose, and the next morning the Suisses, who marched directly to the castle, Monf. de Plessis seeing them at the gate, and the harbingers ready to make out the Kings lodgings, hee intreated them to have patience untill hee knew his Majesties pleasure, unto whom hee had sent : but hearing in the afternoon that his pleasure was to lye in the castle, he presently delivered the keys to the Captaines of the Guard : drew his garrison out into the field, and himselfe went into the town. The King arising towards the evening at Chappell, Monf. de Plessis saluted him, and offered whatsoeuer hee had or might have : the Officers of Iustice did the like, with the Magistrates and Clergy. The King stayed five daies at Saumur untill the 16 of May, where he received a confirmation both of the former advertisement for the putting of 6000 men into Saumur, and that they had made a division of the Provinces of France into 7 Synods or Circles, making Bearne the eighth. That they had chosen a head for their generall Army which they should raise, and Generals in every Circle, with the orders which should be observed ; the said Assembly reserving the soveraigne authority to dispose and depose the said Generals and of all affaires. That the duke of Rohan (having accepted to be General in chiefe of high Languedoc and high Guienne) had delivered the government of Saint Iohn D'Angely unto Monf. de Soubise his brother, who was also chosen General of Britany, Poitou, and L'Isle-Bouchard. That on the 13 of May, the Duke of Rohan and his brother Soubise, had made a Proclamation in Saint Iohn D'Angely, that whosoever would not carry armes for the defence of the Towne, should depart within three daies, the which most of the Catholikes did, and some of the reformed Religion. That the Assembly had sent to the Noblemen, Townes, and Churches of their party, in the Country of Orlance, Berry, Sologne, Gascinois and Loris, to take Armes and to assiste Gergeau, Sancerre, Sully & Chastau. Renard, and to surpris all the passages they could upon the river of Loire about Orlance. That they had sent to all those of their religion in Normandy, Britany and Champagne, to take armes and seize upon all the strong places they could within their Provinces. Finally, they D write, that they had resolved to make war in all the Provinces of France.

These advertisements whether true or false, were the subject which made the King send to the Earle of Saint Paul from Saumur, and to the Prince of Conde, to give order for Sancerre : To Monf. de Longueville to disarme them of the religion in the Townes of Rouen, Caen, Diepe, and New-haven, and to treat with the Earle of Montgomery for Pontorion : To the Duke of Vendosme, to assure himselfe of Vitry and Chastillon in Vandolais : and unto Monf. de Nevers, to disarme them of the religion in Champagne. How these commandements were executed in their Gouvernements, you shall heare hereafter.

The Assembly (as they said) being forced to take armes for their iust and naturall defence, and for the liberties of their consciences, and safety of their lives, divided their Provinces into eight circles (as hath been said) and made choice of generals who should command therein. To the Duke of Bouillon first Marshall of France was given Normandy, the Isle of France, Berry, Anjou, Mayen, Perche and Touraine, except L'Isle-Bouchard. To Monf. de Soubise, Britany, L'Isle-Bouchard, Poitou, and that which depends thereon. To the Duke of Tremouille, Angoumois, Xaintonge, and the adjacent Islands. To Monf. de La Force, base Guienne. To the Marquis of La Force, Bearne. To the Duke of Rohan, high Languedoc, and high Guienne. To the Earle of Chastillon, base Languedoc, the Seuenues, Gevodan, and Viuzet. And to the Duke D'Esdiguiers, Dauphine, Prouence and Bourgondy. They made many orders in this Assembly for military service, whereof the Assembly referred to themselves a soveraigne power : That no treaties of peace nor truce might be made, but by the resolution of the generall Assembly. Touching the orders souldiers should observe : Forbidding of traffike : For the payment of souldiers : For the liberty of husbandmen : For the stay of the Kings revenues and of the Clergy : with divers others, the full power whereof was referred to the generall Assembly.

The Provinces of France being thus divided into 7 Circles, and choice made by the Assembly of severall persons to be commanders in those Circles : the Duke of Bouillon who was the first (and should have been general of their army, wheresoever he had come) would

A would not accept of their Commission. The Duke of Tremouille also refused it, protesting all fidelity and obedience to the King. And as for the seventh Circle which they had given to the Duke D'Esdiguiers, seeing him so constant in the Kings service, and that he was now made Great Marshall of the Kings Armies ; and besides, that he had by his letters termed their Assembly unlawfull, they refused to make Lieutenants general in that seventh Circle, whereof Monf. de Montbrun had letters for Prouence. They of the reformed Religion had 9 Townes of surety within these seven Circles, and 601 Churches. These Townes were given them by former Kings for their safety after the Ciuill Warres, in the which they had Governours of their owne Religion, and in many of them the King paid the Garisons. Montauban and Rochel were not of the number, but Governed themselves, apart by their Consuls and Maior. Besides, they enjoyed many Townes and Castles which were no Towns of safety : But you shall see this summers war will deprive them of most of them, taken by force, or yielded by voluntary obedience.

The King before his departure from Saumur, made the Earle of Sault (of the reformed Religion, sonne to Monf. de Crequi, and grand-child to the Duke D'Esdiguiers) Governour of the Towne with a good Garison ; and as they write, contented Monf. de Plessis, letting him know that it was necessary for the publique safety, the Towne and Castle should remaine during his voyage, in the order he left it, and likewise for his entertainments he gave him allowance. On the 17, the King came to Touars, a Towne of safety, belonging to the Duke of Tremouille, where the Lady his mother remainyng. The place imports for the passage, yet the King took the Ladies word for the Towne and Castle. He came from thence to Partenay, where he stayed 4 daies, to let his Cannon & munition advance. In the meane time, he writes to all places both within and without the Realme, touching the innocence of his Armes. The Secretaries of State write unto all the Provinces, not to suffer any leaues of Souldiers, and that the Edicts in fauour of them of the religion (who had no society nor correspondencie with the factions of Rochel) should be strictly observed. There the Constable de Luynes, examined the state of the Army, and saw the accompt of the Munition of Warre, and enquired of the Earle of Chomberg, what Treasure hee had to support the charges of the Warre ; giving order for all things which D was held necessarie for the siege of Saint Iohn D'Angely.

During the Kings stay at Partenay, the Earle of Auric advanced towards S. Iohn with five regiments of Foot, and two Cornets of Horse. On May 16, in the night, hee camped within a quarter of a league of the Towne, taking the bridges which crosse the River of Buttone, and there made three barricadoes. Here they within the Towne committed a great error, not knowing the importance of the passage vntill it was too late : for if they had broken these bridges, it would have beene difficult to have passed their cannon. They of the Towne drew in what prouision they could, seeing the enemy so neere them : for they had still two Ports open, by which there entred in seven daies about 2000 Foot and many Gentlemen. The Earle forced the barricadoes, which they of the Towne had made E in the suburbs of Maftha, and drew neere to the Port. The town-men burnt three of their suburbs ; and the Duke of Rohan seeing himselfe thus pressed, complains by his Letters unto the Earle of Auric, for that hee viold such acts of hostility against him, considering their great familiarity & friendship. He protested he would not attempt any thing against the Kings authority, but was still ready to obey his commandements, desiring him to suffer a Gentleman to passe whom hee had sent with Letters to the Constable. The Earle made him this Answer.

Sir, You must not misconstrue my proceeding, seeing it is by the Kings command. I should have beene glad this charge had beene given to some other, in regard of the friendship which is betwixt vs, but seeing it hath pleased his Majestic to command mee to this F I write, I would not contradict his will : wherefore I pray you hold it for strange, and blame (although to my great griefe) that I will do what possibly I can, to shew how faithful and obedient I am to his commandement. I assure you that the Seigneur of La Force may passe with all safety to the Constable ; but in the meane time I will not forbear that which hath beene given me in charge, and dispose of the Forces as shall be thought fittest. And will remaine your humble and obedient Seruant, &c. The Gentleman coming to Partenay delivered this letter following to the Constable : Sir, Reporting myselfe on the credit of your fauor, I write unto you to beseech you

Auric Answers

1621

At de Rohans
Letter to the

to mitigate the sharp and violent pursuits, and strait pressing of S. Iohn. You know I neuer refused to giue the King entry into this towne: but some mutiners and feditious, which were in armes about the rampiers, caused me for sometime to keep the Ports shut, that I might pacifie to people greatly animated, and draw them to the obedience which they owe vnto the King: this haue I by all meanes endeouored to doe, and therein employed the feueritie and power of that command which hath pleased his Maiestie to giue me in this Towne; and haue so much preuailed, as I can assure you they will receive whomsoever he shall appoint: and for my owne part, I am resolu'd to quit the place. But as you know, my enemies who haue brought me into bad termes with his Maiestie, giue me occasion enough of distrust. I pray you to moue the King to permit me to leaue him the Town without seeing his Maiesty, for the Iealousie I haue that my enemies seek rather my ruine than the publike good. I referre this businesse to your discretion, and intreat you to beleeue that I am your most humble and obedient seruant, Henry de Rohan. From Saint-Iohn May 18, 1621.

Some said, that the Duke of Rohans intention was contrary to his writing: his acceptance of the Assemblies Commission: his preparations to take possession of the Circle of Languedoc and Guienne: the burning of the suburbs of S. Iohn, and the souldiers which he had drawne into the towne, were sufficient proofes: And whereas he said he would quit the towne, it was not to deliuer it into the Kings hands, but commit it in guard to his brother Soubise. To whom the Constable made this answer.

The Dukes answer.

'Sir: If my fauor were such as it could stay the Kings designe, and preuent his enterprises, I would boldly promise that which you require with such instance: but you know the King is so absolute in his resolutions, as it is hard to diuert him from his will: yet I promise to employ all my credit for your content, and to draw him to that which you demand, not that I will constantly assure you, but I will doe my best endeour, being your most obedient seruant, De Luynes.

Diuers Governors bring their keyes vnto the
King.

The Governours of S. Maixant and Fountenay, came and brought their keyes vnto the King being at Partenay: and they of Chastellerault and L'Isle-Bouchard had done the like at Saumur. Comming to Fountenay on the 23, the Minister & Consistory cast themselves at his feet. The Minister craued pardon, beseeching the King to leaue them the libertie of their Religion, and to assure himselfe of their obedience. His Maiestie answered, that he had neuer infringed the Edicts, and that he had not taken armes but to punish those which had violated them, and to maintaine the rest in peace, and that he pardoned what was past, hoping they would doe better hereafter. He spake principally to the Minister, who had bene one of the most turbulent of the Assembly. Monf. de la Boulay Governour of Fountenay made knowne vnto his Maiestie, that the place might be in danger of revolt by reason of the neighborhood of Rochel, whereupon the King left an Exempt of his Guard in the Castle. Maillezay situated in an Island, and having but one passage to enter, yielded at the same time to the King. The Governour of Maran, brother to Monf. de la Boulay brought also his keyes to Fountenay, to whom the King deliuered them againe commanding him to continue faithfull in his seruice, and to leaue souldiers for the preservation of the place, for that it would cut off all commerce betwene Rochel and Poitou.

The King came to Niort: a towne of surety, whereas M. Karabel receiued him with all freedom. He blamed the disobedience of Rochel, and grieved at their designs, protesting that he would neuer separate himselfe from the Kings commandement. Thus all the Governours of the townes of Gasconie in Poitou and Touraine, hauing brought their keyes vnto the King, his Maiestie vpon their free submission, returned them to their Governours, with command to see the Edicts of Pacification obserued, and to maintaine peace among his subiects.

Petition of them of the Religion at Tours.

During his Maiesties stay at Nyort, the Deputies of the Religion at Turos, presented a petition vnto his Maiestie, wherein after a solemne protestation of their seruice and obedience, they gaue him to vnderstand, that by reason of the late sedition in Tours, they had bene deprived of all meanes to bury their dead: their Churchyard being made a highway, their Temple burnt, and some private men spoiled of their goods, so as they could not remaine safely in their houses. They humbly besought his Maiestie, that their Church-yard might be restored, their Temple built againe, and in the meane time they might haue some place appointed them by prouision where they might assemble. That their

A their goods might be restored, and that hereafter they might liue in Peace amongst their fellow Citizens: And that his Maiestie would commaund the Magistrate to protect them, and that the like injunction should bee made vnto the Chiefe inhabitants of the Suburbs. Whereupon his Maiestie resolu'd in Council, that a Commisnaire should bee sent to Tours, who with the aduice of the Gouvernors, the Officers of Iustice, and the Mayor and Sheriffs thereof, should giue them a place in the Suburbs or nere vnto the Towne for the exercise of their Religion, according to his Maiesties Edicts, and that with the consent of the Inhabitants of both Religions, whom he tooke into his protection, Commanding the Governour and Mayor to haue a care of their preferuation. And to giue them means to buy a place whereon to build a Temple for the exercise of their Religion, hee granted eighteen hundred pound sterling to be taken in two years, out of the money which was appointed for the fortification and reparation of the said Towne. As touching the losses which had bene sustained by particular men, who had bene spoiled during that sedition, his Maiesties pleasure was, the Commisnaire should informe himselfe of the truth to make report vnto him, after which hee would take such course as should befit.

A Decree concerning their Petition.

At the same time, the King made a Declaration, by the which, all that were remaining or retired into Saint Iohn D'Angely and Rochel, and all others which fauoured them directly or indirectly, or should haue any access, intelligence, or association with them: or that should in any sort acknowledge the said Assembly of Rochel, or the other Assemblies, Circles, Prouinciall Councils, or other Congregations, which had correspondence with that of Rochel, and which assembled themselves without his expresse Commission, were declared disobedient and guiltie of high Treason, and to haue lost all Graunts, Priuiledges, Freedomes, and immunities: Commanding all his subiects making profession of the reformed Religion, and all Townes and Communalities of the said qualitie, to make declaration in the Presidiall Courts and Bayliwicks of their Iurisdiccions, of their good intentions to his Maiesties seruice: And that they should renounce, disauow, and protest, in no sort to adhere to the assembly of Rochel, nor to any other that should be held without his expresse leaue; and that they would oppose themselves against all the resolutions which should be taken there: forbidding all Gentlemen and others, to suffer their Children or any other depending on them, to goe into the said Townes or to giue them any comfort or assistance, or to lodge them in their houses, vpon paine to be held guilty of the said crime.

The King being at Nyort, with a resolution to besiege Saint Iohn D'Angely, from whence the Duke of Rohan was retired, assuring his brother that hee would see him with succours: The Duke of Luynes Constable, considering that Monf. de Soubise would ruine himselfe in defending of this siege, he desired in fauour of the alliance which hee had with the house of Rohan, to draw this Nobleman out of danger, sending vnto him the Seign Bispend to exhort him to obedience, and to yeeld the place: but being fortified with the counsell of Haut-Fouissine, and the succours the Duke his brother had promised him, hee refused to attend the Cannon and to keepe the Towne.

The Kings declaration a-

of Rochel and Saint Iohn.

Vpon this willfull resolution of Monf. de Soubise, his Maiestie finding that the Seigneurs of Loudiere by a proofe of his fidelity had procured the yeelding of Fountaine le Coyne, contrary to the liking of the Lady of La Boulay, and that hee might helpe much in the siege of Saint Iohn, and reduce Monf. de Soubise to his dutie: Hee suffered him to pus himselfe into the Towne, vpon colour to hold his rank vnder Soubise command: during the which he might inspire him with obedience, and make the meanes easiest to recuie the Kings mercy. In the meane time the Towne is iusted as you haue heard. On the 19 the Dukes of Desiguieres and Brillac arriued, hauing the conduct of the whole Armie. The Duke of Rohan was gone into Guienne, where he raised some men, and sojourned at certain troopes which the Marquise of Malause brought vnto him, with the which he assured Nerac, and degraded the Catholike Councillors of the Chamber, and commanded the Towne with a garison of 600 men.

At Saint Iohn D'Angely they spent seauen dayes attending the souldiers which came from all parts to this siege. The approaches being made, they framed their Camps, pitched their Tents, lodged their Munition, assigned out the Quarters, marked the Trenches, viewed the place and all the approaches whereby they might hope for any succours. The King arriued on the last of May, and tooke view of the Towne: and on the second of Iune,

Summons the Governor by a Herald.

His Maieftie ſent an Herald to Monſi. de Soubiſe, commanding him to deliuer the A Towne vnto him, vpon paine to be declared guiltie of Treason. The Herald deliuered his charge in theſe words. To thee Benjamin of Roban; I command thee in the name of the King thy Sovereigne and mine, that thou open the Gates of the Towne of Saint Iohn D'Angely, to the King to enter therein with all His Armie. In default of ſo doing, I declare thee from the King thy Sovereigne Lord and mine, guiltie of high Treason; thy Houſes and Caſtles to be razed, thy goods conſiſcate to the King, and thou and all thy poſteritie baſe and ignoble. To whom the Seig. of Soubiſe answered. That he was the Kings meſt humble ſervant, that he was but a Soldier, and could make no anſwere, before hee had communicated this commandment vnto the aſſembly of Rochell, and to his brother the Duke of Roban. And becauſe hee ſpake with his Baron, the Herald replied; Know that thou oughteſt not neither as Capitaine or Soldier to anſwer with thy head covered, but that when I ſpeake in the Kings behalfe my Sovereigne Lord and thine, thou oughteſt to haue thy hat in thy hand. Hereupon the Seig. of Haut Fountaine ſaid vnto the Herald, The King may excuſe Monſi. de Soubiſe if he pleaſe, for he was neuer ſummoned. Thus the Herald returning without any reſolution, hee met the Seigne- neur of La Salle Capitaine of the Guard, vnto whom he ſaid, that hee found no obedience, and that it was fit the Cannon ſhould ſpeake.

At the ſame time his Maieſty hearing that at Rochell they peruerſed all order of iuſtice, and that his Officers could not with libertie exerciſe their places to doe right vnto each partie: He reſolved to tranſfere the Preſidiall Court from Rochell vnto the Towne of Marans and ſent forth his letters patents to that end.

The Towne is affaulted.

The Herald hauing made report vnto his Maieſtie, of the anſwer which Monſieur de Soubiſe made vnto his charge, hee gaue preſently order that the place ſhould bee furioſly affaulted: ordered all his troopes towards Aunx, and other places from whence any ſuc- ceſſes might come, and brought his Trenches vnto their Ditches. There were many braue exploits of Armes, Affaults, Batteries, and Mines performed during this ſiege, at one of the which Haut Fountaine the ſoule of their affaires within the Towne was ſlaine, whoſe death did ſomewhat daunt their ſpirits. About the 23 of Iune, the Seigne- ur of Soubiſe, beginning to doubt his being long able to preſerue the place, hee cauſed a trum- pet to craue to ſpeake with Monſieur Zamet, his meſſage was to demand a ſafe conduct for D a Gentleman named Montmartin, ſent by the ſaid Seigne- ur of Soubiſe to the Conſtable: he was conducted by the ſaid Seigne- ur Zamet Marſhall of the Campe vnto the Kings quarter. He beſought his Maieſtie to giue him time to ſend to the Duke his Brother, and if he had not an anſwer within ſoure dayes, hee would yeeld the place: whereunto his Maieſtie would not yeeld, but willed him to tell Monſieur de Soubiſe, that all he could hope for was to yeeld the place and to preſerue his life, and that if he would accept of this grace, he ſhould reſolue by the next day, for afterwards there was no more mercie. Loudriere (who had put himſelfe into the Towne as you haue heard) ſeeing him penſiue in this extremitie, aduiled him to reſolue to yeeld the place, offering to engage his Honor and life, that he would obtaine his pardon in caſe of ſpeeidie obedience. Monſi. de Soubiſe who could not E truſt vnto it, conſidering the great loſſe of ſo many braue Men ſlaine at this ſiege, deſired to be aſſured: Loudriere offers to remaine in hoſtage, and to go and get the pardon ſigned if he would proteſt to yeeld the place.

Loudriere perſuaſion vnto Monſi. de Soubiſe.

In the meane time the batteries are redoubled with ſuch furie by the Duke of Eſpernon, as ſeeing the Kings men lodged on either ſide in their Rampiers, their walls beaten downe and the Mines ready to play, they reſolued by the perſuaſion of Loudriere, and the preſent feare which preſt them, to accept of the Kings grace, beyond the expectation of all men, who did not beleue that 2000 men which yet remained, ſhould yeeld vpon thoſe termes of aduantage for the King. Whereupon Loudriere, Bigaudiere and Montmartin came vnto the Campe with authoritie from Monſi. de Soubiſe and the other Commanders, who F accepted and ſigned the Kings Pardon and tooke an oath contained in theſe words. Wee vnderwritten, by vertue of the power giuen vs by Monſi. de Soubiſe, commanding in the Towne of Saint Iohn, accept the grace contained in this preſent writing which is pleaſed the King to doe vs, promiſing to ſee it effected. Signed the 25 of Iune.

Articles of the Kings pardon
in the ſiege.

His Maieſtie ſeeing his Enemies implore his fauour, Hee granted them theſe Articles following. Firſt, That the King pretends not to make any Treatie but at the moſt humble ſupplication often reiterated, of thoſe which are in Saint Iohn D'Angely, His Maieſtie doth

A doth pardon them all indifferently, whatſoeuer hath beene done or committed during this ſiege: vpon condition, that they ſhall craue pardon and ſwear to remaine eternallie vnder his obediencie, and that they ſhall neuer carrie Armes againſt His ſeruiue vnder any colour or pretext whatſoeuer. Secondly, That His Maieſtie did graunt them free libertie of their Conſciences according to His Edicts. Vpon theſe Conditions His Maieſtie out of his Bounty, did graunt them the libertie of their perſons, and the enioying of their goods, as they had formerly done; and ſuch as would retire themſelves, ſhould haue ſafe conduct giuen them, for their Perſons, Armes and Horſes. And as for any other de- mands made by them, they ſhould be left to His Maieſties pleaſure. The next day the Grand-Prouoſt of France, entered early into S. Iohn D'Angely, who preuented a great diſor- der, for that the Souldiers which were to depart, had abandoned the Gates and Breaches, and prepared themſelves to be gone, the which they ſhould not haue done, before the companies of the Kings Guard had entered and ſeized vpon the Portes and Breaches. But he gaue commandement vnto his Lieutenants, Exempts and Archers to guard thoſe places, himſelf walking vp and downe the Towne, and cauſing all the Soldiers and volun- taries of the Armie to depart, for that they began to grow inſolent; And in the meane time the Duke of Deſdiguieres and Duke of Eſpernon entered, to take order for their de- parture. Attending the coming of theſe Noblemen, the Grand Prouoſt entertained Monſieur de Soubiſe, and the chiefe Gentlemen which were with him touching their taking C of Armes; To whom they anſwered, that the contrauention of the Edicts, and the feare to be oppreſſed in their conſciences, had drawne them to thoſe extreames: But the Grand Prouoſt let them vnderſtand, that the eſtabliſhment of Circles, and Prouinciall Councils were manifeſt contrauentions of the Edicts. He preſented vnto them the inſolencie of the Aſſembly of Rochell in the diuiſion they had made of the Prouinces; in their Com- miſſion, and their new ſeale to leaue Souldiers; to ſeize vpon the Kings money; and to fortifie their places.

Discourſe be-

de Soubiſe and the Grand Prouoſt.

On the ſixte and twentieth of Iune, the Garifon, the Gouvernor, and all the Voluntaries went out of Saint Iohn: They paſſed through the Kings Armie without Drumm or ſhew of Armes paſſing before the King. Monſieur de Soubiſe came laſt with his Houſe and D voluntaries, which had aſſiſted him during the Siege, and they were conducted into a place of ſafety. They were held to be about 1500 foot, and about 200 Gentlemen. Monſieur de Soubiſe preſented himſelf vpon his knees vnto the King and demanded pardon, aſſuring his Maieſtie that he would eſſect, whatſoeuer he had promiſed by the Seigneurs of Lodriere and Montmartin. His Maieſtie being on horſeback layd his hand vpon his ſhoulder, and ſaid vnto him: I ſhall be glad that hereafter you giue me more occaſion to be ſatiſfied with you, riſe, and ſerue me better. This ſiege continued little about a Moneth, but it was very furio- uſe. There were many Noblemen and Gentlemen of quality ſlaine and hurt on the Kings partie, but not about 200 Souldiers loſt of the whole Armie. During this ſhort ſiege, there was about 10000 Cannon ſhot ſpent againſt the Towne, the which did ſo E annoy it, as there was ſcarce any houſe free from ſpoyle, ſo as the inhabitants were ſaine to lye in cellars and neere the ground, fearing to bee cruſt vnder the ruines of houſes, and with the bullets which fell in the ſtreets, and on their houſes like haile. They were re- duced to ſuch extremitie, as the Souldiers had but two ounces of bread a day, and they were ſo tyred from the beginning of the Siege, as they had no meanes to take one houres reſt. The Kings Troops being in poſſeſſion of the Towne, there was a brute in the Campe, that the Souldiers had ruined the Temple and ſpoyled the Miniſters houſe with ſome o- thers, whereof many of the reformed Religion, which ſerued the King faithfully, hauing made report to the Grand Prouoſt, he returned ſpeedily to Saint Iohn and aſſembled the Council of the Towne, the Miniſter, and the Conſtitutie; letting them vnderſtand, that F without doubt this inſolencie would be caried throughout the Prouinces, with a great ſhew by ſome ill affected Frenchmen, and made an hundred times greater, and more pre- iudiciall then it was; perſwading weakie ſpirits, that the faith was violated, and that it was impoſſible to ground any aſſurance vpon the Kings promiſes; wherefore to make the truth more apparent, he deſired them to declare in publique, what loſſes they had receiued in particular. To which ſummons they all agreed freely, giuing him letters of Atteſtation, by which they declared that the ſouldiers of his Maieſties army, which had entered into the towne to demand bread and wine of houſe-keepers, had not taken any thing but victu-

The Minister and Consistorie likewise declared, that their pulpit, seats, and glasse-windowes of the Temple had bene broken to the value of ten pounds sterling; and that the Minister had lost certaine goods to the value of fifteene pounds, taken by unknowne lacques. But he that writes the generall History of the Rebellion of France, saith that notwithstanding any order they could take, the souldiers for an houres space fell to spoile, contrary to his Maiesties expresse Defence. The King gave commandement by his Letters patents, that the wals and fortifications should be razed, and the ditches filled vp; and withall he deprived the towne of all their priuiledges, and made the Inhabitants subiect to taxe, like vnto the Labourer of the champion country.

S. Iohn D'Angely razed.

Whilest the King prepared for the siege of S. Iohn, the Prince of Conde and the Earle of S. Paul imploied themselves for the reduction of Sancerre, Gergeau, and Chasteau-Renard, places of surety. Being at Saumur, he had written to the Earle of S. Paul to assure himselfe of Gergeau, which is a small towne foure leagues about Orleans, hauing a goodly bridge vpon the riuer of Loire. Henry the fourth had made it a Towne of surety, and had affected the gouernment to the Duke of Sully, after the death of du Faur. It had bene greatly fortified during the League, and since in the late alterations. The Earle of S. Paul hauing had conference with the Seigneur of Monde Bailiffe of Gergeau (who was an enemy to the fortifications thereof, and had caused the fort in the suburbs of S. Denis to be razed) they found that the onely difficultie was, That Bourbiers who commanded, and the two Captaines that were in garison therein, had not long since, nor onely made their Companies compleat, but much augmented them, and kept a very wary guard: That almost halfe of the Inhabitants were of the Religion: That the Catholiques had ben disarmed: besides, that they were all in a iaculosity, for that some officers of the Artillery had but three daies before, drawn powder and some warlike instruments out of their magazin, to send vnto the King army. Vpon these difficulties the Earle of S. Paul (loth to hazard any thing) came from Orleans to the suburbs of S. Denis at Gergeau, sending for Bourbiers and the other Captaines, to whom hee deliuered the Kings Letters, commanding them to doe whatsoever the Earle of S. Paul should ordaine in his name. The Earle telling them that his Maiesties intention was, to be assured of the towne of Gergeau. They excused themselves, and said, that the King by his Letters did not command them to come forth: On the contrary, that his Maiestie passing by Orleans, had charged them to guard well the Towne and Passage for his seruice. Moreouer, that the Duke of Sully Gouvernor of the Towne had placed them there; and that it was fit they should aduertise him, who was then in Languedoc. The Earle seeing he could preuaile nothing with Bourbiers, resolved to besiege Gergeau, drawing together what forces he could. The Marshall of Vitry, and the Baron of Perfan his brother in law, with the Marquis of Rothelin, passing by Orleans, and hearing of this siege, came to assist the Earle in this occasion. The Marquis entered into the Towne to perswade Bourbiers and the Garison to obedience, but hee preuailed nothing: whereupon the Earle resolved to batter it, sending for Cannon and munition to Orleans. The besieged seeing themselves inuelted, sent to craue aid of the reformed Churches neere about them, who with all speed made choice of Vateville Manchiesien to command the succors they would put into Gergeau the day that Bourbiers had limited. But the besieged being doubtful thereof, and withall, fearing they should not be able to enter, they sent to present Articles vnto the Earle for the yielding of the Towne, which were granted vpon condition they should depart the next day being May 23. The Articles were, For the free exercise of the Religion, and the payment of what was due vnto the Garison. The same night Vateville came downe the Riuer with 200 men, and the guards being retired, in the morning they put themselves into the Towne, and became masters thereof, by the help of the inhabitants of the Religion.

The siege of Gergeau.

Gergeau yielded to the Earle of S. Paul.

The Earle of S. Paul hauing summoned Bourbiers to effect the Composition which he & the rest had signed, hee was much troubled; for on the one side Vateville shewed his Letters, and told him hee was come at the houre appointed; and on the other, hee had signed the treatie, and giuen his word to depart. Notwithstanding, hauing called a Councell, and considered that they had not things necessarie to maintaine a Siege; nor men sufficient to defend their fortifications, being withall ingaged in a Composition, they resolved to obferue it, and to deliuer the place vnto the Earle, the which was performed accordingly.

The

A The Earle of Saint Paul having put a new Garison into Gergeau, returned the next day to Orleans, where hee received an aduertisement, that many Gentlemen and others of Vandolmois and Dunois of the Reformed Religion, were assembled together neere vnto the Forest of Marchenoir, either with an intent to succour Gergeau, or for some other enterprize. Whereupon he drew his Forces together, and caused them to marche instantly towards the Forest where they were retired, who seeing themselves pursued and charged, some fled through the woods, and the rest fell into the Earles power; among the which there were many Gentlemen, whom hee caused to be set at liberty, and their horses restored, vpon promise they should not cary armes against the Kings seruice.

A defeat of them at the battle of Vandolmois.

B Chasteau-Renard, which is two leagues from Gergeau vpon the Riuer of Loir, appertained vnto the deceased Princeesse of Orange, daughter of Ispar de Colligny Admiral of France, and Earle of Chastillon vpon Loir: It had bene numbered amongst the Townes of surety, with a Garison of fiftene men in the Fort called the Chastellet, which is a Rocke fortified with faulconets, powder, bullets, and other necessaries of defence. Congis and Vandelin were as dead paies therein, who vpon rumor of the war, had brought certaine of the Religion into the place, furnished it with victuals, and kept it more strictly shut vp then before time. Whereof the inhabitants of Chasteau-Renard entering into distrust, and hauing enformed the King thereof, they were commanded to seize and to assure themselves thereof. Hereupon, the execution being refused, all the inhabitants goe to armes, and being conducted by the Seigneur de L'Isle, Lieutenant of the Baillywicke of Chasteau-Renard, on the fourteenth of May, about foure of the clocke in the afternoon, they goe vp to the Fort, and summon Congis and Vandelin to put the place into their hands, according to the Kings Letters: which they refusing to doe, they presently scale and enter the place, force such as make resistance, and thrust out Congis, Vandelin, and the residue: and in their roomes place some of the inhabitants to guard the Fortresse. This done, they aduertised Monsieur de Saint Paul thereof, who sent word to the King of what had passed, assuring his Maiesty that he would take such order in his gouernment, as there should be no alteration on this side Loire.

The inhabitants of Chasteau-Renard seize vpon the Fort.

The King, during his abode at Saumur, had written to the Prince of Conde, to goe to Sancerre and assure himselfe thereof, and to them of Sancerre to receive him. Now therefore the Prince about the end of April, coming into his Gouernment of Berry, knowing the importance of this place, and that vndoubtedly it would bee the cause of trouble and disorder, if by industry and without open force (according to his Maiesties directions) he did not seize thereon: he practised his intelligences both within and without the Towne, with such as were affectioned vnto the Kings seruice: During which, he was aduertised that the Townsmen had a designe to worke in some of their Fortifications, and that the younger Briguenaut had perswaded the youth and some inhabitants to receive a Garison. Wherefore he sent word vnto the Sheriffs and inhabitants of Sancerre, that they should depute some among them to come vnto him; that hee had something to say vnto them which concerned the Kings seruice, and their owne preservation.

A discourse of that which passed about the taking of Sancerre.

Three of them being come to Bourges, after hee had very gently entertained them, and conferred with them about the practice of the younger Briguenaut, hee sayd vnto them, That their duty bound them to continue in the Kings obedience: That necessity constrained them thereunto, being in the middest of France, without succours or hope of any to uphold them, but their modesty and obedience: That remaining in the state they were, fortifying nothing, nor receiving any garison, hee promised to preserve them, and to change nothing in their Towne, goods, and liberty of conscience. They thanked him for the care hee had of them; assuring him that they had no designe to fortifie, promised not to doe it, nor to take in any Garison.

F Notwithstanding, the Prince being assured by them with whom hee had intelligence, that the inhabitants of Sancerre would not suffer him to enter the stronger into the town, hee resolved to arme with all diligence, and not to send them the Kings Letters until hee had forces ready to surprize and make them to obey, in case they refused him entry. Hee signified therefore vnto some Gentlemen as well of Berry as of Bourbonnois, his Maiesties commandement, and prayed them to raise all the troops, and with all the speed they could, and appointed his Rendezvous at Saint Satur, on the 20 of May. Hee gaue order also for 12 peeces of Artillery to be brought the same day before Sancerre.

A Capitulation made with the Inhabitants of Sancerre.

The Fortifications of the Towne and Castle of Sancerre reduced.

During these levauies, the Prince assured himselfe of such places and persons as hee A thought might waite or hinder his designs, and caused all the inhabitants of the Religion in the townes of Issoudun, Argenton, Chateauroux, La Castre, Aubigny, Chastillon, and other places where there were any numbers of them, to bee disarmed. Whilest the Prince was occupied herein, and ready to march with his troops towards Sancerre, hee received newes that the towne had received a Garison on this manner: Geigeau being put into the Kings obedience, Vatueille (before mentioned) had left the Towne with about 400 men well armed, with the which he entred by night into Sancerre, by the favour or connivance of the chiefe inhabitants: The younger Briquemaunt was in Bourgundy to leavie troops. Vatueille being entred, fought to make himselfe Master of the Towne by the means of them of the Reformed Religion, onely the Earle of Marans crossed his designe, being then in the Towne, whom hee vsed so audaciously and with such insolent threats as hee refused to retire.

The Prince of Conde had long before wonne vnto him one Captaine Bronchard, an old Souldier, and of great credit in Sancerre, who by his commandement seized vpon the Castle, with some of the Earles seruants, and some inhabitants, the which hee defended valiantly against the Towne: whereof the Prince being aduertised, hee advanced his troops with all speed to relieue them. Approaching neere the towne, the Earle of Marans Lord thereof, met him, and the two Gentlemen whom hee had sent with the Kings Letters and his owne, bringing answer that they of the Towne were humble seruants to the King and Prince, ready vnto all obedience, but they were not at liberty, nor Masters of their Town, to dispose as they desired, nor strong enough to obey, for that Vatueille was Master: wherefore they intreated the Prince to haue pitty on them, and to free them from this servitude, promising to contribute what they could to serue him. The Prince hauing not forces sufficient to inuest the Towne, hee sought to winne them by policy, trying them by goodly reasons and perswasions, and sowing ialousies betweene the inhabitants and the Garison, so as distrusting one another, they might yeeld to his will; and in the meane time hee might put succours into the Castle. His practices preuailed so well, as Vatueille grew fearefull of some bad designe, and banded a part with his Garison: They of the towne were likewise in feare, lest that Vatueille should commit some folly; whereupon they beganne to ioine themselves together, and to arme, so as they were all in mutinie, distrust, and feare one of another. In the meane time, the Prince put an hundred men into the Castle, wherewith they grew much amazed. Vatueille goes to the Prince, who feeds him with such good words, and a gratuite of six hundred pound sterling, as hee resolute to depart with his souldiers, armes and baggage. The Townsmen in like manner (feareing lest Vatueille should abandon them and deliuer the Towne into the Princes hands) came also vnto him, and after great contestation received this Capitulation: Not to be molested in the exercise of their Religion: That they should be free in their liues, goods, and honors: That whereas they desired not to be disarmed, nor to receive any Garison, it should bee according to his Maiesties pleasure: That all which had borne armes, might retire and be conducted to a place of safety. After this, Vatueille with his Garison, came forth, and the Prince entred, and put in a sufficient guard for the place.

It is written, that Vatueille going forth, casting his eyes backe, wept for anger, saying, What a fortune lose I by the wickednesse of Traytors which haue sold me? Whereunto hee added: That the Prince had taken Sancerre with a drame, and that hee wondered how it should come into the imagination of man to thinke to take the strongest place of France, for situation, with words.

The same night the towne was yielded, they tooke a spy, whom they brought vnto the Prince, who confessed that hee had bene sent by the Duchesse of Sully, to assure them of the Towne, that within three daies they should haue succours: wherefore hee disarmed the inhabitants of Sancerre, leauing them nothing but their swords; their armes were carried into the Castle, to be restored when the towne should bee demanded. The same day the Prince mustred his troops of Berry and Bourbonnois to the number of 7000 foot, and 800 horse, all which arriued the night before: But to the end the Prouince should not be ruined, hee presently sent them away, except 500 men which hee put in Garison into the Towne and Castle, whilest they laboured about the razing of the Fortifications. This Towne was of great strength, and had in former times bene long defended by them of the

A the Religion against a Royall Army. In this moneth of May, all they of the Reformed Religion were disarmed in the Townes vpon the Riuier of Loire, Picardy, and Champagne. Vpon this apprehension, many fought to shrowd themselves from the Roime of persecution which they feared, and retired themselves into England, Sedan, and other places.

In Normandy, the Duke of Longueville, disarmed them of Diepe, Rouen, and Newhauen. They proceeded more mildly at Caen, where many of the Religion during the League, had obtained the places of Captaines, and other charges. The Marquis of Mofny, acquainted the Magistrates with his Maiesties command, desiring their ayd and counsell in this disarming, to the end it might not alter the Kings seruice, nor the peace of the Towne. They refused to send for the Minister, one of the Captaines, and some of the chiefe of the Religion, whom the Marquis acquainted with his Maiesties pleasure, and his purpose to execute his commandements: That he had no will to surprize them, assuring himselfe of their voluntary obedience in that which concerned the Kings pleasure, they hauing bene already disarmed at Diepe, Rouen, and Newhauen. They required time to confer with the body of their Church, fearing they should find some difficulty to perswade the people to obey this commandement; for that in the greatest troubles for the same cause they had not bene distrustful: yet they would doe their best endeauours to dissuade them to obedience. They had two houres giuen them to conferre: and at their returne were content to deliuer their armes to their Captaines: the which was performed the next day, and on the six and twentieth they were carried into the Castle, and laid vpin one of the Magazines, whereof an Inuentory was taken and signed by the Marquis, and then left with the Register of the Towne. The Duke of Vendosme in like manner assured vnto the Kings obedience, Vitry, Chastillon in Vandelaix, and other townes and Castles in Britany.

The Assembly at Rochel had solicited the Earle of Montgomery, Gouverneur of Pont-Orson, and of the Religion, to be of their faction, with an intent if hee would not yeeld therunto, to surprize this place: It is a frontier Towne of great importance, lying vpon the Sea betwene Normandy and Britany. The King being aduertised that the Earle D would by no means yeeld to the Assembly: He sent him word, that his desire was, he should receive a recompence for his Government, to the end hee might preferre that place so much importing those two great Prouinces. The Earle hauing taken aduice of his friends, and received content, deliuered the towne vnto a Catholique Gentleman to whom his Maiesty had giuen the Government.

On the twentieth of May, seuen Ministers, fifteen of the Assembly, and twelue of them which they call free Burgeses, assembled together in Councell in the towne of Rochel, to cōsule whether they should expell the Priests of Saint Margaret of the Congregation of the Oratory, and in what manner they should doe it: some which were barbarous and inhumane, would haue them massacred or burnt in their Church; and some would haue them E cast out the wals: but in the end the Magistrate letting them vnderstand that the like might be done vnto their brethren which were in Catholique townes, this miserable designe was not executed: onely it was resolved they should leaue the towne, and the Maior had charge to acquaint them therewith; vpon whose command two of them came vnto him, to whom hee made this short discourse: My Masters, hitherto I haue done what I could for your preservation; but now I acquaint you with my weaknesse: consider what I may doe for you: I haue retired my selfe from a Company, to come and giue you this aduice. Of necessity you must depart the towne speedily, there being no means to containe the people, being intensed against you: Consider speedily how I may further your departure.

The Fathers of Saint Margaret seeing the Maiors honesty, gaue him thanks, and entreated him to assist them with his counsell: who aduised them to make shew of going to walke two and two together, and so depart. To who they answered, That they could not doe it without danger of their liues, for that they should vndoubtedly fall into the hands of many souldiers which were without the Ports. Whereupon they retired. About noone, the Maior seeing the towne in quiet, euery man being gone to dinner, hee sent fiftely for these Fathers, telling them that hee had prepared apart, and would send them away: whereof they were very glad, resolving vpon their departure, the Maior came vnto them with thirty or forty men armed; who causing them to shut the doores of their Church

Church and house, tooke the keyes and conducted them to the new Port, where a Barke attended them to carry them to Brouage. The Mayor did still accompany them, and going out of the Port, shut it after him, to prevent the fury of the multitude, and to see them safely embarked.

Death of the Cardinal of Guise.

During the siege of Saint Iohn D'Angely, the Cardinall of Guise dyed at Xaintes of a Fever, having over-hear his blood with much toile at the siege. Hee was once a Cardinall Deacon, and had neuer fung Masse: He was a Prince altogether martiall, and more enclined to armes then to his booke, whereof he made good prooffe, going vnarmed in the company of his brother the Prince of Iouille, and forced the barricados of the suburbs of Saint Iohn, without any apprehension of all their shot: His death was generally lamented in Court: His Maiestie gaue good testimonies of his griefe, and the Prince his brother was wonderfully afficted for his losse.

Pons yielded
to the King.

After the reduction of Saint Iohn, the King refreshed his army some few dayes, and in the meane time sent the Marshall de Chaune to inuest Pons, into the which the Marquis of Chasteau-neuf de Lymolin, nephew to Monsieur de la Force, had put himselfe, with diuers Gentlemen, and fiftene hundred Harquebusers, purposing by their resistance to giue leifure vnto the Rochellers and the Townes of Guienne and Languedoc to continue their fortifications, and mitigate their feares.

This Towne of Pons is of very great importance vnto the Prouince of Xaintonge, and within foure leagues of Xaintes: It hath a very faire and strong Castle, with strong wals and deepe ditches. The Towne standeth on the steepe decline of a hill, at the foot whereof runneth the Riuer of Seine. In briefe, it is a very good and strong Towne, and might well haue long disputed their approaches, and kept the Royalists from their Counterskarres, but the Commanders seeing the Kings army so neere, and most of them being reputed the authors which had caused the Assembly at Rochel to sweare their continuance, fearing the Kings iust indignation, they bethought themselves, giuing notice to the Constable by the Marshalls D'Esquiers, that they would accept of an honourable composition: whose answer was, That they should yeeld the place at the Kings discretion without conditions, and that he would be a meane for their liues and liberty; the which they accepted: whereupon some of the chiefe brought the keyes presently to the King, the same day he came to Coignac, which was the last of Iune. The Marshall D'Esquiers and Chau-ne entred the towne to prevent disorders, and to draw forth the Garison, into the which the Regiment of Esillac entred, vntill the fortifications and wals were demolished; for if this towne had fallen againe into rebellion, it had kept the passage from Poitou to Bourdeaux; and had much supported them of Rochel by their intelligences with the Townes of their party resould in base Guienne.

The Fortifications and wals
of Pons demolished.

The Assembly at Rochel imagining that the King should not bee able to force Saint Iohn D'Angely in so short a time, the which they could by no meane succour, resould to send those souldiers they had within Rochel to make a descent into base Poitou, towards Lusson, Olone, Tallemont and Saint Benoist, hoping by this meane to draw together all them of the Religion in Poitou and other Prouinces, and withall to bring into Rochel all the victuals and other commodities they should find in that Country, foreseeing, that they would not suffer them to gather their harvest nor vintage. Fouca, La Noue, and Bessay, landed with twelue hundred men, and spoiled some places. The King being aduertised hereof, he presently sent the Marshall of Prallin, the Duke of Elbeuf, and the Earle of Rochefoucault, with their troops. They of the Religion had already embarked at the Port of Larrerie two thousand bushels of meale, and the best mowables they could find in Lusson and thereabouts, but the Marshall seized on these Barkes, and caried the meale to Lusson. The Rochellers coming to Saint Benoist began to build a Fort at the mouth of the Riuer of Lay, and in the meane time the three Commanders make an enterprize vpon Sables D'Olone. The Marshall giues a furious assault vnto their new Fort, takes it, and kills a hundred and fifty of their men, and puts the rest to flight, whereof some were taken, and others drowned in the Owze. The three Commanders hearing hereof, saved themselves in their Barkes, and so retired: The Granges brethren to Bessay understanding this defeat, abandoned Tallemont: so as all this Country which seemed lost, was in an instant freed from the Rochellers.

The Castle of Sully resould.

The King being at Coignac, was aduertised of the resoul of the Castle of Sully vpon the 1621

A the Riuer of Loire, betweene Gian and Orleans. The Earle of Saint Paul hearing that the Duchesse of Sully had admitted many of the Reformed Religion into her Castle, with the consent of Buzion who was Capitaine, and that the number encreased daily, hee sent a Gentleman vnto the Duchesse, to know the reason of this alteration: She excused her selfe, saying, that they were poore men, exiled from their houses, and that being of her Religion, she had in charity giuen them entry into the park of her house. The younger brother of Briquemaunt one of the Deputies of the Assembly in Rochel, with the Baron of Trinne, and many Gentlemen and Souldiers, had retired thither, so as in lesse then eight dayes they were foure hundred foot and horse, which did much annoy the adiacent Prouinces. They seized vpon the Church of Saint Pere on the other side of the Loire, right against the Castle, the which they fortified with good trenches, in the which the Baron of Trinne commanded with three score men: they interrupted the comerce of the Riuer: and made the neighbour Parishes to pay taxes, and to labour in their fortifications. The inhabitants of Sully seeing this alteration, resolute to maintain themselves in the Kings service against the Castle: and to keepe them in this duty, the Earle of Saint Paul sent the Baron of Courtenay to command ouer them: and seeing the harme this place did, not onely in his Government, but in the other neighbour Prouinces, and what might happen in time, he resould to prevent it: but for that he wanted sufficient forces, hee wrote to the Duke of Montbazon Governor of the Ile of France, to the Marshall of Vitry, and especially to the Prince of Conde, Governor of Berry, who had the greatest interest, for that he was nearest: but there was some difficulty; for sayd some, If the Prince comes in person to the siege of Sully, the Earle of Saint Paul could not be General of the Army, although it were in his Government: whereunto the Earle answered, I desire to prefer the Kings service and the quiet of the Prouince, before the honour which I should get. He sent to the Prince, and they met at Aubigny, whither the Marquis of Rohony, sonne to the Duke of Sully, came (being sent by the King in Poste, to reduce Buzion to his duty, which he could not effect) where they resould of this siege, preparing their troops and Cannons to batter it.

First of all, they forced their new fortifications at Saint Pere, where they were most of them slaine and drowned. After this they went into Sully, and planted two Battaries, forcing them to abandon the Parke, and retire into the Castle, which was but little, and greatly annoyed by the Cannon. The Duchesse of Sully was retired into the Towne, being much-grieved to see this house ruined by her owne fault, and that to be assured of her person, they spake of sending her to Bourges. The besieged were incommoded both with the want of meane to cure their wounded (being many, who died for want of reliefe) and with the stench of the garbage of Cattell they fed on: so as on the 19 of Iuly they sent to the Prince to demand a Composition, the which was granted. The conditions were. To returne in safety to their houses, and to enioy their goods. A pardon for all that had beene done at Sully and thereabouts. A promise to obtaine a pardon from the King for Buzion. That they should haue free liberty of conscience according to the Edicts: That they should depart with their armes and baggage, booties and horses. That they should be conducted to a place of safety, and within three dayes to separate themselves, and returne vnto their houses. That they might leaue two within the Castle to retire their baggage. That all prisoners should be deliuered: vpon condition that they should yeeld the Castle of Sully into their hands, and take the oath which Monsieur Soubise had done to serue the King in all places, and against all men. These Articles were signed by the Prince of Conde and the Earle of Saint Paul.

The Castle of Sully yeelded
by composition

A little before, the Duke of Tremouille came to the Kings quarter at Saint Iohn, to protest his fidelity and the obedience he ought vnto his Maiestie, who said vnto him, That he was glad to see him nere him, so the end he might see that hee had not taken armes: but so suppress the new Common-wealth of Rochel; and such as did acknowledge their command, and that he would make it knowne that he was with a good King and a good Master, so that he should see and low him: That he would not forsake mans conscience no further then by the trust of doctrine, and the good examples of the Clergy, if God lent him any time to live. At the same time Monsieur de Mallevre, a Gentleman of the Religion, came out of base Guienne, with an expresse commission from many Townes and Communalities, and especially from Monsieur de Basse Cardignan, to receive the Kings commandements, and to reduce and disauow disauow the Deputies of this Prouince, which were at the Assembly at Rochel, which A gaue the King great content, being wrought by this meanes. Monseur de la Force being made Generall Prouinciall of the Circle of bafe Guienne by the Assembly, Monseur de Boiffe Pardaillan could not like of this diuision, nor to be commanded by him, who by the practices of his sonne Casellan, and his nephew Chasteauncus of Lymosin, Deputies in the said Assembly, had procured him this Commission after his retreat from Bearne. This Seigneur of Boiffe hauing refused a Commission to be his Lieutenant Generall, he preuailed so by his credit, as he procured a Prouinciall Councell of bafe Guienne to bee called at Saint Foy, in May, to aduise of the meanes how they might obtaine a quiet condition for the townes of the Religion in that Prouince vnder his Maiesties obedience: where it was resolted to send du Malles vnto the King to offer obedience in the behalfe of their Prouinciall Assembly, and particularly of Monseur de Boiffe Pardaillan, and of all the townes of bafe Guienne except Montauban and Bergerac. He deliuered his charge accordingly:

To whom the King made this answer: That they for whom he had brought assurance of their fidelitie, should be entreated like vnto the Catholiques: neither would he euer suffer them to be forced in their consciences, nor oppress in their publique or priuate fortunes. But notwithstanding any care or foresight in his deputation, hauing exacted an oath from them that sent him, and caused all them which represented the Communalities, to signe his instructions:
yet the corruption of the time preuailed, and by meanes of the Duke of Rohans voyage into high Languedoc, and the intelligences of Monseur de la Force, all the Townes of bafe Guienne, (except Saint Foy, and Monur, Mont de Marfan, Cassan, and Castillon) contrary to their duties and promise, reuolted; tooke armes, receiued souldiers, placed and displaced Gouvernors at their pleasure, and the Chamber of the Edict established at Nerac, and the Kings Iudges and Officers were shamefully expelled.

The King comes to Courras where Monseur de Boiffe pretends his fidelitie.

On the eight of Iuly, the King came to Courras, a goodly house belonging to the Countesse of Saint Paul, and a famous place for the battell which the deceased King did winne, and by the death of the Admirall of Toyseu: His Maiesty discoursed iudiciously of this battell: That good Capitaines should be without ostentation, and that the Admirals iea-lousie against the Marshall of Matignon (who was coming vnto him) for that he would not share the honor with him, was the cause of his ruine. During this discourse, Monseur D de Boiffe arised, with many Gentlemen of the Religion, who came to offer their lyes and Governments vnto his Maiesty, who receiued them fauourably, and entertained them in particular touching the innocency of his armes, and the bad designes of the Assembly at Rochel.

The Consuls of Castillon and Saint Foy came thither, and brought the keys of their Townes, so as there remained not any but Bergerac, which held the Kings mind and his Councell in some suspence. But before his departure, the Constable (who had laboured powerfully with such as might low diuision in the towne, and strike a terror into those fiftene hundred men) receiued certaine newes that Monseur de la Force prepared for his departure, and that the Garison disbanded, the which many held incredible, for that the place being very well fortified and furnished with men, artillery, and munition, it seemed that Monseur de la Force should have kept it, either to cast himselfe at the Kings feet in opening him the Gates, or to have buried himselfe in the ruines of a breach: but the Constables care had ruined his authority and his childrens, by lawfull and necessary meanes in this age of infidelity.

The King goes out to blocke vp Rochel.

Before the Kings departure from Coignac, he gaue order for the blocking vp of Rochel both by Sea and Land. He sent to the Ports of Normandy and Britany, to prepare a Fleet to stop the Pyrates courtes, which came from all parts to Rochel, for that all their thefts were held good prize there in paying their duties: Hee also sent to the Duke of Guise to Marfeilles, to cause the Generall of the Gallies to bring them towards Rochel. By Land he commanded the Duke of Elspem to goe with foure thousand foot, and six hundred horse to lodge about the Towne, and to keepe them from all communication and commerce with Poitou, Xaintonge, and Anix, the which troubled them of Rochel and the Deputies of the Assembly much. This Towne being now blocked vp, it shall not be impertinent to relate what I find written of the situation, government and strength of this Towne.

A description of Rochel.

Rochel, they say, is the Queene and Mistris of all others, and is the very Sanctuary of all

1621

A All Malecontents. It is the strongest within the Realme, and may be speedily relieved by land and water, from Poitou, Xaintonge, and Anix, and by sea from the neighbour lands, and from England, Holland, and other Countries. The Seigneur of Loudriere, vnder the title and quality of Seneschall of Anix, reuaxes himselfe Gouvernor, but all his authority consisteth in chusing of a Maior yearly, out of three which they present vnto him, which is not much.

The body of the towne is composed of a Maior, forty eight Peeres, and one and fifty Burgesses. This company of 100 men of the most sufficient amongst them, gouerne the people absolutely. But within these six yeares some seditious spirits which had and yet haue B good entry into their Councils, that they might become the more necessary, haue sowed such distrusts among the people, and of such consequence, as they haue now formed another party, to counterpoise the body of the town, which being compounded of the Commons, and some of the rich inhabitants are called Franck Burgesses, and are at this day so strong, that they make the Ministers preach as they please, and haue brought the body of the towne to admit into all their Assemblies and Resolutions of importance, fix of these Franck Burgesses, which are called Sindics or Tribunes, and to this effect are chosen every yeate by the people, and changed as they see occasion. This newly caused hatred and diuisions in the managing of affaires, wrong and confusion. The Towne is free from all Subsidies and Impositions, and for this cause much frequented with traffique, so as it is C thought there may be found a hundred or sixscore Merchants worth 100000 Crownes apiece the worth of them. It is very well furnished with powder, and 150 Cannon for battery, besides Culuerins and smaller Pieces, with victuals, and other necessary prouisions: The inhabitants are so well armed, as they made shew of seven or eight thousand foot to the Duke of Sully, when he tooke possession of the Government of Poitou; the fortifications of the towne are almost finished: it consisteth of twelue great Royall Bastions of free stone, with double ditches, deepe and broad at the bottome, with spacious Rampiers.

The hauen is small, but very safe, made like a horse-shoe, and within the compass of the wals, the road is in a manner round: the gates which shut vp the hauen, is drawne D vp nightly betweene two round Towers, betwix which there is no more space, then for the passage of a good ship. The Lanthorne Tower which is higher then the rest, looks into the sea, and stands vpon the point of the wall on the right hand going out of the Port.

The town is of a flat situation, and the ditches may be easily filled with water when they please: there is a great Marish of two or three thousand paces broad, which diuides the approaches into two parts, at the least a French league from the Towne, so as to besiege it they must haue two Armies by land, which cannot releue one another, and a third by Sea to hinder their succours.

But let vs returne to the Kings voyage into Guienne. The Duke of Rohan and Monseur
E de la Force hauing assured Tonnins, Clerac, and other places, to their partie, on this side the Garonne, they goe to Nerac, where they were receiued with great shewes of affection, and Monseur de la Force acknowledged for Generall of the Prouince. This towne was much fauoured by Henry the great, wherein he kept his Court long, being but King of Nauarre, in regard of the pleasantnesse thereof. It is able to endure a Royall siege. The Chamber of Iustice is held in the Castle. President Pichon, a Catholique, was lodged there, and La Porte was Gouvernor. The President seeing the arrival of these two Noblemen, and the reception they gaue vnto Monseur de la Force, he demanded assistance from the Gouvernor of the Castle, who swore that he would neuer open the gates but to the King: whereupon he sent presently to the Duke of Mayen, beseeching him to come to F Nerac, and to relieue him in this extremity, seeing that the Gouvernor had assured him neuer to yeeld the Castle.

The Duke was then sick of an ague at Bourdeaux, hauing no troops leauied in his Government, but he presently posted away with his followers, giving commandement to Barrault and Ornano Sainte croix, to come to him with their Regiments.

He aduanced without troops, hoping to make them acknowledge their fault, and returne to their obedience: but he found the young Viscount of Casters, and a son of Monseur de la Force, within the towne, who shut the gates against him, and answered him with A Muskett shot.

In the meane time, the Kings army (by the care of the Marshals of Roqueleure, and Antiberie, and of Monsieur de Vignolles,) grew to bee three or foure thousand foot; and aboute eight hundred horse: but this was not sufficient to iueit both Nerac and the Castle; they also wanted Officers, Cannon and Munition, and order for money to pay the army, which made some stay of the Dukes proceedings.

On the 23 of Iune, the Duke being aduertised that the Marquis of La Force had draw together about two thousand men, and giuen it out that he would raise the siege of Nerac, he suddenly went to horsebacke, leaving Monsieur de Vignolles with the foot and some horse before the towne: but vpon the way he vnderstood that they had surpris'd Caumont at noone day, by the treason of a Confill and a Sentinell of the reformed Religion, whereof the other inhabitants of the same religion were innocent, as seeking to defend themselves; there were twelue or fiftene slaine, and three Catholiques; so as they had like to haue surpris'd the Castle, there being not aboute tenne souldiers within it.

This was the Marquis his chiefe designe, seeking to draw the Gouvernor Escurville into the Towne by an interposed person, vpon colour of a Christning, the which he promised to doe, but did not, being forced to keepe within the Castle, by reason of the alarme which was giuen, and the flight of the Catholiques which came flying towards the same.

The Duke of Mayen being ariued, and seeing the Castle hold out, he resolved to retire, and charge the enemy, hauing drawne together about three thousand men, with the helpe of the neighbour townes, and the Regiments of Barrault and Ornano, which were come vnto him, with the which he charged the Protestants in their trenches and barricados, and they defended themselves resolutely for the space of foure houres, where the fight was very furious, but in the end they were forced to abandon them, and to retire to their other workes within the Towne, so as Colonel Barrault had good means to enter into the Castle with his Regiment. In the night the Protestants (seeing the Castle so well fortified, and the Duke of Mayen ready to charge them in the morning with the whole army) retired towards Castell-Jaloux after the losse of foure hundred men, whereof one hundred were burnt and slaine with the ruines of a Church which they had made a Magazin for their powder, which was set on fire by negligence.

Thus they lost Caumont againe, which is held the strongest place in Guienne, whereof they made themselves assured, hoping by this diuersion to raise the siege of Nerac.

The Duke of Mayen hauing reduced Caumont to the Kings obedience, he returned to Nerac, where notwithstanding that La Force Capitaine of the Castle had broken his word and deliuered it vp, that succours were entred, and that they had made many resolute sallies, yet they were forced to yeeld vnto the Duke the ninth of Iuly, and to receiue a Catholique Gouvernor with a Garison of eight hundred men, and to feed the Kings armie, being eight thousand men, for the space of foure dayes.

Thus Nerac, which had bene honored by the Kings father with the Chamber of the Edict in Guenne, is for her revolt thus punished, and it transferred to Agen. A goodly example for others, which giue care to the passionate speeches of malecontents, who alwaies couer their owne interests, passions, ambition, and couetousnesse vnder the cloake of Religion; or that of the common weale.

The Duke of Mayen seeing himselfe fortified with a faire army both of horse and foot, and supplied with money from the King to defray the charges of the warre, he turned head towards Castell-Jaloux, a towne of surety in the Duchy of Albret, whereof the Viscount of Fumac was Gouvernor: It is a place of good repute for warre, and well seated; hauing means to interrupt the commerce of them of Bourdeaux, with Armagnac, Condoms, Ax, Bayonne, and Spain: it is in a Country full of them of the Religion, and where the Catholique Religion was scarce knowne: but it is not able to maintaine a long siege. Wherefore seeing the Duke of Mayen turne head with his army and Cannon towards them, they sent their Deputies vnto him, promising to receiue what law it should please the King to prescribe.

Monhur

A Monhur, a little towne of surety, vpon the bankes of Garonne, well fortified, was reduced to the Kings obedience by Monsieur de Baiffe their Gouvernor (as we haue said) but it reuolted during the siege of Montauban, the sonne of Monsieur de Baiffe falsifying his word which he had giuen his father, and his fidelity to the King: which was the cause of a parricide, and the ruine of Monhur.

As for Mont de Marfan and Tartas, townes of surety also, in the Duchy of Albret, vpon the Riuier of Ladour, which falls into the Sea at Bayonne, the Gouvernors and inhabitants sent to make protestation of their fidelity vnto the King, or vnto the Duke of Mayenne in the name of his Maiestie. And so did Millan and other small places. In some they charged the Gouvernors, or tooke them quite away; hauing razed the fortifications. This is all which passed in bafe Guienne, beyond the Riuier of Garonne, where the townes were reduced to the Kings obedience, by the Duke of Mayenne.

The King came to Castillon on the 21 of Iuly, where La Force the Gouvernor receiued him with all kinds of submission. This towne belongs to the Duke of Bouillon, and all the inhabitants are of the Religion. In all the townes belonging to the said Duke, the King was receiued by the Gouvernors, Capitaines, and Inhabitants, with all shewes of duty and demonstration of faithfull Subjects.

It is a towne of surety vpon the Riuier of Dordone: it purchased reputation, being assaulted by the Duke of Mayenne, who commanded an army in Guienne vnder Henry the third, for that it had made resistance foure months, and defended a trench fise weekes, where there was nothing but a barricado of Hogheads which made the separation, yet there was neuer place better assaulted, nor better defended. His Maiestie hearing that some indiscreet persons would haue committed a disorder in their Temple, he commanded Monsieur de Modene to make enquiry, who set certaine Archers to guard it, to the end the souldiers which past, might not commit any insolency, whereof they gaue him a certificate, and desired his Maiestie to pardon what was past.

The King came to Saint Foy, where the Seigneur of Theobon, who had married the daughter of Monsieur de Baiffe, was Gouvernor. The Court lodged there, but the King in the Castle of Mezieres. This towne is in the Seneschaley of Agenois, three leagues from Bergerac, mounting vpon the Riuier of Dordone, and of no lesse efficacy then Bergerac. It is well fortified, manned, and munitioned. The Magistrates and Conscils gaue the Grand Prouost a Declaration that they had receiued no bad vltage, either in their persons or goods, but all honour and fauour from his Maiestie: yea afterwards both they and Theobon their Gouvernor, whom the King left in the place, reuolted during the siege of Montauban. The Seigneur Panissant came thither vnto the King, he was powerfull in Bergerac, and had laboured faithfully to reduce them to their obedience by the Constables care. His Maiestie receiued him fauourably, and was well pleased with his seruice, promising to acknowledge his fidelitie to him and his posterity. The King came to Bergerac, where he entred without any solemnity, he stayed there foure dayes, and viewed the fortifications.

E This towne is held of great importance in bafe Guienne, for their wealth, traffique, and great fortifications: It stands vpon the Riuier of Dordone, in a large plaine not commanded.

During his Maiesties stay there, many neighbour places of Agenois and Quercy (who fought nothing but a president of some reuolt within the Realme) were deliuered into the Kings hands by their Gouvernors, who gaue them recompence, and commanded their wals and fortifications should be demantled, speaking these words worthy of his piety and iustice, That he wished there were no places fortified, but vpon the Frontiers of his Realme, so the end the hearts and fidelities of his subjects, might serue as Citadels for the guard of his person. The chiefe places thus reduced, were Puymerol, Thonneins, and Montflanquin on this side the Riuier of Garonne. Finally, Montsegur, Parado, Saint Serre, Castelnau, Cardaillac, Cadenac, Castets, and Mucidan, places of surety, with others which the Protestants held, betwene the Riuers of L'Isle, Dordone, Garonne, and Lot, (except Clerac, whicher the most zealous of these townes retired themselves to defend it against the king) came and brought their keyes to his Maiestie. The Duke of Sully being at Figeac, sent to assure the King of his fidelity, the like did they of Turenne, Lymceuil, and all other places belonging to the Marshall of Bouillon.

The Kings vigilancy in the security of his Army.

The King passed his Cannon over the River of Dordone, and left Rembures with his Regiment in Bergerac, to see the fortifications thereof demolished: In his march hee was very careful (seeing the bad wayes) for his Cannon, which hee caused to be suclered by his troops, to prevent all surpris by them of Clerac, so as hee was forced to stay a day at Saint Bartholmewes for it, which hee desired to see in the head of his army, for neuer Prince was more ialous nor more careful for the lodging of his troops, as well for their safeties, as for the commodities of water, wood, and forage. When the army is quartered, he desires to know the situation of their lodgings, the approaches and the distance of the enemies Garisons: saying, that it is a great impiety in a Generall, not to take an exact care of lodgings, for that the whole armie relies vpon his foresight and vigilancy. He would not suffer his horse and foot to be diuided by any sudden Torrent, or by any charge of the Enemy falling betweene them, so as they might not succour one another, saying, that they must accustom them to lodge after this manner, were it but for the reputation of the Generall which commands the Army.

The King sends to view Clerac

The King having resolved to march, it was propounded by the Constable to send the Marshall of Saint Geran, and the Seigneurs of Termes and Zamet, to view the situation of Clerac, which was but three Gallie leagues from Saint Bartholmew, to bring him word at his coming to Tonneins, what they had discovered: which his Maiefty finding very necessary, commanded that Monseurs Company of horse, and Arnauds Carabins should accompany them.

Is faine to lodge and sup without his Officers. The vigilancy of the Constable.

On Monday the nineteenth the King removed from Saint Bartholmewes, with intention to goe lodge at Tonneins, but there fell such a storme of raine, as all the grounds were drowned, and the brookes which were betweene Hautevigne and Tonneins, so overflowed, that most part of the army was in great danger. The King seeing this deluge with which his poore souldiers were drenched, would neuer enter vnder any rooffe, or into his Coach, to giue them an example of constant suffering, and besides, comforted them with good words. This raine lasted six or seuen houres without intermission, and forced the King to lodge at Hautevigne vpon the brink of the flood, without any of his Officers, because they were already past these waters, and by this meanes was faine to sup with such piousness as was found amongst some stragling lurlers of the army.

The Constable slept not all the night, and foreseeing that those of Clerac (who had foure thousand souldiers in their towne) would wax audacious with this accident of the weather, & that they should have small seruice of the footmen or Cannon for foure daies after, he sent many messages vnto the Grand Prouost, as well to repaire the bridge which the Torrent had broken, as to cause lights to be set vpon all eminent places, and in the high-ways, to guide those which were yet in the waters, or other wayes strayed, that they might ioyne themselves vnto the army.

The Lord Keeper, and many other of the Councell, were passed a little before, vpon a little bridge, before the throng of people came, or that the River was risen, and went to Tonneins. The Secretaries of State and Treasurers came a while after, but too late, for they found the passage stoppt vp by the Foot. At the same instant arriued the Grand Prouost, who leauing the King, to enter into the meadowes all couered with water, in many places to the skirts of the Saddle, and fearing lest the little bridge should be broken, which was the onely refuge for the King if he had come into the water, advanced himselfe to leize vpon the fame, but stepping vp to get thereon, the thrust was so great, that hee was borne downe into the River, with his cloake buttoned about him, where, had not the souldiers of the Guard pulled him suddenly out, he had perished, as some others did in the same place. Being gotten into a Mill hard by, hee sent presently for Carpenters to strengthen the bridge that the King might passe; but he would not abandon his Cannon, nor his foot, which made the Grand Prouost goe to Tonneins, where he found the Keeper of the Seales, and the Earle of Schomburg, where they resolved to assure themselves of Tonneins, in the which there were but two Companies which should enter in guard before the Kings lodging.

This accident might well tempt the inhabitants in regard of the persons which were come into the Towne; but they provided carefully for the keeping of the Ports, and for their hofis and armes.

Opinions touching the siege of Clerac.

A The waters being somewhat fallen, his Maiefty came on the twentieth of Iuly to Tonneins, where it was propounded in Councell, that the army could not bee drawne together to attempt any exploit in three dayes, nor recover their Cannon and Baggage in foure, wherefore in the meane time they should consider what might be fit for the siege of Clerac, if they persisted in their rebellion. There were diuersities of opinion. Some held that Clerac was without fame or reputation, and that it was not to bee found in the Mappe; yet the situation, the fortification, and foure thousand men (which were held to be the most warlike of the Prouince) defended it: That the foile was so fat and slippery, as three dayes of raine would ruine the Kings trenches: That it was easie to imagine that they of Montauban encouraged them to endure a siege, to preferre themselves, and to draw the Kings army into a rainy season, which was their onely hope: That it was better to prevent them before they had finished the parapet of their new workes, or resolved what troops they would receiue to maintaine the siege: That they knew well they were very ialous to receiue any troops from any great man of their party, and therefore they could not recover any but from their neighbours, which would not be sufficient, for that they must haue about two thousand men, onely to keepe the half-moones and new fortifications of Villebourbon: That Clerac might be kept from all acts of hostility by the neighbour garisons: That the full obedience of the townes of Languedoc, depended on the taking of Montauban, and in like manner Clerac would yeeld; the siege whereof would consume much time, and make them lose the fruits which they expected before winter: wherefore they were of opinion, That if they of Clerac would yeeld to the raising of their new fortifications, and giue hostages to perform it, they should accept them, whereby they should giue time, and spare much blood which would be spilt.

The contrary opinion maintained, That it touched the Kings reputation, to leaue a place in Guienne, which might be a shelter and refuge to the mutins (who commonly liue quietly in their houses, hauing no retreat) and that there was no other place which would maintaine a reuolt: That they must not confider the number of men within it; but the quality of such as had authority, and remember, that if the Marquis of La Force, who was Gouernor, could haue found any safety, he would not haue left it so shamefully: That S. Torfe (who was the most eminent in birth and reputation) had good parts for a Souldier, but he had not sufficient for a Commander, nor to defend a place which should be battered with 25 Cannons, and that they knew well there were not ten men of command within the towne: That the inhabitants (who had goods to lose) would maintaine their authority, and not suffer S. Torfe nor his souldiers to suppress their power, and that when as they should see themselves assaulted, and ready to be made a prey to the army they would embrace a partie: That the souldiers (seeing themselves in ialousie with the inhabitants, and they alone exposed to all dangers) would thinke of their safety, especially, when they should haue lost their Counterscarpe and ditches: That they must spend a month in taking of the townes which were in the way to Montauban: the which the Duke of Mayen (who would arriue the next day, from the taking of Caumont and Merac) might performe with his armie, and so no time should be lost.

The Constable said, That there were many reasons on either side, but he was of opinion to attempt Clerac, relying vpon the intelligences which hee had practised with the enemy, whereby he hoped that Clerac would bee reduced to obedience within three weekes. Whereupon the King refused for this siege, commanding the Cannon should advance. On the 22 of Iuly, D. Esclapart, a Captaine of Carabins, brought some of the chiefe inhabitants of Clerac to the Constable, who demanded, That his Maiefty should suffer them to enjoy their libertie, and leave their fortifications as they were, for they desired their liues, and so they would declare themselves his subjects. To whom the Constable made answer, That should he might or more powerful to use this speech: you remember, that the King was your gages, and hath bequeathed them thirty Cannons to you; and that you should haue his feet, as a pardon of your criminall designs, and assure your selves, his subjects, and his wise hope for no Capitulation: The King would not make any with them, nor can he. But he hath the honor to be allied vnto him, and on who are a rebellious people, and must satisfy him by his own hand, to some to dispute the authority, and reputation of the French King, and to say, that it was true, but they could not doe otherwise, hauing no further power.

The next day, the King being in Councell, said, That the day following they must goe

1621 a Rendezvous to all the foot, to invest the towne: To whom the Constable answered: A That the Marshall D'Escligniers and Monsieur de Boisse were gone, to see if they could make them become honest men: who arising at that instant, made report, That they had saluted them with the Cannon, and store of Musquet shot, and that they must not expect any reason from them by mildnesse: Moreover, they said, that the approach vnto the towne was troublesome, and barricadoed in many places, which they must force, and give the command to the wildest and most resolute and courageous. Some write that they ramped themselves, Souldiers without feare, defending a Towne without a King.

They sayd also, That the iustice the King should doe in Clerac, would strike a terror into all the factions of France: That his subjects complained by the officers of Soueraigne Courts, That his Maiestie had left the title of Leuis the Lust, which his admirable iudgement had purchased, to take (by his too great mildnesse) that of Leuis the Gentle: That it was a kind of cruelty to vie indulgence to such as sought to peruert the Lawes of the Monarchy, and that he must doe like vnto a pitifull father, who to saue his sonnes body, causeth the Chirurgion to cut off an arme or a leg: By these reasons they concluded, That they must not speake of any treatie, but of an absolute submission at the Kings discretion.

Clerac inuaded.

The first charge

The Marquis of Termes slain.

The Constable gaue three Rendezvous to the army, for that Clerac was environed with many hills full of Vines, of very hard access; the approaches were narrow passages, difficult for the horse, where the besieged were entrenched and barricadoed. The army being arriued, and the Commanders hauing viewed the places fittest to be assailed, they gaue order for the charge, the which was giuen in three severall places with great resolution, and maintained by them of the towne very obstinately. The Regiment of the Kings Guard (being led by Monsieur de Termes, Marshall of the Camp) having forced their third barricado, and pursued the besieged to thier very ditch, he was unfortunately shot into the body, being on horsebacke and without armes. Hee was presently caried to Toncins (which was the Kings quarter) lying till the next day. He was generally lamented. The Kings Confessor came to visit him, who saluted him in the Kings name: Father, said hee, speake no more vnto me of the Kings of the earth, to whom I am now vnprophable, but speake onely of the King of heauen. He committed his last sighs vnto the Grand Prouost, and entreated him to assure the King, That the onely griefe hee had to dye, was for that he could no longer serue him: That he left a brother afflicted, a young wife in despair, and two children without meanes and in miserie: That he recommended them to the Kings charity, protesting that he had not any thing but what it pleased him to giue him. The King hearing of this disaster, went to visit him, and hauing embraced him, he comforted him, promising him to haue a care of his children, who returning from him, the teares fell from his eyes.

Distrust and jealousie betweene the souldiers and the inhabitants in Clerac.

Deputies sent from Clerac to the King, to shew him the situation of the place.

The Marquis of Clerac comes to the King.

The siege continued, and the Kings troops aduanced with their trenches which were ready to breake into their ditches. These sharpe assaults, with their Batteries and Mines, terrified those sieged, there being also some iacobins and distrust betweene the souldiers and the inhabitants, by the Constables industry, practised from the beginning of the siege. All these encounters drew the first Consul and the chiefe inhabitants to thinke of their safety; and for that he had the honour to be well knowne vnto the Duke of Angoulême, he desired to speake with him, whom hee made acquainted with the desire they had to submit themselves, whereof hee advertised the Constable. Many held this report incredible, that in place of that situation, fortified in perfection, and full of men and munition, hauing performed an action of vnexpected resistance, should on the twelfth day of the siege begin to yield: Yet for that the Countersiege was now ready to be begun on the fourth of August, hoping for no reliefe but from the Kings clemency, they deputed the first Consul, and some of the inhabitants, with a Minister, to call themselves at his Maiesties feet, and to crave pardon. They were presented at Toncins by the Constable: Being before the King vpon their knees, the Minister spake after this manner: Sir, the result of a tumult of rebellion, who haue suffered themselves to be caried away with furious passions of rage, upon pretence of religion and oppression of conscience, with our selves at your Maiesties feet, transfer our liues, liberty, and goods, to the discretion of your Maiesties iustice or mercy: We thus haue sought to make our liues a part of the sin, yet much lesse then our crime desired a deliverance we hope any thing of the other, except your Maiesty will as vnprophably pardon the sinners, as we haue pardoned the sinners of the world: If you may be so happy, we will stay on.

A trary to the Children of Israel, who said, We haue seene God, and we shall dye: But we will leave in eternall memory to our posterity, That we haue seene the King, from whose bounty wee haue receiued life. If your Maiesty grant it, we shall acknowledge you for the Tutors god of the world: We shall not open our mouths, but to blesse your name and reigne: our hearts shall desire nothing more then the greatness of your Scepter. And as we haue bene the most rebellious, and least worthy of mercy, we will be hereafter the most faithfull and obedient of all your subjects. The King made them this Answer: You haue done well to submit your selues wholly to my mercy, shew your duties to morrow, and I will make you taste of my bounty. My Constable shall acquaint you with my further pleasure. Whereupon they retired to Clerac, to giue order for the dislodging of their Souldiers.

The Kings Answer.

The Kings pleasure was, that they should yeeld at discretion, vpon assurance of his mercy, and that they to whom his Maiestie gaue life, should depart with white wands and some baggage, the inhabitants paying 50000 crownes to redeem themselves from spoile: moreover, 10000 which were giuen to the Master of the artillery, for the rights due to his charge: and 10000 more vnto him that had caused the Capitulation to be signed; and the Towne to remaine at the Kings pleasure. The Capitulation being concluded & diuulged, the battery ceased, and the souldiers prepared presently to scale the bulwarke, desiring nothing but pillage. The Marshall D'Escligniers entred early on the fift of August to draw forth the Souldiers, and to bring in some of the Kings Guards. The Constable came soon after, to whom the Consuls presented the keyes of the Towne: and S. Torse who commanded the souldiers, deliuered vp his sword, and all together besought him to acquaint them with the Kings pleasure. He assured S. Torse of his life, and to the rest he said, The King hath giuen me charge, to command you to liue hereafter in the obedience to the which you are naturally bound, and neuer to ingage your selues in the resolutions of these vnlawfull Assemblies, to the which you haue indiscreetly yeeld your selues. If you fall into a relapse, assure your selues, he will make you generally feele the effects of his indignation. He is now satisfied with the punishment of some few which are most culpable, to be a terror to many, and an example to all such as shall runne headlong vnto the dishonour of these seditious resolu: and as for the rest of the inhabitants, he gaue them their liberties, liues and goods.

The Constable enters Clerac.

At the departure of the Souldiers, there happened a great disaster: the souldier companies of the Kings Armie, had promised vnto themselves to force Clerac, and to reuenge the death of the Marquis of Termes, and of many other braue men slaine at the approaches. The Constable had provided for all disorders within the Towne; They had resolved to passe then ouer the river of Lot, to auoyd the fury of the Kings Armie: They which embarked first, entered confusedly and in great numbers, the Souldiers of the guards, seeing some with their Muskets and Swords contrary to the accord, fell vpon them to take them away: This first violence amazed such as were disarmed, who fearing their liues caused the Boate to leane on the one side, so as many fell into the River, and were drowned. Others being ready to embarke, and not knowing the cause of this combustion, thinking themselves to be in danger of death, cast themselves into the river which is swift and deepe in that place. The third Boate being ouerladen, was ouerturned and most of them drowned: others seeking to saue their liues by the current of the streame vpon a causey of stone which ranne crosse the River, were sone swallowed vp in these gulfs. Moreover, there was a rope fashioned to either banke for the passage of the Boates, at the which there were some 30 Souldiers hung, but the Kings men cutting the rope they were caried away with the violence of the streame. The King was much displeased at this insolency, and commanded iustice should be done.

A disaster at the going forth of the Souldiers from Clerac.

Clerac being reduced to the Kings obedience, they made choise of foure or five of the most musketeers to suffer for the rest, which were one of the Consuls, a Prouost, and his sonne who was a Minister, a Physician and a Shoemaker, very turbulent men. They were condemned by the Grand Prouost to be hanged, and were executed; but the Physician being ready to die, his pardon brought him, by the intercession of the King's Physician. Hauing giuen order for the raising of the fortifications of Clerac, the King went towards Agen, before his departure the Duke of Mayenne was come vnto him, who had charge to recalle those little Townes retired beyond the River of Garonne, and then to passe at Thoumou and to ioyne with his Maiestie at Montauban. Being at Agen, the towns of Lezard, Laour, and Tournon, brought their keyes to the King, he liued and dyed.

soone after, and slew all which made resistance. The Duke went and besieged Albiac, where they refused to lodge him, and put themselves in Armes: so as in three dayes siege the Duke lost about 200 men: but in the end hauing forced them with the Cannon, to Monfi: de Pignolles Marshall of the Campe had been sore hurt at this siege. Those of the Religion of Realleuill with in one League of Albiac, which had likewise prepared to endure a siege, seeing this hard vantage, abandoned their Towne. The Inhabitants of Causade vpon their suite, were receiued to obedience. The like did Bournequet, Negre-pellisse, and Bule. Saint Anthoine a little strong Towne in Rouergne, sent their keys by one of their Consuls, with protestation to maintaine themselves in the Kings obedience, but marching thither, and being with in one Gascogne league, hee receiued intelligence C that they were reuolted, they sending him word that their Consull had betrayed them in his Commission. The Duke preparing to bessege it, hee had commandment from the King to come with his troopes of Montauban.

On the fourth of August, there was a Hollander ship taken at Cet in Languedoc on this manner. About midnight, this Shippe came to an Ancre, within musket shot of the shore, the Capitaine, with three souldiers, and an Interpreter landed. They found a fisherman of whom they demanded in what country they were: who before he would answer, asked them if they were of the Religion: and they answering yea, he said also he was one.
The Capitaine hearing this, discovered his voyage vnto him: he presently conducted him into the Citadell of Cet, making him beleue the Gouvernor was cousin to Monfi: de Cha- D stillon, who receiued him very courteously. Hauing enquired the Captaines name, he sent Grafly the Fisherman to the Souldiers aboard, to come to land by commandment from their Capitaine. The Gouvernor hauing entertained them, he presently sent twelue of his souldiers to seize vpon the ship: who being Masters thereof, they discharged all the Ordnance of the ship and Citadell for ioy. The next day morning the Duke of Montmorency came from Pezenas, and visited the ship: where they wrote, hee found six double Cannons, and eight Field-peeces, besides eight other which belonged to the ship: 4000
Muskets, 4000 Carabins, 2500 Pistols, 2500 Pikes, 500 Curassies, 500 Souldiers-coates, 200 Quintals of powder, a great number of bullets for Ordnance, and great store of Lead E for small-shot, with a number of planckes for the seruice of the warre, which wood was valued at 4000 Crownes. This ship was giuen to Espinault Gouvernor of Cet, and the Fisherman had 200 Pistols: the armes were carryed to Pezenas and Agde. They write that the whole freight of this ship was valued at 20000 Crownes, and that it did belong to the Churches of the Circle of base Languedoc.

The King had made the Duke of Epemont Generall of his Army in Xaintonge and Aunis, who approached neere-vnto Rochel, with 4000 Foot, and eight Cornets of Horfe, where there were many skirmishes, encounters, and exploits of armes, which were too tedious to relate in particular. In one of them the Seigneur of La Noue, being of the Rochellers party was taken: He had obtained passport from the Duke of Epemont to see a sister of his who lay sick, vpon condition that he should come vnto him: he came, F and the Duke conuined him to returne vnto the Kings seruice, laying before him the hon-nor which his Father and Grandfather had purchased by seruing their Kings well: but he peruaded nothing: hauing scene his sister, he returned to Rochel, where hee resolved to lay an Ambuscado in a wood, to surprize some of the Kings men which went daily to the gates of Rochel. But he continued so long in his Ambuscado, with 20 Curassies without any diligence, as they were forced to find to the next village for meat: the place which brought to, obscured the place, and the number, and acquainted the Duke of Epemont therewith,

1621

A therewith, who presently sent 60 men of Armes, who seized vpon all the approaches of the Ambuscado. La Noue was on the top of a Tree with a periscope-glasse, to see if he could discouer any one in field; but he was so suddenly surprized, as he had no leisure to get to Horfe-backe, but was forced to yeeld to the Baron of Nieul, hauing of his men slaine, and 8 taken prisoners. Being brought to the Duke of Epemont, hee receiued him courteously, telling him he was to blame he had not beleued him: when hee entreated him to leave Rochel and acknowledge the King, yet he was glad to see him in good estate and not hurt, and that hee would aduertise his Maiefty. The Duke, did only blocke vpon Rochel by land, so as they could haue no commerce with their Neighbours: Hee gather-B vp their rents from their Farmers, neither could they receiue, either Come, wine, or any other commodities by land, so as their onely helpe was by Sea.

There was diuision among the Protestants in the Circle of base Languedoc: Genau- dan, Viarez, and the Sauennes, of the which Monfi: de Chastillon, had been made Prouin- cial Generall by the assembly of Rochel: some of the milder spirits, desired to yeeld to C obedience to the King, and to enioy the liberty of their consciences according to his Eldicts: but such as were zealous for the assembly of Rochel prevailed, which bred much alteration in those parts. They grew ialous of Monfi: de Chastillon. They called an assembly at Nismes, where they frame many complaints against him: That hee contenned the Generall assembly, and would not approve the Union: That he had intelligence with the enemies of their partie: That hee discountenanced all such as were affected to the Churches: That he had hindered the succors of Saint Iohn D'Angely, whereby had followed the losse of Guienne: That he would not doe any thing against the Kings will and pleasure: That he had sought to diuide the Prouinces from the generall Assembly, and had giuen support to all such as would forsake it, with many such like. Whereupon the Assembly, as well by the consent of the generall Assembly, as that of these Prouinces, and the generall desire of the Churches, being forced by the necessitie of affaires, wherein delays (they said) would be preiudiciall: They declared Monfi: de Chastillon, fallen from all Charges and Dignities which he had held in the name of the Church; and particularly D from the place of Generall of the Prouinces of base Languedoc; the Sauennes, Genau-dan and Viarez, as also of the Governments of Montpellier and Aiguemortes; forbidding him expressely to exercise any faction of Generall or Governour, in the same: Generall or Governments, vpon paine to be declared an open enemy: And also, forbidding all men which made profession of the Religion, to acknowledge him for Generall, nor to receiue any order from him, or any other in his name, touching the warre or Treasure, without the expresse resolution of the Assembly.

There were many enterprises and surprises on either partie in base Languedoc and Vi-uarez, during the moneths of Iuly and August. Monfi: de Montmorency Gouvernor for the King in Languedoc, had receiued commandment to spoile the Harbets & Viueage about Nismes and Montpellier. M. de Chastillon had lodged his troops neere to Montpellier to E prevent it. And they of Nismes entertained some troops to that end about their Towne.
The Duke of Montmorency understanding that they of Nismes had lodged 400 men in Marguerite, a great village entrenched, a league from their Towne; hee resolved to defeat them, and lodge in that place, to annoy them of Nismes during the haruett. Hee had drawne together 300 horfe and 350 foot, with which hee marched by night toward Mari- guerite, and in the morning gaue a furious charge, and forced them to retire now instanding all their resistance: in which retreat very many were slaine, so as in the end such as were fled into a Tower and the Church, demanded composition for their liues and armes, the which was granted, they being in all not about fourescore men. There came out of Nismes 1500 foot and 500 horfe; but they found it difficult to relieue them with any F safety, seeing the Dukes army in front of them with two peeces of Ordnance, which made them retire.

In April this year, the Pope had granted a generall Indulge, to pray vnto God to protect and defend his Church, and to root out all heresies. Hee gloried to see his eldest sonne of the Church triumph over his enemies, sending him a Letter, which was presented vnto him at the siege of Clerac: whereby hee encouraged the King to continue his victorious armes against heretikes, as he termed them.

parts, fought meanes to diuert them, by stirring vp some combustions in Normandie, which is in the other extremity of the Realme; presuming that there were many of the reformed Religion in the chiefe Townes of that Province, which would be ready to take Armes vpon any good occasion, if they might haue a leader. The Assembly make choice of Vatseille called Mont-Christien (who had been in Gergeau and Sancerre when they were taken) knowing him to be a man of action, fit for troubles, mutinous and factious, whom they appointed to go and leaue men in Normandie, and to draw them of the Religion vnto Armes. He came to Rochel in Iuly, where he stayed 15 dayes to confer with the Assembly. And as he was a good speaker, so he promised them Mountaines: They deliuered vnto him many commissions with money & bills of exchange, to raise regiments of foot and some Companies of horse in Mayen, and the neighbour Prouinces: which Commissions were of this Tenor. That the Churches being persecuted by the enemies of their Religion which abused the Kings affection and conscience, (vnder whose humble subiection and obedience, they protested before God and men to continue inuolubly, acknowledging that he was giuen them of God, to be their Soueraigne Lord) It was necessary to vse a iust defence, and to oppose lawfull and naturall meanes to violence and oppression, to maintaine his Maiesties authority, and Edicts, the liberty of Conscience, and safety of their liues. To which end they gave out their commissions to whom they pleased, by vertue of the authoritie giuen them by all the Churches of France, and Souerainie of Bearne.

Vatseille being come from Rochel, before he deliuered his Commissions he visits many Gentlemen of Mayen and Normandie, aswell of the reformed Religion as others of their faction: Hee imparts his designe to none but such as hee knew well affected to the partie, and in the end being assured of diuers Captaines, he deliueres them Commissions and Money, to leaue men speedily, and to be ready to goe to field vpon the first command they shall receiue from the Assembly at Rochel, which hee thought would be in the beginning of October. In the meane time Vatseille being assisted by 100 or 12 of his most confident Captaines, did often visit them of the partie in base Normandie, and giues them a Rendezvous on the 11 of October, neere the Forest of Andaine by Alençon, where hee had already some numbers assembled, who began to spoyle the neighbouring Townes and Villages, and had already attempted to surpris diuers strong houses and the Castle of Carbrage. The Duke of Longueuille Gouvernor of the Prouince, and Monseigneur de Matignon Lieutenant general, aduertised of Vatseilles designs, came to Alençon & Donfront, in the beginning of October. Vatseille continues his practices, and assures them of the partie, that there would be 5 or 6000 men at the Rendezvous. On the 7 of October, hee came to a Borough called Touraills 5 leagues from Falaise, and as much from Donfront, accompanied onely with 6 of his Captaines, and the groom of his chamber: They came into an Inne and called speedily for their Supper, seeming by their talke that they meant not to stay long. The Host had an opinion that this was Vatseille of whom there was so much spoken, and held it fit to giue notice to the Seigneur of Touraills, a Gentleman whom hee knew to be well affected to the Kings seruice. He ranne vp to the Castle (a quarter of a league from the Borough) and told his Lord what guests were at his house, and that hee supposed them to be Vatseille and his Captaines. The Gentleman resolved instantly to serue the King in this occasion, or to lose his life. He sent presently to two Gentlemen his neighbours, intreats them to come vnto him on an occasion whereon the Kings seruice depended and the safety of the Countrie; but whilst they prepared their Armes to goe, a Souldier by mischance flou off a peece in the court of the Castle, which made them feare that this noise would make Vatseille dislodge, wherefore hee aduanced speedily with such men as he had, to inuest the Inne: but comming forth hee met with two Gentlemen, and 3 or 4 Souldiers which came to assist him, being in all 30 persons: Comming to the Inne, they lay by the Candle in Vatseilles lodging that they were about to dislodge: And for that no man knew them well, he sent to command them in the Kings name to tell their names, and lay downe their armes. Vatseille called himself Champeaux: but hearing a noise about the House and in the hall, they came downe well armed, and at the staires foot slew a Gentleman and one Souldier, and hurt some others. Touraills and his company charged Vatseille, who was slaine vpon the place, his groom was wounded and taken, the other 7 being fore hurt, escaped by the darknesse of the Night, passing on A foot through the river neere vnto the Taine. The next day morning they were met by the Countrey people, much troubled with their wounds, where some dyed, and the rest retired to some places of strength. Vatseille took their horses and baggage, and carrying the dead body, with the prisoner, to be carried to his Castle, giues the armes, horses and baggage to the Gentlemen and Souldiers which had assisted him, examines the Groom, who confessed that it was Vatseille his master, whom they had slaine, and discouered many things importing the Kings seruice. Early in the morning, Touraills aduertised de Matignon, the D. of Longueuille, and the Parliament of Roen of this accident: sending also a Gentleman to the King lying before Montauban. They proceeded criminally against his body at Donfront, whither it was sent, where they condemned it to be broken in pieces, and the ashes cast into the winds. His seruice confessed, that some of his masters Commissions which were not yet distributed, remained with one Penes a cousin of Vatseilles, where they found 45 Commissions hidde in a chest. This seruice done by Touraills was much commended, and the death of the two Gentlemen which were slaine greatly lamented. These newes were very pleasing vnto the King, who wrote vnto Touraills thanking him for the good seruice he had done him, and assured him hee should finde the effects of his loue and bounty when occasion should be offered.

The King comes to Agen the tenth of August: He meditates on nothing but the siege of Montauban, which was the chiefe bulwarke and refuge for the Protestants in high Guienne and Languedoc. This was an enterprise of great importance: for if hee takes this Towne, all the rest will easily yeeld themselves vnder the yoke of obedience: if hee faile, the honor of his former victories will be blemished. Hee proposed it to his Council of warre, in the which there were diuersities of opinions. They which were against the present siege objected foure Reasons: First, the neernes of Autumn; the fauer of diseases, which was the death of the souldiers, who eating new fruits and grapes, would be instantly afflicted with contagious diseases, burning agues, purples and bloody fluxes. The second was the ordinary ouer-flowing of the river of Tarn, in September, by reason of the raine which the Southerly windes engender at that time in those Countreies; and in March by the melting of the snow from the mountaines: which raine ceasing, and the river being retired within its channell, leaues the Countrey about Montauban (being a fat rich ground) so bad, myrie, and slippery, that they should not be able to retire for the space of three weekes. Thirdly, the fortifications of the place, being the refuge of all the resolute and resolute men of their party, with the obstinacie of the inhabitants. And fourthly, the Duke of Rohan who was at Millaud, where hee assembled the succours of the neighbour Prouinces, being most of the Religion: being more necessary to goe and defeat him, and to cleanse the Countreies of Albigeois and Rouergue. Finally, that it was conuenient to delay the siege of Montauban vntill April following: and in the meane time to leaue strong garisons in the neighbour Townes, to hinder their traffiques, and cut off their viuals.

They which held the contrary opinion, said, That the ouer-flowing of Tarn happened but in the end of October: and that in two moneths and a halfe they might easily take Montauban, if it were not releued with men and viuals. That the insolent humor of the inhabitants of Montauban would neuer agree with the Souldiers. That against the pretended succours of the Duke of Rohan, his Maiestie might send his Light-horse into Albigeois, to fight with them vpon all occasions; being well aduertised that his chiefe Forces consisted onely in Foot, and that his Chieftain was nothing worth. That it would blemish the reputation of his Maiesties armes, to passe towards Albigeois and Rouergue, and leaue such a Towne as Montauban at his backe, the which would presently require a rebellion in all the Townes reduced vpon the river of Garonne, in Quercy, and Perigord. In whilst the Kings army should be fighting for the passages of the mountaines, where the weather is opposite to them (clues to an army); and where it is not good to be but when the weather is dusty and dry, and not during the stormes of snow which reigne there. That the discommoditie of Autumn and of new fruits, might be found as well in Albigeois & Rouergue as in Quercy. That the suit of the Thoulouzains to his Maiestie, to take this thorne out of their feet, and what they offered towards the charges of the siege, should be preferred before the proposition of eight moneths time, for the delaying of the siege: and that which there was no doubt but they of Montauban would neuer meane to waite 1621 new broyles. Moreouer, the preparation of so many cannons and munition ready; the courage of so many souldiers, and the iustice of his Maiesties armys, were powerfull reasons to conclude the siege of Montauban as speedily as might be, so free the reuolt in so many prouinces without hope of renewing.

The King comes to Montauban. These opinions being weighed and considered, the Siege of Montauban was resolved, and it was concluded that the Duke of Angoulême should goe with the Light horse into Albigeois and Rouergue, to crosse the Duke of Rohans designs. The King came to Montauban, on the 17 of August. The Duke of Mayen, and the Marshall of Themines came vnto him with their Forces, and were commanded to invest Montauban, towards Villebourbon. This towne is situated vpon the declining of a hill, which discouers the Country round about. At the foot of this hill there is a long bridge, but narrow, which passeth over the river of Tarn, the which cometh not vnto the walls, but when it overfloweth, so as they may goe on dry-foot round about the Towne, the which is well fortified with bastions, ravelins, bulwarks, halfe-moones, and all other fortifications, being also well furnished with artillery, men, and munition; so as they did hope to make a long defence. It was invested on the 13 of August on three sides; vpon the East was the Constables quarter, where commanded the Prince Joinville, the Earle of Bossompierre, and the Marshalls of Prallin and Chaune, with the regiments of Elusac, Champagne, and Normandy. On the South was the Duke of Mayenne, with the Marshall of Themines. On the West lay the Duke of Desdiguers, with the Marshall of S. Geran, with the Regiment of the Guards, and three others. And the Kings quarter was at Picquecot, as you haue heard.

A description of Montauban. In the beginning of the Siege the Duke of Sully who had some years before retired himselfe into Quercy and Languedoc, came vnto the King, beseeching him to giue peace vnto his people, hoping hee should preuaile so much with them of Montauban, as they should craue pardon. The King promised to pardon their offence, if they would submit themselves vnder his obedience: in case content that the Duke should enter into Montauban, seeing he said he had no other desire but to perswade them to obedience. Being entred, he found that the Earle of Bolfraud a Biemois (otherwise called Captain Mazette) commanded the souldiers: The reputation which he had gotten in the warres of Sawoy, where his Highnes had giuen him for his notable seruice, the little Earldome of Bolfraud, had made the people to chuse him for their Commander: yet some say Monsi de la Force, had the charge. For the government of affaires, there was a Councell chosen, consisting of the Minister Chamier, the Consuls, and sixe others of the most zealous of the party.

The Duke of Sully finding that Monsi de la Force and the other Gentlemen of the party, which had put themselves into Montauban, had no authority, and that all was gouerned by this Councell of the Towne: He laid before them the importance of their resistance, and told them freely, that they would make themselves odious vnto all the world by their proceeding. He propounded the meanes vnto them to obtaine their pardon in particular, and the reason they had to procure it. Hee shewed them that for the combustions which were in all Europe, there was no meanes for them to hope for any succours from strangers: And that Kings and Princes embraced not their protection, in whose ruine they had no interest. To whom the first Consill (having taken aduice of the Councell) made this answer, That they had resolved to liue and die in the vniou of the Churches, according to their oath, and therefore they neither could nor would doe any thing in particular, but treat for the generall of the cause, and the approbation of the Duke of Rohan, Generall of the Prouince. The Duke of Sully returning with this answer, his Maiesty and Councell saw they would treat as companions in authority, and not as subjects: so as this negociation proued fruitlesse.

On the first of September, they beganne to play against the Towne with 45 peeces of Ordnance: There were three batteries against the old Towne, two against the new, and two others against Villebourbon. Yet they had Saint Anthonies gate still open; where-by the besieged might goe in and out at their pleasure, and send their spies out daily to see what was done in the Kings Camp, by whom the powder (as they suppose) was set on fire, the second of the month, in two of the quarters: The first was about ten of the clocke in the morning in the Kings quarter at the chiefe battery nere vnto the Kings guards, guards, the which was so violent, as it ouerthrew the Gabions which couered the Cannon; burnt most of the Gunners and Officers of the Artilletie: amongst the which was La Vallee a famous Canoniere.

The like accident hapned the same day in the afternoon at one of the Duke of Mayennes batteries, which not onely burnt the Officers of the Ordnance; but also the Marquis of Villars, brother by the mothers side to the Duke of Mayenne, and Marshall of the Campe, and the eldest sonne of the Earle of Ribera, with two Capuchins which preached in the armie. The next day the Duke resolved to assault the halfe Moone at Ville-Bourbon, where many Noblemen and Gentlemen voluntaries went courageously to assault the place, but they were repulled with such resolution, as they lost two and thirtie men of note, and forty souldiers.

This was the first disgrace receiued before Montauban, the which was the same night somewhat moderated by the newes which the King receiued, that the Duke of Angoulême had defeated the Marquis of Maloize, hauing three thousand foot and foure hundred and fifty horse at Fauch, where they had foure hundred men slaine vpon the place, and two hundred wounded, amongst the which were about forty Gentlemen, or Captaines, with about an hundred prisoners.

On the Dukes side were slaine three Commanders, with twenty light-horsemen, and fifteene hurt: about thirtie or forty footmen slaine. After which defeat, there was an accord made by the Duke with the Marquis of Maloize, That he, the Seigneur of Causse, the Baron of Senegas, with the Colonels, Captaines, Commanders, and Souldiers, should promise vpon oath, not to cary Armes, during the space of sixe moneths vpon any pretext whatsoever, but for the Kings seruice. In regard whereof, they should vnder the Kings good pleasure, haue a generall pardon to enioy the benefit of the Edicts, as well for the libertie of their consciences, as for their liues and goods. That they should depart out of the Fort of Fauch, with their liues, armes and baggage, and retire whither they pleased, with a safe conduct if they desired it.

But let vs returne to the siege of Montauban. The batteries at Ville-Bourbon, continued the third and fourth of September, vntill foure of the clocke in the afternoon.

The Duke of Mayenne, being desirous to lodge in the halfe Moone, gave a second assault in this order. The Marquis of Themines conducted thirty Muskettiers, and a dozen Souldiers with Ladders, in the head of forty men at armes, hauing on either hand certaine voluntaries supported by the Regiment of Faucon, and seconded by that of Soze: passing out of their trenches, the Marquis had a Musket shot in the head, and was slaine, the which so amazed the Muskettiers which followed as they stood still.

Then the men at Armes, led by the Seigneurs of Sajanne, Monban, and Angy, passed on to the point, hauing the voluntaries on either side, and were the first which cast themselves into the ditch, which was sixe foot deepe. The besieged had a casemate which did much annoy them, yet they forced them to abandon it.

The Ladders which they should haue planted to the bastion, right against the halfe Moone, were foure foot too short, which was the losse of many. The voluntaries & men at armes which assaulted the halfe Moone, finding the earth much beaten downe with the Cannon, and easie to mount vpon, tooke the halfe Moone, notwithstanding all their shot, and without doubt had caried Ville-Bourbon, if the footmen had charged. But they grew so amazed seeing many returne wounded, and beleeuing that all had beene lost, as they stood still, leauing those Gentlemen to the slaughter; neither was it possible for their Campe-masters to make them aduance.

During this little stay, the besieged resumed new courage, and the voluntaries and men at Armes seeing no man to second them, and a cloud of a thousand men comming, and passing the bridge to cry kill, kill, they were forced to retire, and leaue the place, which they had so happily gotten and defended for the space of two houres. The slaughter increased by this disorder and retreat, where there were slaine forty Gentlemen vpon the Halfe Moone and in the Ditches, 60 hurt, with a great number of souldiers, whereof many died fince. In this assault, the Earle of Boulfrand Commander within Montauban, with many others were slaine.

Some write that the Duke of Mayen grew so melancholy for the losse of his brother the Marquis of Villars, and so many of the Nobilitie slaine at two assaults, as hee wished himselfe himselfe dayly dead. Being blamed by his familiar friends, he answered, it was not fit for him to live any longer after the losse of so many friends. That he was sorry he had not followed the aduice which had been giuen him, to approach by trenches without the hazard of so many braue men.

The batteries continued furiously to open a greater passage, and to renew the assault. At the Kings quarter, they advanced their trenches vnto the Ditch, and the Duke D'E. dignified did the like to come to the Sap and Myne. The Duke de Mayenne, had caused Gabions to be brought to the Countercarpe of the halfe Moone, which being discovered by their Centinels, the besieged sallied forth, and with hookes pulled them downe, with three fouldiers which were surprisid amongst them.

The Duke of Mayen, hauing with infinit toyle advanced his trenches vnto the edge of the Ditch, and planted his Gabions, on the seuenteenth of September: the D. of Guise (newly come from Prouence to the Armie,) and the Earle of Schomberg comming to see him in his Tent, he told them that he would shew them his walke, bringing them to the end of his trenches and Gabions, where he meant to plant a new battery within Musket shot of the besieged, where being discovered by the enemy, they made certaine Musket shot at them without any harme, onely the Earle of Schombergs hat was shot off. The Duke of Mayenne looking backe to see whence it came, was shot into the left eye with a musket bullet and slaine vpon the place, which presently put all the quarter into armes. At the brute hereof the fouldiers had no courage to take their Armes, the Commanders and Capitaines wept: But the sorrow was farre greater in the Kings quarter. His Maiesty who had a great interest in the losse of this generous Prince, wept bitterly, and could hardly resolute for the space of eight dayes, nor be diuerted from his melancholy. All France shewed great feelings of griefe for his death: but especially the Citie of Paris, which vpon the newes of fo great an accident, went about to thrust a sword into her owne bosome, and consume her selfe in a cruell sedition, if by the wisdome of her Gouernours, and Magistrates, this fire had not beene quenched in the beginning. The Duke of Guise after his cousins death, returned into Prouence, to prepare a Fleet against Rochel. His Maieesty tooke time to dispose of his Governments. The Prince of Ioinville was made great Chamberlaine of France in recompence of his vertue, and to binde him more strictly to serue the King faithfully, making promise to all the Dukes officers and household seruants, to recompence them for their wages and seruices. The generall sorrow for his death, throughout the Campe, did somewhat coole the heate of their assaults, and batteries for the space of ten or twelue dayes.

The newes of the Dukes death, being brought to Paris on the one and twentieth of September, his friends lamented it, but the raskall multitude spake boldly, saying, that they endured too much, and that they must kill all the Huguenots who had slaine their Catholique Princes and Noblemen, and that if they presumed on Sunday next to goe to Charenton to the exercise of their Religion, they should not returne home. The wisest sort of the Burgeses hearing those bold speeches, chid these raskals and scumme of the people, as seditious and greedy of alteration; there being also in Paris at this present a great number of murdering theues, and other needy Rogues, ready to take what was not their owne. This speech continued vntill Saturday following. Those of the Religion in the Towne, were not a little astonished. And this murmure spread abroad, so amazed them, that the most part of them left their houses, and abandoned Paris.

The Duke of Montbazon Gouernour of the Towne, foreseeing this sedition, desiring to assure them of the Religion, against these popular threats, and to prevent the mischief, sent for the ancients of the Church, to know their resolution, and whether they would goe on the morrow the fixe and twentieth of September vnto Charenton: but they being affrighted with these former rumors, said that they were determined not to goe.

Hereupon the councill was held at the Chancellors house, where it was at first concluded they should not goe; but because it was a matter of importance, and where in the King and his Edicts were interessed, it was at length resolved, that notwithstanding all these rumours, they should continue their exercise, and in case they would, they should be assisted as well as possibly they might. The Duke of Montbazon gaue aduertisement hereof to the Ciuill and Criminall Lieutenants, and the two Prouosts, to attend vpon the way to Charenton; who sent their Commissaries, and Sergeants,

A and a good number of the Officers of Justice armed vnto the gates and streets of Paris, to driue away the people which flocked together, some to see what would be done, others, to put themselves into action. All along the way to Charenton, the Prouosts with their Archers, continued all day vntill the euening. And the Duke himselfe assisted with a great number of Gentlemen besides his guards, went early in the morning that way, attending the houre of their returne, desiring it might be without any combustion, which could not be. For presently after noone, an infinit number of the base multitude ranne to S. Anthonies gate to attend their returne, and a great number went out as farre of the valley of Fescamp vpon the way to Charenton. The guards seeing such

B a number of people inclined to doe mischief, were much troubled to prevent the disorder. The Duke sends his guards to ioine with them: The Knight of the Watch did what he could with his Archers, and clenfed the wayes, making those Raskals to runne through the Vines. In the meane time the Prouosts with their people, and the Dukes Carabins conducted them of the Religion, being all together in one body in the midst of them.

Being thus disposed, they began to march towards Paris: but notwithstanding all this good order, this insolent scumme, beganne to assault them of the Religion: first with inuiolent words, and then with blowes, who defended themselves, hauing swords and daggers; so as they slew three, and foure of theirs were beagen downe with stones. The slaughter had beene greater, if the guards had not stayed the peoples fury, which continued euen in the Citie, notwithstanding the Gouernours presence and his guard.

The sedition was great at Saint Anthonies gate: and comming into the great street, a poore Gentlewoman with some others which had not put themselves with troupe amongst the guards, was stayed at the gates by a troupe of raskals, who would force her to salute our Ladies Image ouer the Port, who speaking fine words against the worshipping of that Image, was presently murdered. A poore Priest passing through the street, was runne after by a number of these people, who would haue slaine him, taking him for a Minister, if by the care of the Gouernours folke, he had not beene speedily shue into the Arsenall.

D This tumult increased still, so as the Prouost of Merchants was forced to cause the Burgeses to arme, to draw the chaines, and to keepe good watch. They which dwelt most remote from Saint Anthonies street, hearing a cry that they did massacre the Huguenots at Saint Anthonies gate, left the Churches being euensong time, and ranne to their houses to take their Armes, thinking there was some great sedition in the Citie.

This popular fury stayed not thus, but extended it selfe vnto Charenton. For as soone as the guards were parted to conduct them of the Religion to the Citie, a troupe of idle vagabonds fall vpon their Temple, breake open the Court, spoile the Stationers shops, and burne the Temple, and so passe the river to enter into Paris by the Vniuersity, being in number about foure hundred, hauing made them an ensigne of a sheete. A furious sedition which troubled all the Magistrates, and put the whole Citie in alarme. The night following, they of the Religion were so terrified, as no man durst assure himselfe in his owne house, but went and lodged with their Catholike friends. And they which during the tumult stayed abroad, durst not returne into the Citie, but very late, and by other gates.

The next day the Duke of Montbazon with all the Magistrates, went vnto the Parliament, where a Decree was made, by the which the Court tooke them of the Religion into the Kings protection: Forbidding all men vpon paine of death to wrong them. The Magistrates were also enioyned to make enquire of the authors of the said sedition, and burning at Charenton.

F Whilst the Court laboured to suppress this disorder, the sedition renewed againe in the suburbs of S. Marceau, where one of the Religion hauing slaine his owne sonne, and some others, was presently murdered by the people, and his house spoiled: but the Duke and the Prouost of Merchants comming, dispersed this multitude: yet after their departure they returned againe, and beganne to spoile two houses belonging to some of the Religion: but the Prouost and Lieutenant comming with their Archers, seized vpon foure laden with goods, which they would haue caried away. These they committed, and the next day they were punished by a Decree of the Court: that is to say, two were hanged with Papers on their breasts, whereon was written Seditious and Incendiaries; A the other two were whipped with halters about their necks, and banished for nine years. The King was much offended at this action, commanding that there should be severe justice done.

The passage of Hicks into Montauban.

But now to returne to our siege of Montauban. Presently after the D. of Mayens death, there was a piece of service performed at that siege by a young man of our Nation, whose name deserves to be registred in this History, and left to posterity: which was, for the carrying of Letters into the towne besieged, from them of Rochell, and to assure them of their estate. I finde it not written in any of my authors, being either ignorant of the fact, or careless to doe a stranger that honour: yet I will deliver it faithfully vnto the Reader, as I received it from his owne mouth. For the better understanding whereof I must acquaint you with his life there. His name is Ellis Hicks, his father was a Scribe dwelling within Ludgate, not long since deceased. He followed Monfieur de Mont Pouillon, second sonne to Monfieur de la Force in France, during these last warres, being then not above twenty yeares old.

The Marquis of La Force his elder brother and his Lord being forced to leave Caumont by the Duke of Mayenne, they came to Clerac before the siege; where finding the inhabitants diuided, the better for desirous to obey the King, and the multitude resolute in their revolt, they left the towne, thinking to goe to Bergerac, but they had submitted themselves vnto the King: So as leaving Guienne, they came down towards Rochell with fifteene horse. Comming to the gates, they were shut against them, they calling the Marquis Traitor, and telling him that having betrayed Guienne, hee came now to betray them; yet by the meanes of Monfieur de Fausar, who commanded all the strangers which were in Rochell, they were let in, yet without any good liking of them of the towne, or with any assurance of their safeties. Montauban had beene besieged about a moneth, the assembly at Rochell was in suspense, having no communication with them being shut vp by land. They had sent many with Letters to informe them of their estate, but none returned, and were daily made beleue that Montauban was yielded vnto the King.

They were desirous to make a new tryall. Master Hicks (for his service well deserves D that Title) offers his service to the Marquis. The Assembly hearing of it embrace it, although his young yeares could giue them no great assurance of resolution. They furnish him with horse and money, and ship him to Mornac, after which, in eight dayes, travelling most by night with guides, he came to Moissac foure leagues from Montauban, where the Earle of Carleil, then extraordinarie Ambassadour for his Maiestie was lodged, being the same night that Monfieur de Mayenne was slaine.

There hee findes attending vpon my Lord Ambassadour, a familiar friend of his called Fairfax, who brings him to the armie, where they meet with one Webbe a follower of the Marshall of Saint Geran, who shewes him the campe, the trenches and the Mine by the Marshalls commandement, and lodgeth that night in his quarter.

The next day he resolves to put his designe in execution, hee had acquainted Fairfax therewith, who perswades him by all meanes to desist; but he told him that seeing hee had promised to doe it, he would die in the enterprise, or performe it. Hereupon hee dismissed Fairfax, and having made choice of a void place betweene the Kings quarter, and the Constables, where there was neither trench nor guard, but some straggling Centinells. He set spurs to his horse, and made towards the towne, there were some horsemen pursued him, and the Centinells shot at him, and the towne did the like: but coming neere to one of the bulwarkes, hee waied with his hat vnto them, which caused them to forbear, and to come downe to a Posterne to let him in.

Fairfax having bene scene in his company, was presently laid hold on, and carried to the Kings quarter; where being examined, hee confessed that hee had knowne Hicks long, but was not acquainted with his intent; and that for his owne part he was a Gentleman belonging to the Lord Ambassadour, and was come onely in curiositie to see the Campe, which being verified, he was sent home with good vllage.

Hicks being come into the towne, was conducted by the Consuls to Monfieur de la Force, who knew him well. He delivers his Letters, and acquaints them with the estate of Rochell, which gaue them great content. He informes them with the estate of the Kings

A Kings Army: that the Duke de Mayen was lately slaine, that the Souldiers dyed daily of the purples and flux; and that if there should fall any store of raine they would not be able to lye there. He likewise told them there was a Myne ready to be blowne vp that night, and shewed them the place for the which they prepared. Having made a breach, they came to the assault, and were repulled with the losse of six hundred men. He staied three weekes in the Towne, during the which there were diuers enterprises. His desire was to returne to Rochell, telling them that his worke was yet but halfe done. Hee would take no letters with him: but onely a note from Monfieur de la Force, to witnesse that hee had bene there: onely they willed him to assure the Assembly, that they would neuer treat but for the generall of all the Churches, and if hee would haue any letters, they would signe them with their bloods. Hee takes the opportunity of a darke night (after diuers former attempts) and gets out on foot with a guide, creeping vpon their knees, vntill they had past the Kings Centinells, and came that night to Negropelisse, where he lay hidden in an old ruinous house all the next day. The next night hee came to Saint Antonia, being seuen good leagues from Montauban; where they began to wauer, and were ready to submit themselves: but hee having assured them of the estate of Montauban, they persisted. There they furnished him with a horse, from whence hee went to Castelnau, and visited Monfieur de la Force Ladie: which done, after some daies trauell he got to Marans; and from thence by sea, being seuen leagues, to Rochell, where he gaue an account of his employment, to their great contents.

On the foure and twentieth of October in the night, there happened a great fire vpon the Merchants Bridge at Paris, the which in three houres consumed both that and the Changers Bridge, so as the houses which were built vpon them fell into the riuer, to the vndoing of many men. They spake diuersly of the cause, some of the ignorant multitude would needs ascribe it to them of the religion; but it was more truly verified to be by the negligence of a maide in a Scribeuers house; The priuate losses vpon these two Bridges were very great, and many men vndone thereby: whereupon the Court of Parliament made a decree, whereby all Rogues and Vagabonds were banished the Citie. A generall gathering was made throughout all the Parishes, for the reliefe of such as had bene scorched by the fire. The Prouost and Sheriftes were enioyned to free the course of the Riuer, and draw out the materials. Men were appointed to looke for the goods in the bottome thereof, and to cary them to the Towne-house, there to be inventoried. That the poore Merchants who had lost their estates, should not bee fued for their debts for the space of one whole yeare.

The Duke of Rohan having no meanes to relieue Montauban by force, the Marquis of Maloze being defeated by the Duke of Angoulesme, he sent Beaufort with twelue hundred men to succour the Towne; who got to Saint Antonin, where hee was pressed to hasten his succours, else Montauban would be lost: whereupon he resolved to march by the plaine, coming about midnight neere vnto the towne, where there was a strong Batriado, guarded by three hundred men. They write of these twelue hundred, a third part entred into the Towne, and that the rest were slaine and taken prisoners, amongst the which were Beaufort that led them, and the Gouernor of Saint Antonin. But Master Hicks, who was then within the towne, reports confidently, that there entred seuen hundred men well armed. The day after this exploit, the Kings army was fortified with 60 or 70000 men, brought by the D. of Memoryency, the Marquis of Villeroy, and others.

On the eighth of October there was an enterview betwixt the Constable Luyne, and the Duke of Rohan, to aduise by what meanes they might conclude a peace, but there was great contrariety in their propositions. The Constable offered to treat particularly for the Duke of Rohan, and high Languedoc, and that Montauban should render to the Kings mercy. The D. of Rohan, as Generall of the Churches, desired to make a generall treaty for all the Townes of their party; the repairing of the demolished Townes, and 100000 crownes to pay his troops; which was thought an unreasonable demand: And so they departed, but all satisfied one with another.

On the ninth day of October, the Prince of Ioinville gaue an assault vnto the great Bastion of the old Towne, that he might lodge therein; but hee was repulled with some losse. And the next day, the Marshall of Themines, having blowne vp a myne in the halfe moone of the Bastion at Villebourbon, and lodged some souldiers thereupon: the night night following, the besieged issued out, cut the throats of them all; put to flight the first, A second and third guards of the Trenches, and came vnto the Marshalls Tent, filled a great part of their Trenches, burnt their Galleries, and the carriages of their Cannon; set fire on their powder, and caried away a Falcon.

A general assault.

Hauiug held the trenches six houres, in the end they were driuen out by Saint Croix, Barault, and Faucon, Camp-masters; whereof the last had his arme shot off, and died soone after. They write that in this fallie, there were twenty eight men of note or Officers slaine, with two hundred souldiers; and of the besieged but foure slaine, and two prisoners. This repulse did nothing daunt the Kings army, for on the seuenteenth of October they gaue a general assault at the three Batteries; where they were repulsed, but B with equall losses. There were two things afflicted the Kings Armie, sicknesse, and jealousies: and there followed a third, which was the onely hope of the besieged, which was raine, whereby the Riuer swelled.

The Earle of Suze taken by the Pefants of Grenoble.

At this time the King receiued an aduertisement that M. de Montbrun (who had beene made Lieutenant generall of Prouence, by the Assembly at Rochell) had revolted in Mure in Dauphiné, and that his troops being three or foure thousand strong spoiled the champion Countrie: That he had great enterprises vpon Grenoble; and that the Earle of Suze was taken and brought thither. This Earle had his chiefe abode in Champagne; But seeing how the affaires of them of the Religion declined in many Prouinces, he resolved to goe make warre in Dauphiné, being followed by some Gentlemen. Passing by C Griex, within a league of Grenoble, on the sixteenth of October to goe to Mure, the Country people growing jealous, demanded whither they went; the Earle answered they had nothing to doe, so as from words they fell to blowes, in which conflict there were three Pefants slaine, and six hurt, whereby the Earle had a free passage; after which they made what speed they could, yet knew not whither they went: in the end they came to a Village called S. Mury, where they intreated a Pefant to direct them their way, promising him foure pistols: the Pefant offered his seruice willingly; but hee willed his Boy to goe and aduertise the Commons, whilste he led them through the rocks of Marinette, where they were no sooner entred, but they were encountered by three or foure hundred Pefants, armed after their manner, who cried vnto them, S and deliuer your armes, else you are dead men. The Earle and his followers, seeing themselves in a place of such disadvantage, seeked to saue themselves; but the Earle of Suze, and some gentlemen to the number of twenty five were taken and caried to Grenoble. The Pefants pursued the rest, and tooke fourteene more, among the which there were found diuers letters to M. de Montbrun, with a plot of the Towne, and on which side they should assault it. The Pefants were rewarded with some money, and the horses and armes of them which were taken.

A second enterprise to seize vpon Grenoble.

This first enterprise against Grenoble being discovered, they within the towne which had intelligence with Montbrun plotted a second, but the meanes to aduertise him was very difficult: they must of necessity passe by Port de Clay, two leagues from Grenoble, E which was well guarded; Bouffier, an Aduocate in Parliament tooke the charge vpon him, and drew the instructions of the enterprise, who hauing giuen them to his Clerke to carie to Montbrun, and for the more safety he put him into a Wine-pipe, and laid it in a Cart, which passeth Clay without any discovery, hauing gone a quarter of a league further, the Carter beat out the head of the vessell, and the Clerke went his way towards Montbrun: he presently encounters with another Clerke his great companion and friend, who enquired of his journey, and he like a silly fellow discovered vnto him the enterprise, promising him mountaines if hee would make one. The other seemes to be glad, giues him great thanks, and promiseth to goe with him; entreating him to stay but halfe an houre vntill he had done some necessary businesse. In the meane time he runs speedily to Clay F to aduertise them which were in Guard, who post after and seize vpon the Clerke; they search him and finde his letters and instructions; and conduct him to Grenoble, where Bouffier his Master, and others were committed to prison: And thus the second enterprise was also discovered.

The enterprise of Grenoble discovered.

In the meane time Montbrun spoiled many Castles in the countrie of Diois, and the Mountaines of Dauphiné, threatening to come neere vnto Grenoble, which made the Parliament to giue order for the leauing of 6000 men for their defence. The Duke

d'Esquigues

A d'Esquigues being aduertised of these alterations, wrote this following letter; "M. de Montbrun, I haue beene aduertised that you haue armed in Dauphiné, and haue had some reproach, as if I were your Consort, the which hath much troubled me, both for that I desire there should not be any combustion in Dauphiné, or that they should feeble the commodities of warre; as also for the consequence of the fact. You know the King doth not take armes against the reformed religion, but doth onely pursue them which are revolted; else I would not assist nor giue my consent, being against my Conscience which I preferre aboue all things. It is most iust his Majesty should be master of his Townes, and that those which will not yeeld obedience willingly, he should force by his armes; otherwise he should be neither Master nor King, but euery one should make a party by himselfe; the which would proue to bee of a very dangerous consequence, by the which any raigene enemy (how weake soeuer) surprising vs in the heart of our diuisions, would make himselfe Master of the whole Realme. You know that strangers haue alwaies fought to diuide vs; and when they haue scene vs banded one against another, they haue then fallen vpon France and troubled vs, whereas they could neuer annoy vs being at vnity. There is nothing which makes a kingdom more powerful then peace and concord; but when as discord begins to creepe in, and euery one drawes his owne way, and will not heare the voice of the master Pilot; it is an euident signe of Shipwracke. I am not yet so ignorant in affaires of State, but I know how wee should cary our selues; and I cannot but tax our Ministers of great rashnesse in this conclusion which they haue taken in the assembly at Rochel, neither would I nor any good man giue his consent, being a meanes to ruine the State. I haue beene aduertised of the disaster which is befallen the Earle of Suze, and am sorry for it, although I am ignorant of his intention, or whereunto it tended. I pray you consider what you doe, and that you attempt nothing by armes which may be prejudiciall to the Kings seruice. But contrariwise, if you discouer any mines, employ your armes to suppress their insolency; or rather lay them quite downe to free the world from ialousie. I desire not that Dauphiné should bee oppressed, and you cannot entertaine your troops without discommodity to the people. For this cause I entreat you againe to disarme and to dismisse your forces: but, aboue all haue an especiall care not to attempt any thing against Grenoble, where they say you haue intelligences. I haue beene aduertised that there are certaine busie-headed people, who haue beene desirous to deliuer it vnto you, to the prejudice of the Kings seruice, and in fauour of Rebels, the which I abhorre. You know with what paines I haue preferred this Prouince, during the troubles; and now I desire it should not fall into the miseries whereunto others are subiect. Rebellion is a crime which cannot be exprest; and which drawes after it all kindes of calamities, the which I should bee loath to see in Dauphiné; and you cannot make your selfe Master of Grenoble but by apparant rebellion. And therefore I entreat you to leaue the affaires in the same estate they now are in, and that I may haue the contentment to heare you haue laid downe E armes, &c. From the Campe before Montauban the 13 of November 1621.

1621

The Duke of Esquigues letter to M. de Montbrun.

The Seigneur of Boisse Pardailan, being in the Kings armie before Montauban, an aduertisement came vnto his Majesty, that there were two thousand of the Religion in armes which spoiled the Country lying vpon the Riuer of Garonne and Dardonne, hauing their retreats into Monheur and Saint Foy; and that his Sonne and Sonne-in-law were the Leaders, whereupon the King said vnto de Boisse; These are yours, goe speedily and take such order as shall bee fit. Vpon this commandment hee leaues Montauban and enters Monheur before they had any intelligence of his coming, which made such as were in armes to leape ouer the walls to auoid his indignation. Thinking to haue assaulted Monheur, he passeth the riuer of Garonne, and goes towards S. Foy, where hee had left F Thouven his Sonne-in-law, who was revolted. He passed by Genac, where hee assembled the Consuls, and let them know the necessity of their obedience.

Montbrun and Saint Foy revolt.

At night Monseur de Boisse, being retired into an Aduocates house called Nauze, after Supper Sahgnac of Bessine, being followed by fortie Muskettiers, entred the lodging, finding Monseur de Boisse in a Gallery, who without any amazement leapt to his armes and cried out; Ah Traitors, will you murder me thus wretchedly? These assassins cried vnto the Iudge of Genac, and vnto Nauze to stand aside, and presently discharged fise and twenty Musket shot; and slew him with a Priest which was alwaies about about him. After this detestable murder, they threatned the Inhabitants of Genfay to burne all about the towne if they opened not their gates: but it is safe to force them, which are willing to be forced: so as seeing M. de Boffe dead, they opened their gates, and they became Masters of that place, the which did much fortifie Saint Foy. The Marquis of Mirebeau, sonne to the deceased, commanding in Monheur, declared himselfe presently for the revolted: they which had slaine his Father were kindly entertained into Saint Foy; and Monheur, which towne did much hinder the commerce between Bourdeaux and Thoulouse, and was likely to bee a bridle to the Kings Armie.

Diseases in the Kings Campe.

At Montauban they continued their batteries, and the besieged were still resolute: knowing the difcommodities of the Kings campe, and assuring themselves, that the abundance of raime which fell, would force them to rise; for intruth, the Campe was full of sicknesse, as fevers, bloody fluxes, purples, and other contagious diseases, whereof many men of quality died daily, besides an infinite number of souldiers. The Duke of Memorycy (who had brought goodly troopes to the Kings army) fell dangerously sicke, so as the Physitians despaired of his health: His troopes being lodged in the Duke of Ediguieres quarter, holding their Commander to be dead, three thousand went away in one night, whereby the quarter was left very bare, and those which remained were forced to be daily in guard, which caused great sicknesse in the regiment of the guards, and other troopes being ouer toyled. Many went away without leave and could not be staied. The mortality was great throughout the whole Campe, and the infection of the ayre dangerous for such as continued at the siege. They within the towne were not freed from the said miseries; many souldiers and inhabitants died of the plague, and poverty. These miseries which had wasted about a third part of the Kings army, greatly dishearted the Commanders and Souldiers, with the tediousnesse of the siege, during the which they had gotten little ground on the enemy. In the meane time the bad season of the yeare pressed them, and the continuall raime so annoyed their troopes, as they knew Montauban would not be taken that yeare; and that they should be forced to yeeld vnto the time. At the quarter of Ville Bourbon, where the Marshall de Themines commanded, the Regiment of Thoulouse went almost all away: and the other Regiments for the losses and sicknesse they had had, were not able to winter there, and stood in great neede of some ease of their continuall trauell in the trenches; whereupon those of the towne grew insolent, making many braudoes against the besiegers, inviting them to yeelde to Monsieur de Rohan, or Monsieur de la Force, and they would hold good quarter with them.

The newes therefore of the continuance of the warre in Dauphine by Monsieur de Montbrun, where the presence of Monsieur d'Ediguieres was very requisite for the peace of that Prouince, together with the important necessity of the regaining Monheur, which troubled the country vpon the River of Garonne, and all Guienne; and the continuall raime and ouerflowing of the River of Tarne, were the principall causes which moued his Maiesty; First, to goe and bessege Monheur. Secondly, to leaue six thousand men in the Townes, Castles, and Forts about Montauban; with five hundred horse to keepe the field, vnder the charge of M. de Saint Geran. And thirdly, to send backe Monsieur d'Ediguieres into Dauphine; and to make his grand Child the Earle of Sauli Lieutenant Generall in Dauphine, which for very important considerations was effected. Ande establish certain Imposts for three yeares at Valence, vpon all things which should be transported vpon or downe the River of Rofne, to furnish towards the charges of the siege of Poussin and of Bay, which since this war had hindred the trafficke both by water and land all along the said riuer.

The Constable's letter to D. of Mont.

About this time the Constable wrote a letter vnto the Duke of Montbazon, wherein he obserues the defects of the siege of Montauban in these termes; "Sir, I did assure you I would be the last at the siege of Montauban, which I haue not failed to perform, because this morning I made our retreat, and by the same means the review of our miserable troopes, which sicknesse and length of the siege had so wasted. Wee haue raised the siege, but not withdrawne our intent, and the affection wee haue at one time or other to ruine them, hauing reduced them to such estate as they cannot come out of their towne, but they must either be taken or slaine by our troopes which inuiron them, to the number of six thousand foot, and five hundred horse, composed of those new troopes which

A which arised here within these two dayes, and of some old Regiments which wee leaue to refresh and strengthen themselves. This is our misery, which although it touch all our army, yet hath it not taken downe our courage, as we will shortly shew them, if it please God. Wee were resolu'd to goe into Languedoc, but an accident hath happened, which hath diuerted our designe, the death of Monsieur de Boffe, who was murdered by his owne sonne, and his sonne in law; for he who slue him, is retired vnto them, and they are resolu'd, with two places which the King had by agreement entrusted them withall before the siege of Saint Iohn D'Angely. Vpon this accident the King had sent to inuest them; and after his Maiesties entry into Thoulouse, hee will goe and assaile Monheur, to chastise the elder sonne, who is in that towne, and hath declared himselfe against the King: of which I will aduertise you. This, Sir, is our misery, the which would much more afflict vs, if the deceased King (the greatest Captaine of elder times) had not many times assailed places of lesse strength, and yet beene forced to leaue them, and raise his sieges. And for vs, it is certaine he was neuer in the like extremity as we, who for the great sicknesse amongst vs, haue beene constrained to raise the siege of a towne which could not hold our twelue dayes longer, if we had had men; but the length of the siege had so wearied our Captaines, that in stead of encouraging the souldiers, they disheartned them. Four things haue ruined vs: the first was, The Duke of Mayen by his rashnesse made diuers assaults to no effect, and lost thereby a great number of Noblemen, Gentlemen, with many Captaines and souldiers, so as the rest of his troopes were vtterly discouraged, & went almost all away, what order fouer could be giuen: The amazement of his quarter gaue the enemy such heart, as they verily beleueed they could not be forced, and hindred them from treating, which else without doubt they would haue done. The second was the fault which the Duke of Angoulesmes troopes committed in suffering the succors to passe into the towne, which else had beene taken within foure dayes. The third was, the sicknesse of Monsieur de Montmorency, which caused three thousand men which he had brought with him to depart in one night, by which meanes the Duke d'Ediguieres quarter was ruined. The last and the greatest, was the great & intolerable sicknesse which spread it selfe vniuersally through all the campe, from which none hath beene free, the King excepted and my selfe, whom our good God hath preferred. You haue seene my Letter to Monsieur de Montmorency which shewed our miseries, the repetition whereof would be now too long; I dreame on the siege no longer, but thinke on what is to be done hereafter. You know the King hath so bridled these people, as they cannot escape; they shall haue no more libertie, no more commerce or trafficke, no labour or tillage, no meanes to victual their towne, seeing that round about them we haue placed strong Garisons (as you know) to cut them off if they issue forth. This is all I can say vnto you, the rest the bearer shall report. Assure you that I am with all the forces of my soule. Your most humble sonne, and obedient seruant, Luyner.

There were diuers things published notwithstanding, which made the Constable author of all the miseries of this siege, vnderaken out of leason, and contrary to the opinion of all the world. They taxed him, That he had not besseged it on all sides, as hee should haue done: That he had leauied much money vpon Edicts, loans, and impositions, and had brought much from Paris with conuoyes, with pretext to pay the souldiers, where hunger slew more then the enemy or sicknesse: That he caused six hundred men to labor daily at Leseny, as many at Quille-beuf, eight hundred at Amiens, five hundred at Cahis, two hundred at Luyner house, which they built at Paris, all after the rate of two shillings sterling per diem. Besides 1500 in garison at Amiens, for the guard of part of his treasure, and all vpon the Kings costs, whilst the poore souldiers before Montauban died of hunger, and had beene forced to abandon the army for want of pay. They taxed him with many things; First, with his absolute power in the government of the State, commanding the armies and Seales. Secondly, for the new Edicts which he would passe. Thirdly, for his carage in military actions. Fourthly, with his riches and sility, his Government. So as not only the common people of Thoulouse cursed him, but also men of qualitie complained: whereof a kinsman of his being at Thoulouse to aduance the Kings entry, aduertised him by Letter, to whom he made this answer.

Cousin, if I were a new Courtier, and that I were not accustomed to the continuall faults of slander, I would not so easily oppose my constancy to diuert it, and should not resolute to that patience which the knowledge of such actions giues me; but being intired

1621 "to these reproaches, I will continue in my zeale of well doing, and to heare my selfe ill A
 "spoken of: I woud not that you are touched with these detractions, seeing you have not
 "wherewithall to repell them as I haue, by that innocency wherein I haue liued. I heare
 "them with indifferency, this contagion infects me not, because I am armed with a coun-
 "terpoison, which is my sinceritie and my incomparable fidelitie, which marcheth in the "front of all my actions. You who heare but the thunder of the people, liue in apprehen"sion, although you can iudge better then any other, that my good intentions may wor"thily shelter me from such stormes. Let vs giue the vulgar leaue to talke, and those whose "idleness giues them leifure, to glosse vpon other mens actions. Hee that brought heresie
 "into the Realme, hath he not attempted against heauen? Wherefore those which haue no B "better foules, haue they not the like libertie to controll my actions, and that falsely? They "are men full of malice, and without fame, seeing they speake ill of the present euents, and
 "so easily forget what is past, which hath bene publicly applauded and held for miracles.
 "What haue we done to be so condemned? What ingratitude is it, that this towne should "forget the good hath bene done them, to haue taken many townes, which like Harpies
 "had their tallons ready to reare them in pieces? What more pretious thing could they "hope for, then the person of our King, and that of his Constable, and of all the Princes,
 "Officers of the Crowne, and many other men of quality, who haue caried some markes
 "of this siege, either by the hand of heauen, or by them of the towne. And although those "masters which glosse vpon our actions (who are continually in danger, and they secure C
 "their seats) shall it be lawfull for them to iudge vniufully of our carriage, and may we not
 "appeale from their passions, but must see our selues condemned? I am of opinion, that the "King should attend iustice from heauen, feeling wee fight for him who can discerne the "good from the bad.

"I will not stand to iustifie that which concerns the siege; our foresight for the vnder-
 "taking of it; our care and resolution in ordering all things necessary; our diligence in pre"ferring a continuall toile before rest, which they likewise speake so much would willingly
 "haue spared; and our resolution to expose our liues without consideration, but onely for
 "the Kings seruice, and the good of his Estate. To whom am I bound to giue any account
 "but vnto God, and the King? seeing I fight for none but for Religion and the State; all D
 "other considerations are indifferent. Whatsoeuer happens, I will neuer confesse any de"fect, seeing I am innocent before God, and know how to make those controllers silent;
 "nor will the Constables sword, but in letting them see that they haue beleueed too lightly
 "or iugmented too maliciously.

"Touching the euent of this siege, God will dispose at his pleasure, and I will doe my
 "dutie; assuring you that whatsoeuer happens, we will leaue such forces in this Prouince,
 "as they shall haue no cause to feare. We will leaue such forces about Montauban, as they
 "shall be more miserable in their imaginary liberty, then if they were in the Kings pro"tection. Let them of Thoulouse consider, that they are no proprietaries of their towne:
 "that the King is their soueraigne Lord, and hath the greatest interest in their preseruacion: E
 "His reputation is engaged; it is for the good of Languedoc: Let them giue vs leaue, for
 "in taxing men they daunt their courages, and in accusing them falsely, they take from them
 "all courage to doe them good: And if it were not in respect of the King, seeing them so ill
 "affected, I could make them know that they must hope for much from my care, and not "break with me, who am able to assist them powerfully, &c.

The King
 comes to Thoulouse.

"The King hauing raised his siege from before Montauban, hee went to make his entry
 "into Thoulouse, where he was receiued with great shewes and state: the particularities I "will leaue to the Originall. Coming thither, the Constable entertained the Court of "Parliament and the Capitouls of the towne with a goodly discourse touching the raising "of the Siege, and spake so plausibly vnto them, who had contriued their men, money, F
 "and cannon, to assist his Maiestie in this Siege, as he made them to allow of the Kings re"solution in retiring of his armie. He told them that it was for the best, assuring them, that "in the Spring the King would shew great effects of his power against his rebellious "enemies.

"During the Kings abode at Thoulouse, he was aduertised of a defeat of three thousand
 "of the Religion in the Countie of Foix, vho vnder the conduct of the Baron of Leran, "had attempted the towne of Varelles, into the vvhich the Seigneur of Urban had put
 "himselfe

A himselfe with his friends to defend it: but being fearfull of the Kings approach, and the Duke of Angoulesmes, with the light-horse, they raised their sieges, and retired their Cannon.

"They write, that in their retreat they were charged by the Barons of Aunoux and S.
 Chamant, and by Urban, who sallied out of the towne, and were wholly defeated, so as six hundred were slaine vpon the place, and many taken prisoners, amongst which was the Baron of Leran their Commander.

"The King vpon the first aduertisement of the reuel of Monheut, sent the Marshall of Roquelaure to iussell it; and presently after the raising of the siege of Montauban, he di-
 B patched Monsieur de Bassompierre with foure Regiments. The winter season made them apprehend a long siege, yet the souldiers laboured willingly, and vpon the Kings coming to the Campe, they recovered their countercarpe. They of Saint Foy fought to releue them. The King hearing that they of Saint Foy kept the field, he sent the Duke of Luxemburg with twelue hundred foot, foure hundred horse, and two Cannons, to charge them; but they retired and abandoned those petty places which they had taken. The King commanded the Marshall of Roquelaure to giue an assault to Monheut, but hee entreated his Maiestie to haue patience, assuring him that hee would soone bring them to submit themselves to his mercy.

"There were diuers batteries, mynes, and assaults, in the one of them the tenth of De-C cember, the Marquis of Themines, Marshall of the Campe, was shot through the left ankle, whereof he died within few dayes. He was much lamented for his valour, both by the King and the whole armie. The same day the Kings troops going to renew an assault, the Marquis of Mirambeau, eldest sonne to the Seigneur of Boisse, who had bene hurt in the cheeke in the beginning of the siege, shewed himselfe vpon the rampier with the Viscont of Casters, holding out their armes as if they meant to parle, and anon after came downe into the ditch, and spake with Monsieur de Montesson, whom the King had sent into that quarter: They offered to yeeld vp the towne and agree to any reasonable conditions; which being reported to his Maiestie, he sent them word they should render themselves to his mercy, and that he would not grant them any articles: yet towards evening the D King made a promise of life to the Gentlemen, yeelding at his discretion, and to the souldiers to march away with white stickes in their hands, as for the inhabitants, he would ad-uise what order should be taken with them.

"On the next day, his Maiestie hauing sent them a commandement what order they should obserue, they came forth of the towne; first the women and maids in boats, but some were obstinate and would needs stay behind, which afterwards perished, for the regiments got in disordredly at the breaches, spoiled the towne, & burnt it to the ground.
 The Marquis of Mirambeau was vnhorfed, his cloake taken from him, and so ill entreated, as but for the Marshall of Roquelaure he had not escaped: the Viscont of Casters was also detained. There came out of this towne 200 souldiers.

E "The fourteenth of December, and there dayes after the taking of Monheut, towards night, died the Constable Luyres of a pestilent feuer: he lay sicke some eight dayes, and drawing towards his end, was troubled with frequent convulsions, which left him not till his death, which bred great amazement in many, and gaue occasion vnto diuers to iudge thereof according to their passions. His body was presently opened, embalmed, and sent by water to Bourdeaux, and from thence to Tours.

"On his death-bed he besought the King to take his wife and children into his protection, which his Maiestie promised, and gaue assurance thereof vnto the Lady, by a comfortable Letter which he wrote vnto her at Paris: Thus this great man, who had as it were a foueraigne power ouer warre and peace, is wrapped vp in the bundell of the dead with F the common souldiers; all his honors could not adde one houre to his life, nor the Kings fauours purchase him any fauour with death.

"During the siege of Monheut, there were some insolencies committed by them of the Religion at Montpellier and other townes in Languedoc. They write, that they fortified the Churches and Couents in Montpellier, in the name of that Circle, to say Masse, &c. doe any act of the Romish Religion, whereof notice being giuen to the Capuchins, they would rather dye then desist willingly; so as they continued their exercises, but the doores being shut, and without the ringing of any bell, apprehending some tumult of the common people; yet afterwards they were forced to abandon their Church, so as in these combustions in Languedoc there were threecore and six Churches spoiled and beaten downe.

The same day that Monheur was taken, his Maieſty was aduertised that Royan had been deliuered to Monſieur de Souſſe, by means of the inhabitants; the caſtle was deliuered vnto him with this ſhamefull compoſition, That the Captaines brother, who was Lieutenant in the place, ſhould remaine Governor. Who comming ſoone after vnto the King, was deliuered into the Grand Prouoſts hands.

Ships belyd by
the Duke of Neuers.

Rochel, as you haue heard, was taken vp by land, by the Duke of Eſpernon and his troops. His Maieſties intent was to doe the like by ſea; for the effecting whereof, he had given order to the Duke of Neuers to cauſe ſiue goodly ſhips to be made, the which being rigged and made ready at Diepe, about the midft of October, and furniſhed with cannon and all things neceſſary, they ſet ſaile, but being vpon the coaſt of Britanie, they were diuided by a tempeſt; two of them were caſt vpon the coaſt of England, and the other three anchored vnder Bel-Iſle. In Nouember, ſaying towards the Iſle of Re, they were encountered by tenne Rochellers, who ſuncke one,ooke another, and the third fled to Brouage.

The Kings
my put into garion.

His Maieſty hauing reſolued to returne to Paris, and to put his army during the winter into garriſon, in the townes of Guienne, to keepe Saint Foy in awe; hee gaue the charge thereof to the Duke of Elbeuf; the long ſiege of Montauban had cauſed Monſieur de Montbrun to reuiue his deſignes in Dauphiné, and to make vie of his Commiſſion which hee had from the Aſſembly at Rochel, hoping to make himſelfe as great a man as his father had formerly beene. The pretext of their taking armes, was the burning of the Temple at Charenton; and for that it was giuen out, they had murdered diuers of them of the Religion at Paris. The Eſtate of Dauphiné was very confuſed, where the ſouldiers on either ſide committed a thouſand inſolencies: the people cried out; the paſſages were not ſafe; Grenoble fearing ſurprizes, fortified it ſelfe; the inhabitants were burthened with great guards; the gates were barricaded both within and without; and no man durſt ſpeake his mind freely, nor tell of which party he was.

The Duke
D'Esquigues
returns into Dauphiné.

The Duke D'Esquigues ariued in the beginning of December: his returne freed the inhabitants of Grenoble from their feare, and reſtified Monſieurs troops; hauing diſmiſſed moſt of the companies which had beene leauied by commiſſion, hee freed the country from the oppreſſion of ſouldiers. Monſieur and thoſe of his party aſſembled ſoone after at Die, and ſent the Seigneur of Champoleon to the Duke, who would not heare him, ſending them word that he would not receiue any one of their partie before they had ſent him a Declaration and promiſe to diſarme, and to ſubmit themſelues to the Kings ſeruiſe vnder the benefit of the Edicts: which hauing done, he cauſed this following order to be publiſhed, for the ſecuring of a peace in Dauphiné.

A Declaration
made by the D.
D'Esquigues
concerning theſe o the Religion.

Hauing carefully laboured ſince our returne into this Prouince to maintain the Kings Authority, reſtraine all diſorders, and giue peace vnto his Maieſties ſubiects; hauing heard the Deputies of them of the Religion aſſembled at Die, and receiued their proteſtations of fidelity and obedience to the Kings ſeruiſe, and not to adhere to any delignes or intelligences, to the preiudice of his Maieſtie, and the good of his Eſtate: knowing that his Maieſties intention is, to ſuffer all them to enioy the benefit of his Edicts, which make themſelues worthy of his fauour: We charge and command all Captaines and Commanders of horſe and foot, to diſmiſſe their troops within eight dayes after the date hereof, and to retire vnto their houſes, and not to commit any act of hoſtility or exaction, vpon paine of death.

He alſo ordained, that all priſoners taken by them ſhould bee preſently ſet at liberty without ranſome, neither ſhould they be ſlayed for their charges, which hee would take after their enlargement: That all places and Caſtles taken by their party, ſhall be reſtored to the proprietaries; and the new fortifications demoliſhed. In yeelding this obedience, they ſhall not be moleſted nor diſquieted for any thing that hath happened during the ſaid alterations: the which ſhall be ſuppreſſed as if they had neuer beene, taking all the Commanders, Captaines, and Souldiers, with their goods and families into the Kings protection and his. Forbidding all men of what eſtate ſoeuer, to attempt any thing againſt their

A their perſons and goods, vnder pretext of iniuſtice or otherwiſe, notwithstanding any decree made to the contrarie, the which ſhall be without effect: and to ſuffer them to liue quietly in their houſes and in the poſſeſſion of their goods, charges, and honors, with free libertie to goe, come, and ſtay, in all places whither their affairs ſhall call them, &c.

Within three dayes after, the Earle of Saulx, grand-child to the Duke D'Esquigues made his entrie into Grenoble as the Kings Lieutenant General in Dauphiné. The Seigneur de Montbrun alſo diſarmed and retired vnto his houſe. About this time the Duke cauſed his armie to march towards Valentinois to goe to beſiege Pouzin and Bay, to cleare the Riuier of Roſne, and free the commerce which theſe two places had hindred ſince the month of May laſt. The next year will ſhew vs the ſucceſſe of theſe enterpriſes.

The newes of this peace in Dauphiné was very pleaſing vnto the King: all the world did greatly extoll the Duke D'Esquigues, giuing him the title of the Kings moſt faithfull ſeruant.

The King hauing diſpoſed of his army in Guienne, he returned to Paris about the end of Ianuarie, where the inhabitants receiued him with great content (being twelve thouſand of them richly appointed in their armes) a league without the towne. The Deputies of Rouen came to Court, to be ſuters vnto his Maieſtie for the razing of the Fort of Quillebeuf; hee preſented them with a royall bounty: I know well (ſaid hee) what you would demand, you deſire to haue Quillebeuf razed, I tell you I haue reſolued not onely to ruine the fortifications of Quillebeuf, but of all thoſe petty places within my Realme which are not on the frontiers; ſo in ſtead of Petition, the Deputies beganne their ſpeech with thanks for this bounty, and ended it with vowes and prayers for his proſperity.

The ordinary Aſſembly for the accompts of the Clergy had beene held at Paris in Iune, from whence it was transferred to Bourdeaux. The King deputed the Seigneurs of Vie and Houſay Councillors of State, vnto them, to acquaint them with the eſtate of his affaires, which had neede to be ſpeedily relieved with money from the Clergy. Vpon their propoſition the Aſſembly reſolued to aſſiſt his Maieſtie with a million of crownes, to be onely employed in the ſiege of Rochel.

The Aſſembly hauing deputed certaine of them to make this offer vnto the King, the Biſhop of Rennes made this ſpeech, being aſſiſted by the Cardinals of Retz and La Valette, and the chiefe Prelates of the ſaid Aſſembly.

Remonſtrance of the Clergy vnto the King.

SIR, as the preſent miſeries cauſe vnſpeakable griefe, being accompanied with the remembrance of former felicities: ſo the ioy of proſperitie and happy ſucceſſe, hath not any more liuely feeling then that of calamities endured when all object of ſorrow is taken away.

The griefe and heauineſſe of the French Church was great, ſeeing the ancient and true Religion oppreſſed, her luſtre blemiſhed and deſaced, and her libertie captiued in many places of this kingdome.

But now, that heauen (fauourable to her vowes) hath reſtored the greateſt part of that which force and violence had wreſted from her, and our miſerie beginning to change into happineſſe, we alſo change our feares into hopes, our ſighes into ſongs, and our complaints into praifes, yeelding infinite thanks vnto his diuine bounty, for the particular care he hath had of this Monarchy, giuing vs a powerfull King, to maintaine the beauty and dignity of the Church.

It is you, Sir, that changeth our mournfull accents into acclamations of ioy, by the great advantage and good, wee beegine to reape by your piety and the ſucceſſe of your armes: So next vnto GOD, wee wholly conſecrate our praifes to your vertues.

You daily raiſe vp the Altars which Heretic had trodden vnder foot, vpon the which they now renew the ancient and true ſacrifices of reconciliation and peace. You diſperſe all the feares and apprehenſions which did enuiron vs. Feare. hab

Preparations

The King returnes to Paris.

An aſſembly of the Clergy.

"no more abiding in our foules, and expecting the full enjoying of peace and safetie which "your labours promise vs, we will bleſſe your name, and praife your generous actions which "cannot be enough worthily praifed.

"Let the ancient Hiſtories of the Hebrews extoll their King who beganne to raigne
"at eight yeares, and in the twelfth of his reigne undertooke to chaſe away Idolatry, which "his predeceſſors had ſuffered; the which he performed in foure yeares: but we will ex-
"alt our Auſpurn about him. It is true, Sir, that you had one yeare more then this young "King; when you tooke in hand the nobleſt Scepter of the earth. But you have exceeded
"him in zeale towards God, hauing not attended vntill the twelfth yeare of your reigne
"to ſuppreſſe irreligion and reuolt which are ſiſters, and go hand in hand; ſo we expect this
"grace from heauen, that in leſſe then foure yeares we ſhall ſee the time, when as God
"ſhall be ſerued and honoured by all your ſubiects without diuiſion, as he is indiuiſible and
"alwayes like vnto himſelfe: That hee ſhall bee called vpon with one heart and beliefe
"throughout your Realme, whoſe bounds hee will vndoubtedly enlarge, ſeeing the paine "and care you take daily to encreaſe his ſeruite.

"Hauing dilated much vpon the Kings zeale and piety, hee complains of many out-
"rages (as they pretend) done vnto the Clergy by them of the Reformed Religion, and "animates the King to continue his deſigne of proteſting armes againſt them, ſeeing it "tends onely, (ſaith he) to repell the iniuries done to God and your Maieſtie, the which be"ing ſuffered, will entertaine a Chaos and conſuſion in your Realme: for where order, re-
"ſpect, and the lawes are violated, it is impoſſible the Eſtate ſhould be quiet and happy: and "ſeeing that matters are reduced to that paſſe, as their obſtinate error cannot endure the "King and the authority of the Church; nor their fellony the yoke of obedience which is "due vnto you; what can you doe better, Sir, then to take the rod of Iron to puniſh theſe
"traitors, who deſire rather to lye in toille, then to be governed in peace; who conuert all "your fauour into poiſon, and grow more bitter by the effects of your bounty. Sir, wee
"deſire not warre, but peace: the God whom we preach daily, is a God of peace and not
"of diſſention; we muſt imitate him in the ſame ſpirit, and demand it of him inceſſantly, as "the chiefe point of felicity.

"But to enjoy a good peace, you muſt ſometimes cement it with warre, the which be"ing juſtly vnderaken, although it draw after it ruines, ſpoiles, and loſſes, yet is it much "better then a bad peace; for God who is a juſt Iudge, doth alwayes giue a happy end to
"a war well grounded. But there was neuer any more juſt then yours, ſeeing it tends onely
"to haue that reſtored vnto God and your Maieſtie, which is due vnto you within your "Realme. It were therefore a crime to ſuſſerne, that any rebellious deſigne ſhall bee able "to trouble or change your proſperitie and victories. The meanes to make them perfect
"and abſolute, is continually to beat and trample vpon this vngatefull, which preſumes to
"riſe vp againſt you.

"And for the greater aſſurance, as the Prophet Eliſeus did ſet his hand vnto the Kings
"to giue ſtrength vnto his bow, elſe the arrow hee ſhot had bene of ſmall force; ſo, Sir,
"the Church muſt ſet her hands to yours, and aſſiſt you to get an abſolute victorie ouer
"your enemies; the muſt accompanie your armes with her continuall prayers; and as it
"fortifies your deſigne by a common aide, ſo the honor of the Church, muſt be a faithfull
"director to your forces.

"And for as much as in an occaſion ſo much importing the honor of God, the health of "foules committed vnto vs, and the tranquillitie of this Eſtate, whereof wee hold the firſt
"rancke; it ſhould be very vniſmely to ſee your Maieſtie expoſed daily vnto danger, and all
"the orders of France, to contribute their liues, counſels, and meanes, to the hazard and "extraordinarie charges of this warre, and wee to remaine ſecure in our houſes, and to "honor vp thoſe goods which ſhould be employed for the ſeruite of God whereunto they "were firſt conſecrated.

"To this end, Sir, the Deputies of the Clergie of France, conſidering the eſtate of your
"preſent affaires, have given vs in charge to preſent vnto your Maieſty a Million of Crowns
"which wee offer vnto the perfecting of this maſter-piece, ſo gloriously begonne by you:
"and particularly for the ſiege of Rochel, to the end, that as it hath bene the head of re"bellion, ſo alſo let it be the end.

And

A And as the diuine bountie doth often heare the vowes and prayers which are made
"vnto him when his Altars are couered with offerings; ſo we humbly beſeech your Ma-
"ieſtie to take in good part two humble Petitions wee offer vnto you: Firſt, Sir, That it "would pleaſe you to maintaine vs in our ancient rights, priuiledges, and immunities, and
"aſſiſt vs with your authority and conſent, for the enioying of that which belongs vnto vs
"be it fees, or Caſtles, or ſtrong places, for the which wee have taken the oath of fidelitie
"vnto you: And withall not to ſuffer any exerciſe of the Reformed Religion in our lands
"and Iuriſdictions, remembering that if we hold them of your Maieſty, you alſo hold them
"from God, who ought to be more particularly honoured and ſerued in thoſe places then
"in any other, ſeeing they have bene given vnto the Church; for expiation of offences "committed. The other Petition, Sir, is; That you would not calme this ſtorme by the "ſame meanes they haue done in former times; when they ſhare the rights of heauen with "thoſe of the earth: when they balance feare, humane conſiderations and reaſons, with "the power and aſſiſtance of heauen: when they meaſure the honour of God with private
"interſt, whatſoeuer they build thereupon, is as variable and inconstant as the foundation;
"which is the world: and euerie Edict which diuides the faith, diuides alſo Kingdomes.
"This peace is no peace, but remaines onely the name: It is a miſchiefe painted ouer with a "ſhew of good. We ſeek not to deprive the effects of your clemency towards private
"men, who touched with a true repentance, haue recourſe vnto your bounty, as to an affi-
"red Sanctuary, knowing that ſo great a Monarch is better pleaſed to ſaue and pardon his "ſubiects, then to ruine them: but all theſe aduantages which haue bene given them; by "the general Edicts of pacification, haue made them more obſtinate to maintaine their "errors againſt God, and their rebellion againſt you: They haue often ſubmitted themſelues
"vnto the yoke, and often ſhaken it off againe, which be markes of their infidelity and our "weakneſſe. Neither doe we pretend to root out their error by force and violence, ac"knowledging the liberty which is engrauen naturally in the ſoule of man: That what is "brought in by force is of no continuance; much leſſe of merit for faith, which ſhould be "free and inſinuated mildly by diuine inſpiration, by patience, remonſtrance, and all ſorts
"of good example; which bee the armes wee pretend to vie, to bring them vnto the true
"Religion.

C But for your part, Sir, as the cauſes and root of a miſchiefe being knowne, they muſt
"be cut off and the courſe ſtayed: ſo your Maieſtie hauing ſcene by effect, that the places of "ſurety, which they held not by Edict, but by a ſimple Briſfe, whereof the terme is expired,
"haue ſerued to no other end but to entertaine an open faction of diſobedience, and to pra-
"ctiſe all kind of rigours againſt the Clergy and Catholiques. Wherefore we humbly be"ſeech your Maieſty to cauſe them to bee demolithed, when God ſhall deliuer them into "your hands, as you haue begonne; and if any be preferred, that the Catholiques may be "the ſtronger, from whom they may expect all favourable ſlage.

E In the end he concludes in theſe words: God grant, Sir, that the Rebels of your Realme
"ſeeing themſelues deprived of Forts and Rampiers, and of meanes to doe euill, may bee
"conuerced to the Catholique Faith, and to the obedience which they owe you. God
"grant, that ſuch as continue obſtinate, may flye ſpeedily to your mercie; or continuing in "their malice, may be a prey to your Maieſties armes, and their memorie perpetually ac"cuſt, &c. This was the ſubſtance of the Biſhops long ſpeech.

The Aſſembly at Niſmes for the Circle of baſe Languedoc, had (as you haue heard)
"made an act for the diſmiſſion of Monſieur de Chaſſillon from his charge; and called the "Duke of Rohan to be General of their Churches, and of the Prouince, in his place,
"who likewiſe cauſed an Apologie to be publiſhed in his defence againſt their crimi-
"nations.

F The D. D'Esquigneres (who after the ſiege of Montauban was retired into Dauphiné
"to pacifie thoſe troubles) was aduiſed to ſend ſome man of authority and of the reformed
"Religion to the Duke of Rohan at Montpellier, to repreſent vnto him the miſeries which "the continuation of theſe warres, would bring to the general of their Religion; and "that a peace would be more expedient for them, and would quench the exceſſe of "the peoples fury in the three townes of Montpellier, Niſmes, and Vze:

Monſieur du Cros, a Preſident in the Parliament of Dauphiné (who during the reigne

1621

The Duke of Rohan answer to his

chaſed great credit and reputation amongſt them of his Religion) was entreated by the Duke D'Eſdiguiers to performe this good office, and to goe vnto the Duke of Rohan to acquaint him with the meanes to attaine to ſome treaty of an affured peace. This Preſident comes to Montpellier, and is well received by the Duke of Rohan, who heard him willingly, and made him this answer, That he had with griefe ſeene the infolencies which had bene committed in baſe Languedoc: but thoſe people touched with a feeling of that which their brethren throughout all Europe ſuffered, were growne thus bitter: That hee would labour by all meanes to reſtrain their exceſſe: And as for himſelfe, whenſoeuer any occaſion were offered to make knowne his fidelitie and obedience to his Maieſtie, to whom he had the honor to be allied, the ſeruiſe of God excepted, he would ſhew all dutie and due reſpect.

The Deputies of the Circle and their Partifans, grew wonderfully ieaſous of the Preſidents coming, and of his conference with Monſieur de Rohan: They preſently bruite it abroad, that he was come to Montpellier, to perſwade the Duke of Rohan to abandon them, and to deprive them of their Commanders and Leaders; That they muſt free themſelves of him, and make him an example for all others to attempt the like.

They which had conſpired this Preſidents death, fearing their deſigne might be diſcovered, and ſo diuerted by the Duke, reſolued to execute it inſtantly, ſending one to ſalute him on the behalfe of the towne, to let him vnderſtand that the chiefe Burgeſſes deſired to doe their duties.

The Preſident hauing received him with all courteſie, ſaid, That if they did him the honor to come they ſhould be welcome. This ſpy being returned to them which ſent him, about forty of them entred ſuddenly into the Preſidents lodging, where one of them like a mad man, for the beginning of his ſalutation, ſayd vnto him; Traytor, committe thou to withdraw the Duke from vs: who at this day is the onely protector of the faithfull, ſeeking our ruine with that goodly D'Eſdiguiers who hath ſought the overthrow of our Religion in France: if we had him here, we would make him feele the reward of his deſerts as well as your ſelfe. The Preſident making offer to answer, one preſently ſtopped his diſcourſe, thruſting him into the bodie, wherewith hee fell downe, yet not dead, but they preſently diſpatched him, giuing him fifteene or twenty wounds, which done they diſt ſhut his ſeruants into the houſe, and retired themſelves.

The Duke of Rohan (who had entered ioyfully into the Towne) was ſo much diſpleaſed at this action, committed during his abode there, as he was forced to take his bed being ſicke with very griefe for ſo barbarous an act, committed vpon the perſon of a Deputy of ſo high a qualitie, and ſent from a Nobleman to whom they were infinitely bound.

This popular fury being ſomewhat cooled, and thoſe which had been leaſt irraged, and were moſt capable of reaſon, and counſaile, to pacifie the Duke of Rohan, who demanded iuſtice for this act, and to giue ſome forme of ſatisfaction to the King, and the Duke D'Eſdiguiers, ſeized vpon foure of theſe murderers, who were preſently executed; E yet ſome write that the chiefe authors and moſt culpable eſcaped.

The King was much incenſed at this murder, committed contrarie to the Law of Nations, vowing to doe exemplarie iuſtice. The Duke D'Eſdiguiers knowing the danger of a great Kings indignation, whoſe grace and clemencie is neglected, writes vnto the reuolued of Languedoc, Montauban, Guienne, and Rochel, conjuring them by the loue and zeale which he hath vnto their ſafety, to expiate their crimes and reuolt, by their prompt reſolution vnto obedience, in theſe tearmes.

My maſters, my name it may be will be ſuſpected, as not hauing bene acceſſarie vnto the ſame reuolts, vnto which your rebellion hath plunged you within theſe eightene months; yet the affection which I haue euer borne you, and the care I haue had of you theſe fifty yeares, may chance to adde ſome force to my remonſtrances, which ayme at nothing but the good of you and your affaires.

You know how much I haue bene offended with the murder of Monſieur du Cret, who was ſo traiterouſly viſed at Montpellier. You cannot be ignorant how much his death hath grieved me, ſeeing a man whom I much honoured and held in great eſteeme to be ſo cruelly ſlaine. Yet hath not all this ſo much enflamed me, but the affection on which I beare you hath left ſome tendernesse of heart in me, to giue you ſuch counſell

A as one friend may giue vnto another whom he loueth. It is not at this preſent that you haue made prooffe of my frienſhip; the happy raigne of Henry the Great doth ſay the admirable markes thereof. I made the ſame remonſtrances vnto you the laſt yeare; hoping to put a bit into the mouth of the headstrong horſe of reuolt; which hath gotten looſe amongſt you.

You haue ſeene with what griefe and compaſſion, I haue beheld your Townes ruined by this error; & how much more expedient leſſers for you, to open your gates vnto this great King, whoſe iuſtice giues life vnto his courage, then to attend the furie of his choller, which will not be pacified but with the teares of ſuch as ioyne in ſatisfaction with you.

B haue employed my ſelfe many times to procure you a peace; but the iuſtice of his Maieſties armes; the authoritie which he hath ouer thoſe townes; the power of his arme; and in briefe, his iuſt demands haue as often ſhut my mouth, as my tongue hath been ready to ſpeake thereof vnto him. Every man knowes, that the King will in no wiſe trouble the peace of our Churches; or meddle with our conſciences: but his iuſtice would be ſatisfied for many indignities, and murdres which haue bene committed amongſt you. For as hee is a moſt iuſt King, ſo will he haue equitie in equall regard throughout his dominions; and his glorious name admiſſes him not to make any compoſition with inferiours; nor is there any Nation ſo barbarous in all the world, which approue your leauing of armes againſt your moſt lawfull Prince.

C In doing any part, if the memory of mee be of any eſteeme amongſt you; and if the good offices which I haue performed on your behalfe, be not altogether buried in obliuion, I doe againe compeſſe and beſeech you to depart from your partialities, and to follow the aduice of him who is and euer hath been moſt affectionate vnto you. A ſubiect can neuer humble himſelfe ſo much vnto his Prince, both diuine and humane lawes require it: your Maieſties ſhould miſte you, better late then neuer. The King is ſo milde, as your leaſt ſubmiſſion will make him pardon your offences. He is a Lyon in courage, who ſeeing his enemy at his feet ready to ſubtriue himſelfe, he toucheth him not; but if he growes obſtinate he knows how to breake all his practices, to the prejudice of his enemies. You ſhould be well aduiled, and not attend him before your townes to offer an entry. The honour

D you ſhall haue in ſubmitting your ſelves, ſhall be the greater, the more ſpeedy it is. There peruation a ſubiect may get, when he murines againſt his Prince, is greater when he humbles himſelfe generouſly, and ſubdues his owne pride, then to conteſt againſt his King. If the Kings clemencie and bounty be not capable to bring you into the right way, and that this naturall piety be not ſufficient to reduce his obſtinate ſubiects to his ſeruiſe: yet let his powerfull armes (which are already ſaine vpon you) moue you. Let his great authoritie; his generous troopes, and his glorious ſcepter, be as an adamant to draw your iron hearts to his ſeruiſe.

Conſider, I pray you, & remember, what this inuincible King hath done this laſt yeare againſt you: what townes and places he hath taken from you, and apprehend the furie of his armes. The clouds of diſcord will in the end diſſolve to your prejudice, and theſe miſts of rebellion will be diſperſed by the heate of a Sunne, I meane of Leuis the iuſt, who hath alwayes bene our Protector, when we haue humbled our ſelves at his feet.

You cannot deny but you are his ſubiects: you and I and all Frenchmen owe him tribute and obedience. It is one of Gods commandments, and we muſt honour his Prince, and not conteſt againſt his will. Whitherto you haue made ſhew of rebellion, now make it known that you are his Maieſties good ſeruants, and wipe out this blemiſh of your inſamy by a voluntarie ſubmiſſion, you ſhall get more by mildneſſe then by force. You haue no occasion of diſcontent: for ſince the Kings coming to the crowne, what priuiledges or immunities hath he denied or aboliſhed? Nay, hath he not increaſed and augmented them by new Edicts in our fauour. You haue vnderſtanden this warre, vpon a faſe Title, and there is no man that hath any zeale to his Maieſties ſeruiſe, but diſaduoues your rebellion: and they which conuerſe dayly with you, condemne your reuolts, as capital crimes, contrarie to all diuine, naturall and humane lawes.

Many diſſiduous perſons, who haue no other deſire but to breed confuſion, and to trouble the ſtate, are crept in amongſt you, whoſe abſence ſhould be as much deſired, as their preſence ſeemes to promiſe you fauour, and ſeek to animate you againſt the King, to the dize going and coming vpon the Riuer of Garonne, which they could neuer yet easily doe, for the largenesse of the riuer being three leagues, which caused many vessels to escape often. Secondly, to augment the laid Imposts, and to gather there the part promised to the Seigneur of Soubise distinguished from that of the Assembly, which they called of the cause and of the towne of Rochel. Thirdly, to keepe them from carying of any graine to Bourdeaux; and fourthly, to hinder the commerce of Medoc, and Xaintonge with Bourdeaux.

The second descent should be at Soulac, situated at the point on Medoc side, opposite to Royan, the which had also diuers ends. First, they should build a Fort, and land good numbers of foot and horse, to runne vnto the gates of Bourdeaux, and annoy them by all acts of hostilitie, it being but fifteene leagues from Soulac, the country being plaine and of easie access. Secondly, to entertaine their intelligences with them of their party, as well in the champion countrie of Gascoigne, as in Bearie, there being no Riuer nor Towne vpon the way to hinder their succours. Thirdly, to furnish Royan, Rochel, and their Navy at Sea with fresh meat, the countrie about Soulac being full of cattell. And fourthly, to haue commoditie for their ships which lay before Royan, to Anchor by Soulac, when contrarie winde should driue them from Royan.

The party of the Religion did also hold Boy vpon Bay, and Poasin vpon the riuer of Roſne, where no merchandise could passe without paying the imposts according to the taxes which they had set. So as they made an account, that of the imposts which they should raise vpon all merchandise coming and going vpon the Loire & Garonne, or the Roſne, of the contributions of the open Country, of the prizes taken at Sea, of the reuenues of the Church, and of the sale of the goods of those of their party which were retired into the Kings towne, to be able to defray more then 2000 souldiers which they entertained in their fleet, in the field, and in their garisons in diuers Prouinces; and without to find the King so much businesse, as they should be constrained to make peace with them at their pleasure.

This was the estate of them of the Reformed party, in the beginning of this yeare. Let vs now see the successe of so many enterprises one after another, and the order which the King, his officers, and Lieutenants tooke to hinder the execution of their designs.

Descent of the Rochellers in the Ile of Argenton.

On the 22 of January 1622, the Rochellers made their descent in the Ile of Argenton, which was onely for pasture and vnihabited, where they beganne to build a Fort with foure bastions, and furnished it with Ordnance, which they might easily doe, being masters of the Riuer and of the Sea, the King hauing no ships armed, but such as were kept in at Brouage.

Monsieur de Gourgues first President at Bourdeaux, being aduertised of this descent and building of a Fort, and of the spoiles which Monsieur de la Forges troops committed vpon the riuers of L' Isle and Dordone, seeing Guienne without a Gouverneur since the decesse of the Duke of Mayenne, and without a Lieutenant General, the Marshall of Raquelaur hauing deliuered vp his charge vnto the King; and the Marshall Themines being not yet settled: he propounded in Parliament to arme the people of the Champion country as well in Medoc, as throughout all Bourdelois for their defence; and to send two Councillors to Libourne to leauy two thousand men, with the which they should assist the Duke of Elbeuf at the siege of Moutrauel. And likewise to raise foure or fve hundred foot or more, to hinder the enterprise of the Rochellers within the Riuer, and to rigge outcome ships. For the performing of which charge, they should gather certaine Loanes, and establish a Councell vpon all occurrents: That they should disarme them of the Religion within the Towne, thereby to free the people from all ielousie of them: That they should prouide Munition, and Graine, and assure their Ports and Walls.

An order made by the Parliament of Bourdeaux to resist
them of the Religion.

Defence of Monsieur de Fauas
at Soulac.

Monsieur de Fauas landed with his foot, horse, and Artillerie, at Soulac, on the fifth of February. Hee tooke the Borough suddenly, and besieged the Church, the which yielded within foure and twenty houres, hauing promised the inhabitants to preferre their liues and goods. Hee hoped to be reuenged vpon Bourdelois, but especially vpon the countrie Houses of them of the Parliament, who by a Decree the yeare before, had condemned him to lose his head; declared him ignoble, and his goods confiscate.

A The very day of this descent, the first President sent Captaine La Salle with his company of foot to the Ile of Calaus, whereof if the Rochellers had seized, as they might easily haue done, they had cut off all commerce betweene the towne of Bourdeaux and Medoc, Xaintonge, Blay, Bourg, and the riuer of Dordone; and had reduced it to great extremity. La Salle had commission to leauy threecore men for the guard of the Ile, and the building of a Fort: and to march with threecore of the ablest to Soulac, to relieue them which were in the Church; or if it were yeelded, to ioyne with the people of the country. La Salle leauies the building of the Fort to two of his brethren, and comes to Leparre the onely Towne of Medoc, where he heares of the yeelding of Soulac, and finds the inhabitants of Leparre and thereabouts so amazed, as they began to cary away their goods, thinking they should neuer be able to defend their towne nor Castle: but he reassures them, and breaks some Bridges, ouer which their enemies in this season were to passe to come towards Leparre and Bourdeaux, making Forts and placing guards vpon certaine passages.

Soone after, the Seigneur Dornano Saint Croix (chosen by the Parliament to command the troops) attending the leauying of more forces, came to Leparre, and within a while were to the number of fve hundred foot, which staid the course of Monsieur de Fauas, and in diuers encounters slue and tooke many of their enemies. Fauas for his part caused all the people neare to Soulac, to worke about the building of a Fort neare vnto the Church.

C Hee pillaged and burnt the houses betweene Soulac and Leparre; put garlison into the Church of Grayan, vſing the aduantage of his horse in the plaine Country vpon the foot Companies of Bourdelois; which being reported vnto the Parliament, they giue order for the leauying of a Company of forty light horse, with the which the Seigneur Dornano arrives at Leparre on the two and twentieth of March, and on the three and twentieth (before Fauas knew he had any company of horse) he parted in the euening, and by breake of day came within a mile of Soulac, where he forthwith the Bourrough, slue about thirtie Souldiers, and tooke sixteene; after which they retired with their booty to Leparre, being fve leagues off. Fauas much incensed at this affront, resolues to be reuenged, and entreates the Baron of Saint Seuerin, commanding in Royan, to come and assist him;

Dornano charged the Rochellers in Soulac.

D who brought a hundred good men to Soulac on the last of March; hauing also drawne some of their best souldiers out of their Ships, he came with forty horse, fve hundred foot, and one peece of Ordnance to Saint Viuen, where two companies of their enemies were carelesly lodged, with weake barricadoes. As soone as they perceived the Rochellers, La Salle issued with thirty Muskettiers and begins the skirmish: the Rochellers so follow the charge, as they get into the towne, and discharge their artillery, so as the enemy is much endamaged, and La Salle hurt. But the north wind caused them of Leparre three leagues off, to heare this Combate, so as Dornano gets speedily to horse, and with twelue voluntaries, and his light horse comes to Saint Viuen, charged threecore Muskettiers at ten paces distance, who slue diuers of his horse, but were themselves all slaine; and the fight continuing, Fauas and S. Seuerin in the end retired with the losse of 125 of theirs, and but few of their enemies.

Fauas routed the Saint Viuen.

E After this rout at Saint Viuen, Dornano returned to Bourdeaux, where letting them vnderstand that he could not besiege the Church of Soulac with lesse then a thousand or twelue hundred foot, fifty light horse, a company of Harguebussiers on horsebacke, and two Peeeces of artillery, as well to inuest and force the besieged as to prevent all succours from Rochel and Royan. Afterwards Fauas, seeing no great successe of his enterprises as the assembly of Rochel hoped; and that Monsieur de Soubise had but bad fortune in the Ile of Rie, as shall be said hereafter, he brake his Fort of Soulac, to guard the Church onely, made a truce with the first President and Dornano, and after retired himselfe F to Rochel.

One of the principall designs of the Assembly of Rochel in procuring this descent at Soulac was, as you haue heard, for other respects. And the enterprise of Nerat (into which by their intelligence they were entred, and had slain fve men vpon the little bridge betweene both townes) succeeded not. In Bearne they which affected M. de la Forges, seeing the siege of Montauban raised, had a designe vpon the Castle of Berloc, situate in the way betweene Acqs, and Nauarreux: the King had ordered it should be raised; but as such demolitions are commonly at his charge; M. de Piller, who commanded in the Ca-

file, being of the Religion, begged the ruines of the King, vpon condition to doe it at his owne charge, the which was granted; but as they write, he meant it not: which policy being discouered by Monfieur de Poyanne, Gouverneur of Nauarreux, being also aduertised that the Captaine of Bedoc was present in assemblies, where they spake of nothing but raking armes, and that he had no intent to raze Bedoc, although he had begged the ruines, onely to keepe any other from that commiffion; he prefently fuprised Piles in the faid Caffe, caufing all the Country thereabouts to labour in the demolifhing thereof, fo as within fifteene daies it was laid euen with the ground.

An enterprife vpon Cauffade.

In the beginning of the year they of Saint Antonin and Montauban made diuers enterprifes, to free the paffages from one towne to another, as well vpon the townes of Cauffade and Bourniquet, as vpon Negrecliff, which three townes are two leagues diftant one from another, and iust in the mid-way betwene Saint Antonin and Montauban. They had an enterprife to force Cauffade by Pettard, but before they would undertake it, there was a letter sent to the Consuls, in the name of the Duke of Rohan, in the which he blamed them for the fault they had committed, in abandoning the party of their religion, before the siege of Montauban, and contrary to their oath of the Union with the Churches: but there being now a fit opportunity offered to repair this error, they might free themselves of their garifon, being aduertised that most of the best fouldiers were gone away, which made him to perswade them to recouer their liberty with courage; and that for his part he would giue order, the Gouverneur of Saint Antonin should fo fauour them in this enterprife, as it should fucceede to the great content of all their Churches. La Gafquerie, who caried these letters, finding the Consuls deafe, returned to Saint Antonin, where Ballaguere, who was Gouverneur, with others, refolued vpon this enterprife, hauing drawne together aboue fifteen hundred men from all the neighbour Garifons of the religion; whereof the Baron of Vaillac who lay in Queilus of Bonnette, a league from Saint Antonin, aduertised Pugnet Gouverneur of Cauffade, who prefently sent word thereof vnto the Marshall of Themines, being in Cahors, who gaue order to the Commanders and Gouvernors thereabout, to send succours to Cauffade. Pugnet hauing drawne together feuentene or eigheteene hundred horfe and foot, lodged them (as he thought fit) attending their coming. On the ninth of Ianuary betwene two and three in the morning, the Gouverneur of Saint Antonin approached with his troops, and planted his ladders neere vnto the Temple gate, and entred the Temple with three hundred men, besides two hundred which were vpon the walls attending the playing of the Pettard. The euening before, all the ftreets were barricadoed, and field peeces planted, which vpon the alarme giuen were discharged, & the Garifon fell vpon them fo as there were two hundred flaine within the towne, and the rest fled out the wall. The Kings succours which lay without the towne, hearing the noife, aduanced, and meeting the enemy without, there was a great conflict; but in the end the troops of Saint Antonin were put to rout, where many Gentlemen, Captaines and Souldiers were flaine, and others taken prifoners, among the which was the Gouverneur of Saint Antonin.

The Garifon
of Montauban defeated.

They of Montauban being fauoured by the difcommodities of the winter, and by the Forest of Montefeh, where they made their retreat, went often towards Thouloufe to take prifoners and cattell, but the Kings Garifons in Montefeh and Fignan annoyed them much, and cut off the victuals which was brought vnto them, and on the fifteenth of Ianuary came vnto the gates of Montauban, and caried away thirty Kine with some horfe, which the fouldiers within the towne would not offer to refcue, being preffed therunto by the inhabitants, but told them, if they would giue them their pay they would goe to field, and not be shut vp in a place afflicted with plague and hunger. The Consuls seeing they could draw no fervice from fuch men, difmiffed three hundred, to whom they gaue part of their pay. They marched away by night, and recovered a wood neere the Towne, fearing that if they kept the champion, they should bee discouered by the Kings forces which lay thereabouts: the extremity of the cold caufed them to make fires to heat them, the which being discouered by the Countmen, they prefently gaue aduertifement to the Marquis of Ambre, and the Consuls of Lauour, who armed what forces they could, and fet vpon them, fo as of the three hundred, there were not aboue forty left alieue, which were taken prifoners.

The King being come to Paris, many grew weary with the toyles of warre, who feeing

The Duke
D'Esquigneres meditates a Peace.

The reasons
of
such as propounded a peace.

A ing the Kings Treafure exhausted, and many of the Nobility flaine, they propound diuers meanes vnto the King to refolue to a Peace. The Duke d'Esquigneres befeecheth his Maieftie to giue it vnto his people, promifing to draw his reuolted fubiects to obedience. The King who desired nothing more then his fubiects hearts, with the preferuation of his authority, lets the Duke vnderstand, that if they would refolue to obey, they should finde him ready to pardon. It was propounded whether they should continue the warre, or grant them peace: which bred a contrariety of opinions. They which perswaded to peace, faid, it might be made after this fort: First, that continuing in full fubiectiō and obedience, they should leaue them their townes, euery one enioying their ancient priuiledges; for the which townes they should be answerable vnto the King, vpon paine of confiscation of all their goods, whereunto they should submit themselves willingly, and by treaty. Secondly, that within their townes they should obey the King in all things, to which the rest of the Prouinee and their neighbors were fubiect. Thirdly, that they should pay the like tributes and impositions, obserue the same lawes, and other rites, if they had no ancient exemptions. Fourthly, that they should obey the Edicts; and should not keepe any Garifons in their Townes or ancient fortresses but their Morriages onely. Fifthly, that they should demolish the new fortifications of Castles and small places which they possessed, and onely continue the strength of their greater townes and other fortifications, made before the death of the deceased King: and the King for his part shall keepe them in the protection of his Edicts, so long as they should continue obedient. Sixtly, that strict commandement should be giuen to doe iustice without distinction of religion, and to prevent all scandals and acts which might breed complaints and sedition. Seuenthy, that they should haue permission to assemble from time to time, but no where but in Paris, to the end it might be knowne to the King and all France that they treated nothing but according to the duty of fubiects. Eightly, the particular assemblies to make deputies, should bee held in their feuerall places, with the permission of Gouvernours of Parliaments.

The reasons of such as maintained the continuance of the warre, were, First, that the King should not seeme to desire a peace; Secondly, that if he gaue eare vnto it, it would make the rebells more proud and obftinate, and withall, he should wrong his authority; Thirdly, that he should not heare any speech of treating with his fubiects, but all hee should doe, was to receiue them without any other capitulation then a simple pardon and naked obedience: the which, if they did not offer freely, hee ought not to heare them; Fourthly, that he should not treat with them, as with a body, seeing there is a distinction betwene Huguenots which obey, liuing vnder the Kings protection & difaduow the rest, and those which are reuolted; Fifthly, that there is a difference betwene the Huguenots which are reuolted, for some may pretend particular priuiledges, as Rochell; others iust feare, as weake townes, and others interest of accords and graunts: and therefore it was fit euery towne should treat in particular; Sixtly, that no Commander was capable to treat for another, but for himselfe, for that he cannot haue power of all the rest, and therefore it would be in vaine to treat; Seuenthy, that by colour of a treaty, they would discouer the kings intentions and forces, and fortifie themselves accordingly: and therefore in stead of treating, they should set vpon them; Eightly, that a treaty would giue them time to furnish their townes with men, victuals, armes and munition; Ninthly, that they had solicited strangers to ioine with them and assist them in their cause, and therefore should not be admitted to treat with their King; Tenthly, that they had not kept their promises, so as they which maintained the iustness of this warre, faid, that it was honorable, profitable, iust and necessary.

All these goodly propositions of peace were changed into a resolution of warre, by reason of the disorders which they faid were committed in Languedec, bafe Guienne, and at Rochel.

The Duke of Elbeuf, being made Generall of the kings army in Guienne, as you haue heard, to restrain the course of Monf. de la Force and those of that parrie, hauing vnder his command fise regiments of Foote, confisting of one thousand eight hundred men, and fise companies of light horfe, most of which were with Monf. du Hallier, Captaine of the kings guard, at the siege of Genfac, where he found greater resistance then bee expected. The Duke, hauing caufed the towne to be well viewed, and finding there was small store of munition in the army, and that they had too few men to attempt such a place which expected succours speedily, it was resolved not to engage themselves at this siege: whereupon he put his army into garison, and assured Duras for the King. The Duke lying at Bergerac, was advertised that certain troops which retired themselves into the Castle of La Force, did much annoy the Countrey, whereupon he resolved to besiege it with three thousand foot, five hundred horse, and four Cannon. M. de la Force hearing that the Duke meant to force his chiefest house, parts from Saint Foy with all his troops both of horse and foot, being one thousand and five hundred men, which made the Duke to come downe into the plaine. M. de la Force advanced all he could to relieue them, coming within halfe a league on the thirtieth of January in the evening; by two a clock in the morning came resolutely into the plaine, where hee gaue two furious charges to the right wing of the Dukes army, and continued the fight for the space of six houres, during the darknesse of the night; but being much gauled by their Ordnance, they were forced to retire behind a hill, where they stood in battell eight houres more, according to the relation of M. Hickes, who was present at this encounter. Some authors write that M. de la Force lost three hundred men, and the Duke but twenty five, who retired his army without taking the Castle, and the reason was (as they say) for that M. de la Force had sent to intreat him to suffer him to deliuer it into the hands of the Signeur of Bourdeilles, Gouverneur of the Countrey, who should answer for it, wherewith the Duke rested satisfied; and the rather because he was solicited thereunto by many Gentlemen of the Countrey, the Kings seruants, who feared the ruine of their houses if this Castle should be razed, according to a decree of the Parliament of Bourdeaux.

ed by the M.
of Lusignan.

Whilest that the Duke takes muster of his army at Elmer, with a designe to besiege Montrauel, the Marquis of La Force was sent by his Father to seize vpon Montflanquin, a towne situated vpon a hill, and strong by nature, the which the yeare before had beene reduced vnto the Kings obedience, their fortifications ruined, and their Cannon taken away; but as soone as the Marquis was entred, the inhabitants repaired their breaches speedily, so as in fiftene daies they were able to defend it against an army of foure thousand men. This surprize did much fauor the Marquis of Lusignan designe vpon Clérac. The yeare before he had bene Gouverneur of Pignerol, and had left it without any recompence, it being demolished with the rest: for the which he grew so discontented as hee fought by all meanes to enter againe into the partie of the reformed, but would not doe it but by the surprize of some place to purchase him the more credit. At that time Scabellier Seneshall of Elguillon was Gouverneur of Clérac with a Garison of five hundred men. The Marquis well informed of the State of the garison, began to practise with some Burgeses, wishing them to get a Mason to make a hole in the wall within for one man to enter, and to relye vpon him for the rest of the execution; the which they promise, but all his care was to recover men and not bediscouered. The result of Montflanquin, being but six leagues off, was a great helpe to him, hauing meanes to draw what men he pleased from thence.

The Gouverneur had bene advertised of an enterprize vpon Clérac, but hee could not discouer how it could be done. Monsieur Duc, a Councillor of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, and Commissary for his Maiesty for the razing of the fortifications of Monheur, Clérac, and Tonneins, hauing discouered that the Marquis of Lusignan had an enterprize vpon Clérac, advertised the Duke of Elbeuf, sending him word it was good hee should come vnto the banks of the riuer of Lot, where all the people seemed to breathe nothing but a reuolt, but his answer was, that he was otherwise employed. This Councillor hearing that it should be put in execution vpon the one and twentieth of Februarie at night, he resolved to put himselfe into the towne the day before with fiftene horse and fifty Muskettiers: but the Gouverneur would not suffer his footmen to enter, so as they were forced to lodge in a Village, halfe a league from Clérac: They visited the walls that night, yet could not finde the hole; they were advertised of an enterprize, but could not discouer the particulars, or how it should be executed. The Marquis was in no lesse feare that it was discouered, hauing receiued some intelligences from the towne. Ferrant, who had most conference with the Mason, and should haue come vnto him to acquaint him with the place, came not, but onely wrote vnto him, that the Mason had seene him that day, and was full of trouble and feare, by reason of their alarmes in the Towne; yet hee had

A had promised to doe what he could; if he made the hole, hee would not then fend vnto him, but if he could not, hee would then come vnto the Marquis. Another sent him word, the Inhabitant who should lend his house for to make the hole, was resolved to discouer it to the Gouverneur. All this could not diuert the Marquis, who comming to the rendezvous, they resolved to go vnto the wall to see if the hole were made. At their approach to the walls they were discouered and shot at by the Centinells. At the last they found the hole with much difficultie, the which was so little and vnease as one man could hardly enter in on all foure; but notwithstanding the alarme they entered & forced their barricades and all their places of strength. The Gouverneur, Duc the Councillor, the Abbot of Clérac, and many others were taken prisoners, and as they write, about two hundred flaine, amongst the which was Ernyé Maruets a Iesuite.

During this surprize of Clérac, the Duke of Elbeuf was at the siege of Montrauel, in the which was Motte Gauchon, with three hundred choise men, and diuers good Captaines. The towne was soone taken, and the besieged retired to their Fort and bastions. The Gouverneur demands composition, and Duke refused to receiue them but at discretion. They planted a new battery, and gaue an assault, the which was valiantly defended for the space of two houres, where the Gouverneur was flaine vpon the breach, with many others: They retired into a Tower, but being readie to be forced, on the third of March they yielded to the Dukes mercy. All the Commanders were prisoners, whereof some of them were sent to Bourdeaux, to be exchanged for Duc the Councillor taken at Clérac: The women and maidens were conducted away in safety, to auoide the insolency of the Souldiers; and some fiftene souldiers and inhabitants hanged, and the rest prisoners.

During this siege, M. de la Force surprized Tonneins, where there are three townes, the vpper, the lower, and the Bourrough of Cuges. The inhabitants receiued them willingly, being much affected to the religion. There remained nothing opposite vnto them but the Castle of great Tonneins, belonging to the Earle of La Fausquion, which after some daies siege hee yielded. The D. of Elbeuf, hauing taken Montrauel, resolved to besiege it, being defended by M. de Monpouillan, second sonne to M. de la Force, the Viscount of Casters, Theobon, and diuers other Commanders with fiftene hundred foot. Vpon his march, the Marshall of Themines met him with his forces at Marmande, being about three thousand men. At their first approach they took the lower towne, and as they write, slew about three hundred of the besieged. M. de la Force came from Clérac to relieue them, but was repulced. They gaue an assault to the vpper Towne, but they were furiously driuen backe by the besieged. They gaue another assault to a house which the besieged held; the which was obstinately defended; but Monpouillan the Gouverneur had a Musket shot in the head, and many of his men hurt and flaine. The Dukes men hauing taken a bastion of importance, they were forced to demand a parley, and Monpouillan intreated him by his letters to grant a Pasport to foure or five Gentlemen hee would send vnto him and the Marshall, the which hauing obtained, they came and propounded conditions to their owne aduantage; the which the D. would not accept but vpon these terms;

E That the Commanders should be prisoners, and put to what ransom it should please the King; and the souldiers at discretion yet to haue their liues saued, and to remaine prisoners during these troubles. The Deputies returned without conclusion. M. de la Force the father, sent two other gentlemen to treat, but itooke no effect: after which hee made other attempts to relieue his sonne and the besieged within Tonneins, which he failed of, nor without losse to both parties: for during the combate, the besieged made a sallie out, where they ouerthrow some, and forced the rest to abandon their Commanders, who were flaine fighting, so as they became masters of the bastion and trenches, burnt the carriages of their Ordnance, and cast two into the ditch, and one into the riuer: but soone after they recovered F their trenches and bastion againe: what succeeded at this siege, you shall heare about the end of May.

The Marq. of Lusignan, seeing himselfe freed from the Marshall of Themines, who was gone to the siege of Tonneins, hauing raised a regiment, and being well fortified with good souldiers from diuers places, and hauing also recovered two pieces of iron Ordnance, he resolved to attempt the Abbey & Castle of Granges, a league from Clérac, where he vnderstood there was store of corne, wine, lard, and other necessaries to victual a place. Hauing besieged the Castle, there came five hundred horse and foot of the Commons, led by the Seigneur of Catus with some horse sent by the Marshall of Themines to relieve it: The Marquis leaves his trenches, and chargeth them so suddenly as few returned. That night the castle yielded, and the Marquis caused great store of provision to be caried by boat to Clerac with armes for 700 men.

The proposition of peace formerly mentioned continued in Court the two first Moneths of the year, during the which Monsieur du Plessis Mornay wrote thus vnto the King. Sir, Heretofore your Maiestie hath bene pleased, yea and hath commanded me to speake of your subiects of the Religion. I am so little, and the businesse so great, as I feare left your Maiestie should terme it presumption. Wherefore, Not daring to inyne my selfe with those which demand peace for themselves, I hold it my duty to craue it in all humility for your selfe, and by your owne bounty, of whom, next vnto God, they are to acknowledge both to haue their being and well being. I hope to see your Maiestie moued, like a good father, to giue it them: can they bee ignorant what need they haue to sue for it with all kinds of submissions which may expiate what is past, and protest their future obedience. If hitherto, Sir, they haue not done it in such good manner as was to be desired, your Maiestie may be pleased to consider, the seuer was giuen them, that their rime was absolutely refused; which made them thinke all means iust and lawfull to preferre themselves; hath made them shut their eyes to all respect and dutie, and to fix them onely vpon their necessity; yet being already, as some as it shall please your Maiestie to shew them a good countenance, to cast themselves at your feet, and to poure out their liues for your service. I haue said, Sir, that I presumed most humbly to entreat you for your selfe: for it is your house which is on fire, they are your men which are lost, your blood which is spilt, your treasure which is wasted, your triumphs which are turned into funerals, and when these desires shall succed beyond imagination, you shall haue nothing remaining but deserts and ruines. Suffer an ancient Seruant, Sir, to put you in mind, in what perils they haue sometimes assisted that great King Henry your father, and for how many years, and let these their seruices past, hold some place in their account, in deduction of the discontents your Maiestie hath received. The chiefe negotiation consists in you, who can iudge vprightly what assurance is necessary to warrant them from the malice of their ill-willers which hath been but too apparent in these latter years. And although they should neither haue counsell nor courage to demand them of your Maiestie, yet it is incident to your naturall bounty and fatherly affection to grant them of your selfe; that is to say, to capitulate properly with your iustice, wherein your authority shall thinke absolutely, and it may be, occasion may be found offered, wherein your Maiestie may employ men of all qualities, and make triall of their courage and fidelitie together. I bend my knees before your Maiestie, and craue pardon for my presumption, beseeching the Creator, that I may see your Maiestie peaceable within, and glorious abroad, to die in this inuolable qualitie, your most humble, &c.

And in the same moneth there was a discourse directed vnto the Queen Mother, whom they knew to be much inclined to a peace, to entreat her to procure it for France, and to be an intercessor to the King her sonne.

According to the designe of their Assembly at Rochel, formerly mentioned, Monsieur de Soubise landed the foureteenth of February in base Poictou, neere to Saint Benoit in the mouth of the Riuer of Iard, with three thousand foot, and about three hundred horse, hoping within few dayes to double his troops, the which succeeded: for many of the religion in base Poictou, came vnto him at Mareil vpon the said Riuer. This descent gaue an alarme to all the countrie, and caused the Earle of Rochefoucault Governor of Poictou to come straight waies to Saint Ermine on the said riuer of Iard, sending to some Noblemen and for some companies of foot to come vnto him to oppose the enterprises of them of the Religion. But Monsieur de Soubise according to the intelligence which he had with some Catholique Gentlemen, went & surprised Sables, D'Olonne, and the castle of Chame: Those of Sables compounded with him; to bee free from spoile; to giue him twenty thousand crownes, a certaine number of iron peeces, and three vessels, all which he receiued: but being entred with some troops, hee forbore not to pillage them for two houres space, whereof the inhabitants complaining vnto him, I had (said he) promised them the spoile before your composition was made. The Earle of Rochefoucault hearing that M. de Soubise his troops increased hourly, and that he had a designe to attempt Talmont: hee sent to entreat the Seigneur of Roche Barritault (who had drawne his friends together

A to put himselfe into the place. Whereupon he parted on the eight and twentieth of February with fourescore horse, and thirte Muskettiers to goe to Talmont. Cressiniere, whom M. de Soubise had left in Mareil, hearing thereof, resolved to lay in ambuscado for him; but finding that he was pale, and not faire, hee pursued him, hoping to finde means to fight with him at some passage. Being aduertised of their coming, and seeing no means to retire but by fight, hee resolved to fight. Cressiniere seeing him in this resolution founded a charge, where there was a long and obstinate conflict; which continued aboue an houre and a halfe. Roche Barritault fighting long on foot, was wounded, taken, caried away and afterwards released; there were some other of note slaine, some of the common souldiers, and fiftene taken prisoners. The Earle of Grassy, sonne to Roche Barritault, with his Lieutenant, and thirty of their troope retired safely, with foure prisoners. They of the religion (as they write) lost fiftie persons in the fight, amongst the which were Cressiniere their Leader, and fourteene Gentlemen of quality. In the meantime M. de Soubise fortifies the Castle of Chame: hee meant to besiege Talmont; but hearing that great numbers of men were within it, hee retired his troops: Being aduanced along the Sea shore, towards Saine Giles, and the Ile of Ré, the inhabitants would not suffer him to enter. It is written that he said; If the Earle of Roche-Foucault came to field, he would vndoubtedly beat him: that if the Earle ioynd his forces with the Duke of Elperons, they should fight; but if the King came, hee would flye away; the which afterwards proued too true.

The estate of the affaires in base Poictou required the Kings presence: They which were inclined to speake for a peace, wished he had not parted from Paris till after Easter, being aduertised from M. D'Esdaignieres, that all the reformed Churches should send their Deputies, with their demands for a peace, and should bee there presently after Easter. But such as could not relish this peace, said; It must needs bee dishonourable, being made with enemies who kept the field, and proclaimed themselves victors both by Secand land. Hereupon they speedily set downe the estate of their armies and gaue order to hasten the preparations; and to aduance the munition and carriages to the riuer of Loire. But waite cannot be made without money, and it cannot be recovered but from the people: They that direct the treasure, seeke to draw it with the least oppression that may be. The creation of Offices, and increase of Officers fees being the mildest courses; and the most assured to finde money speedily; which being propounded in Councell, there were welue Edicts sealed for new Creations, the which were verified in Parliament, the King sitting in his seat of iustice.

Twelve Edicts
for the raising of money.

The King after his coming to Paris, had granted the demolition of the Fortifications at Quillebeuf, which would no lesse annoy Paris then Rouen: They had bene much aduanced when the deceased D. of Montpensier was Gouverneur of that Province: the Marshall D'Ancre continued them, & they were almost finished by the Constable Luyne, notwithstanding all the complaints of the Parliament of Rouen: a worke which had cost aboue six hundred thousand crownes. The King had resolved in Councell that they should be demolished and the ditches filled vp, giuing Commission to the Deputies of Rouen for the effecting thereof. The Inhabitants of Quillebeuf, who thought to grow rich by this fortification opposed themselves, threatening to kill and drown all the Labourers which should be sent thither. In the end, the Duke of Longueville, Gouverneur of the Province, and the first President of Rouen, were forced to goe thither with foure companies of Foot to see the demolition performed, the which was begun and ended with force and armes, to the great griefe of the Inhabitants, the content of the Country, and the ease of them at Rouen.

The fortifications at Quillebeuf were demolished.

The King, before his departure for Poictou, meant to reconcile the Duke of Nevers with the Prince of Loynville, incensed one against another for a quarrell which happened the year before betwene the said Duke, and the Cardinal of Guise deceased, in the house of Monsieur Guines, a Councellor in the great Councell, where the Prince Loynville accompanying his brother the Cardinal, had stricken the Seigneur of Mareuil, Master of Requests of the Kings house, who managed the Dukes affaires. The Cardinal of Guise at his death had craued pardon of the Duke of Nevers, who remained satisfied, so as the Duke had no spleene but against the Prince of Loynville, whom his Maiestie would himselfe reconcile, causing this Act following to be drawne the 19 of March, 1621:

The Duke of Nevers and Prince Loynville reconciled.

1622

The Kings fo-cond voyage into Poitou.Reduction of Poussin and Bay

Monsieur de Nevers, I am duly informed and satisfied of your obedience to my com-mandements, in that soliciting a suite betwene you and the deceased Cardinal of Gaife, you were not accompanied in your Carrosse, but with such a number of Gentlemen as I had limited, vpon that which had past in the house of the reporter, where the Cardinal and Prince Joanville his brother went to seeke you: the Cardinall thinking that in some writings you had done him wrong, was transported with choller, and gave you a blow with his hand vpon the head, and you returned it with thrusting him backe with the like stroke: which wrong the Cardinall hauing acknowledged at his death, demanded pardon of you, and you haue rested satisfied; yet, for that your spleene continues still against the Prince Joanville, who did accompany him; he doth assure you, that if he had knowne his brothers intention, he would haue sought to dissuade him, or at least not accompanied him, acknowledging that this action was done by surprise and advantage:
that you had not your Sword when you were stricke, and that as soone as the Gentleman of your horse had giuen it you, you did endeavour to witness the feeling a generous Prince ought to haue vpon such an affront: And the P. Joanville assures you, that when he drew his sword putting himselfe between you and the said Cardinall, his purpose was not but to prevent some greater mischief which might for euer make both your Families irreconcilable: confiding likewise that diuers times since you haue endeauored by all honourable means to be righted by him; and that your foresight and authority onely haue hindered the deciding herof by armes. And as for that which concerns the Seigneur of Marefcot, the said Prince Joanville declares, That the opinion he had that the said Marefcot did nourish this strife betwene you, provoked him, being in choler to see him present, to strike him with his sword: and for that he hath the honour to be of my Councell, and a Master of requests of my household, and that you shew a discontent for that with my leave hee deales in your affaires, the said Prince Joanville saith, That he is very sorry, and would not haue done it but for the former cause, and being loath to omit any thing that may content you, he will giue him when you please, or such new, such contentment as you and he shall rest satisfied. In all which your generous carriage being well knowne to all men, and to him in particular, the suspicion you had of his ingratitude being wholly taken away by his declaration, the offer to content Marefcot for your sake, and the desire he shewes to haue to embrace that good correspondency which should bee cherished betwene Cousin-germans; I conceiue that all this should giue you content and satisfaction: And therefore in reason, and by my authority I desire and command you to forget what is past, to embrace one another, and to continue friends. I will also that vpon your reconciliation, such as accompanied you, forget whatsoever hath past in their particular. Which done, the Prince Joanville, directing himselfe to the Seigneur of Marefcot, said; Monsieur Marefcot, I am very sorry, for the loue of Monsieur de Nevers, to haue stricken you, I pray you forget it, and I will be one of your friends. To whom he answered; Sir, seeing that *M.
de Nevers* is content, I am also satisfied.

The next day being Palme-Sunday, the King parted in the afternoon for his voyage into Poitou, going without any state to Blois: His Guards both French and Suisse were sent with all speede downe the riuer of Loire towards Saumur. Being at Orleans, he receiued aduertisement from the Duke D'Esclignieres of the reduction of Pousin, that towne, with that of Bay, hindered the free commerce vpon the Riuer of Rone, betwene Lions and Marceilles.

The Duke hauing sent to perswade Blacons, who commanded in these two townes, to conforme himselfe to the order which he had set downe for the peace of Dauphiné, seeing that these two places depended on the country of Valentinois. Whereunto hee answered, That they depended not of the government of Dauphiné, but of Viue-retz, and therefore belonged to Languedoc: that he was not resolved to yield them but by the consent of the Assembly of base Languedoc and Viuretz. This answer drew the Duke from Grenoble, in the end of February, meaning to besiege Poussin, which Blacons had greatly fortified. Hee assaulted the towne, and planted his battery speedily vpon a little hill which did much annoy them. In the end he made a breach, which the Sei-gnieur of Grange vadertook to assault with his Regiment, but they entertained them with such resistance, as he was glad to make his retreat, lost many of his men, & himselfe hurt.
He was seconded by the E. of Tallard, who, in the beginning forced the besieged to retire.

Hec

A He recovered their wals thrice, but yet they defended the breach with such furie, as in the end they left it being not held reasonable. The Cannon being ready to play againe, and the Duke hauing built a fort, Blacons offered to yeelde the place vpon certaine conditions: After much contestation, the towne being important and strong, the Duke yielded to these Articles, all with the Kings good liking, and not otherwise: That the Seigneur of Blacons should come forth of the towne, with armes and baggage, and should haue the towne of Bay vpon Bay in government. 2. That the Governor of the towne and cattle of Poussin which were to be changed by the Duke D'Esclignieres should not withstand be of the religion. 3. That the garison also which was to be established there should be of the Religion. 4. And as for Bay vpon Bay, that the like condition should be obserued in the reduction thereof. 5. Finally, that there should no hurt or dammage be done vnto the inhabitants of the said places in their persons or goods: According to this agreement the Duke made Governor of the Caste of Poussin D'Alons Governor of Serres in Dauphiné, a Gentleman of the Religion, and of the towne of La Roche de Grange, one of the Religion also, and the garisons of the same Bay vpon Bay was rendred vpon the same conditions, and Blacons made Governor thereof.

The King being at Blois, the Prince of Iohnuillé went thither, to craue his leave and permission to marrie with the Countesse of Laynes widow, to whom hee was already made sure, conditionally, that as soone as the Nuptials were performed, he should repaire
C vnto his Maiestie againe with all speed. Being come backe to Paris, hee eloped the said Ladie in the Caste of Lusigny, where the wedding was kept with great magnificence.
The Prince of Conde, all the House of Lorraine, the Duke of Nevers, the Duke of Monbazon, the Duke of Chaulne, and many great Personages were invited thereunto.

The King (hauing made some stay at Blois and Tours) came to Saumur to take order with his Councell for some matters concerning that place: Hee had bene aduertised that they of the Religion in that towne had bene very factious; and that they had professed with Monsieur de Soubsie to surpris the place, by the means of some soldiers of the Garison whom they had corrupted. The King went to Councell with the Princes and Noblemen, where they were made acquainted with the great charges of the towne of D Saumur, for the maintenance of such a garison, whereupon the King rebuked the solicitations should be demolished in the suburbs, and onely a garison of these hundred men left in the towne and castle, with a company of light horse.

The King continuing his voyage, and causing his troops to aduance both by water and land, he came to Nantes on the tenth of April, where hearing what troops the Earle of Rochefoucault had in base Poitou, being three thousand foot, and four hundred horse, he sent vnto him to be ready when he should call for him. He informed himselfe of Soubsie his designs; what way they could take to come into Britanny; what forces he had; and what shipping he had brought from Rochel; and what means there were to charge him and defeat him by land. He resolved to aduance with his armie, vpon an aduice giuen by E the Earle of Rochefoucault, who found the enemies army easie to be defeated, if his Maiestie tooke a fit time and aduanced his army with speed.

The King had sent the Seigneur of Boscargis who was well acquainted with those Countries of base Poitou, to put himselfe into the Isle of Rie, and to defend it with the inhabitants, whom he found ready to capitulate with Monsieur de Soubsie, assuring them that the King would come to succor them within two dayes; whereupon they planted two small peeces of iron, with the which they kept them from entering that day into the Island. The next day, Monsieur de Soubsie found another passage whereby he entered, but this resistance gaue the King time to approach and was the cause of his ruine.

Boscargis returns to the King, and assures him that if he would charge Soubsie in the Isle of Rie, he doubted not but to find him a passage both for horse and foot. This Isle of Rie is environed with an arme of the sea, and is five leagues in length, and two leagues broad, in which there are great marshes: vpon the firme land are the Boroughes of Rie, Saint Giles point, Saint Hillary, La Barre du Mont, our Lady of Pont, and Saint Iohn de Mons. Some were of opinion they should not attempt the Island, being of hard access, and that the enemy had six thousand foot, and aboute five hundred horse, three peeces of brasse Ordnance, and foure of iron: the King indeed had more men, but no Ordnance.
Notwithstanding all these difficulties, he resolved to see if Soubsie had any courage to at-lead him. Vpon this resolution, the Earle of Rochefoucault was sent for to come the next day with his troops to ioyne with the Kings armie betwixt Apremont and Cominiquers, where the whole armie met, and the King tooke vp his quarter at Chalais, within a league of Rie.

On the next day by two a clocke in the morning, the King was on horsebacke, and according to his former deliberation of assailling the Ile in two places, the Prince of Conde had charge to march along the Dike of Peric with the Regiments of the guards of Normandie and Normandy, and the Earle of Rochefoucault to set vpon Saint Giles. Point with his troops of horse, and the Regiments of Elillac, Rainville, and Saint Vincent. The King with the body of the army according to their successe was to succour them. Monsieur de Soubise made them to defend the entry of the land, and to charge the Regiments of the guards with his horse and foot, but he retired to Rie without fight. His Maiesty having bene 15 houres on horsebacke, camped at Saint Iohn de Mons, and there fed his troops, staying for the ebb to passe the Channell of Saint Giles called Bessle, the which he did about midnight, being five hundred paces broad, the foot men wading vp to the middle.

The Kings army is put in battell, but as they write, Monsieur de Soubise troops were partly embarked, the rest cried for mercy, casting away their armes: but the Pelants so bene revenged slew many. Monsieur de Soubise fled with his horse, and abandoned his Cannon.

On the 16 of April, the King marched with his forces to the Crosse of Rie, diuided from Saint Giles by an arme of the Sea, where he defeated all the foot, and part of their horse. Many cast themselves into Barkes to flye to Rochel, but being aground they were most of them slaine. There were six or seven hundred prisoners taken. At the same time the King sent to the Earle of Rochefoucault being at Saint Giles, to inuest the Castle of Chaume with three thousand men, which vpon the first summons yielded, vpon condition to haue their liues saued. Monsieur de Soubise fled to Rochel, where he was receiued with little fauour.

After this, there was some contestation about the prisoners of quality, namely, for the Earle of Mareuil, and La Motte Saint Sautier. The Duke of Vendosme, Monsieur Schomberg and Humieres, sued for their pardons, or at the least that they might be ransomed. The Prince opposed himselfe, saying that they were vnworthy of any grace. It was referred to Councell, and afterwards all men of quality were entreated as prisoners of warre, but of the souldiers about six hundred were carried to Nantes, whereof some sixteen were hanged, and the rest condemned to the gallies for ever.

The Duke of Espernon, seeing the King refused to force them of the Religion, sent Monsieur de Buillon to his Maiesty being at Nyort, to make their submissions, and to disallow all the revolts which had bene made against him since the last troubles: He fluted his Maiesty on the Dukes behalf, with all the protestations of a good subiect. The King receiued Buillon graciously, and made it knowne, hee did no lesse affect him, then the Duke whose businesse hee did manage. Hee let the King vnderstand, that many townes which had sent him, besought his Maiesty to receiue them into his protection, and to accept of their seruice, promising neuer to embrace any other party but his. Hee had diuers audiences, where the King made it knowne, with what affection he embraced those which with a generous mind came willingly to submit themselves vnto his lawes, and how much he desired rather to reduce his subiects by mildnesse and clemency, then by force and the rigor of armes, whereupon the Deputies of euery towne in particular were sent backe with all assurances of his good intentions.

Monsieur de Soubise being returned to Rochel after this great defeat, fell into a generall hatred of the multitude, reproaching him with his poore carriage, and for so great a losse of the body of Religion, so as soone after he refused to make a voyage into England, to procure some succors, but it had no great successe.

The King came into Xaintonge, and past by Saint Iohn D'Angely, to see the end of the demolishing. He was put in ialousie of the Castle of Taillebourg, which belonged vnto the Duke of Tremouille, who had contained himselfe within the bounds of Neutrality, and would not embarque himselfe with the Rochellers, foreseeing the storme which threatened them, neither yet ioyne himselfe to the Kings party, for that hee would

A giue no ialousie to the other, giuing alwayes vnto his Maiesty an entry into his Townes when he pleased. The King refused to doo if any of the townes which the yeare before had vowed all obedience, would mutine against his army. The Gouvernor of Taillebourg seeing the King neere, refused to offer his seruice like a faithful subiect, as hee had done the yeare before, imagining his Maiesty would haue bene contented with his offer. The King receiued him with all courtesie, but withall hee commanded Monsieur du Halier to take some troops of horse and foot to visit the place, and see if the effects were answerable to the Governours promises. Vpon his approach, the Inhabitants grew into a mutiny, some would open the gates, and some refused to let Monsieur du Halier enter; who presently sent word thereof vnto his Maiesty, and in the mean time he sent to aduertise the Townsmen, that if they did not render, they would presently cut off their Governours head before the gates, which at first moued them not, but when they saw a scaffold preparing, to saue their Governour they receiued the Kings troops into the Castle, into which du Halier put a strong garison. There was found great quantity of munition and armes for sixe thousand men, with 25 peeces of Cannon. This newes was brought vnto the King at Xaintes, who sent backe the Governour into his place, with commandement to draw nothing into the Castle.

The King being at Nyort, refused to besiege Royan, who had suffered themselves to be surprisid, and was fortified by Monsieur de Soubise, and the Seigneur of Fauas, seruing as a backe-dooore to them of Rochel, to come forth and roue vp and downe all the plaines of Xaintonge; and now his Maiesty being come to Xaintes, he sent the Duke of Espernon with foure thousand men to inuest it, who soone became Master of the suburbs, lodging therewith two Regiments: And vpon the newes of the Kings approach in person, and the Cannons coramg to batter it, he which commanded therein vnder Monsieur de Fauas, had already sent vnto Monsieur d'Espernon to yeeld the towne vpon an honorable composition, which being almost agreed vpon, Monsieur de Fauas attues with succors, breaks off the treaty, and wreakes his anger vpon the said Capitaine. Thus Royan resolves for a siege.

The Kings army approached, planted their Cannon, forced their out-workes, and D wonne a bastion called Soubise: the besieged blew vp a Myne, where many Noblemen and Gentlemen were slaine, and amongst others, the Seigneur of Humieres much lamented, with 80 souldiers.

In the end, seeing they could keepe the place no longer after the taking of these two bastions, they demanded a composition, with pardon, which his Maiesty granted vpon these Articles: 1. He gaue life and liberty to his subiects of what qualitie soeuer being in Royan: 2. He suffered them to retire by sea or land whither soeuer they would in all safety, except into the Ile of Argenton and Medoc, and to carie away their armes and baggage, except their cannon, munition, and victuals. 3. That they should restore to the Seigneur of Saint Sutin, what soeuer did belong to him and those that went out with him, with their ships, or the value thereof. 4. That they should set at liberty Monsieur de Pouffe, and other prisoners taken in Royan, where soeuer they were, for the which they should giue hostages. 5. That his subiects of Royan should liue in libertie of conscience according to his Edicts. 6. That all men might retire to their houses, and liue vnder the benefit of his Edicts, hauing made declaration, for the which they should haue passports, and they which would not make vse of this grace, should promise not to cary arms against his Maiesty. 7. That they should deliuer vp the place within five houres.

According to this capitulation, the besieged left their Cannon in Royan, and retired to Rochel by Sea, with their armes and baggage. The King made Drouer Capitaine of the Regiment of the guards Gouverneur of this place, with three hundred men in F garison.

The King being at this siege, hee had two seuerall aduertisements, the one pleasing, the other distastfull: The first was the yeelding of Tonnais, and the other the reuolt of Mont de Marlan, with the Marquis of Castelnau their Gouverneur. Tonnais had endured till the discomforts which might bee; as well by the want of victuals and munition of warre, as in regard of the infection, the towne being finally, and the multitude of sicke and wounded men. Monsieur de la Force had twice attempted to relieve it, being forced to retire with losse. The Duke of Albion would would haue them yeeld at discretion, and they resolved to dye rather then to doe it.

The length of this siege did much import the Kings desire to passe into Languedoc. Whereupon the Duke vpon the fourth of May granted these Articles following to Monsieur de Montpion and the besieged.

Articles of composition.

1. That they should demand a general pardon for all that had bene attempted against the Kings seruice.

2. That they should sweare and protest not to carie armes for six moneths against his Maiestie.

3. That in consideration thereof, they should depart out of Tonnins with their armes and baggage, their matches dead.

4. That they should leave all the Cannon and Munition.

5. That they should haue boats or carts to carie away their sicke in safety, or to remain there to be cured.

6. That they should haue passports to retire whither they pleased.

This Capitulation being faithfully performed, Monsieur de Montpion and the Viscount of Castels died within three dayes after of their wounds ; and on the Kings side there died at this siege, the Marquis D'Ambre, and Cornuillon great Steneshall of Thoulouze. After which the three towne of Tonnins were set on fire, for a punishment of their revolt.

The result of Montde Marfan, and the reduction.

The Marquis of Castelnau Gouvernor of Mont de Marfan, and Seneschall of the Countrey, had during these last troubles continued firme in the Kings seruice ; in regard whereof, he had given him an hundred men more in garison ; but growing discontented for that he had not employment according to his desire, and pressed by some who perswaded him, that if he were master of the place, it would aduance a treaty of peace, which would be profitable for them of the Religion : he drawes souldiers secretly into the castle, and on the first of May he sends a prisoner to be kept in the old Castle with twelue Muskettiers, the next day he drawes two hundred horse and four hundred foot into the town and disarms the inhabitants. The first President of Bourdeaux who had alwaies strict correspondency with the Marquis for the Kings seruice, hearing this unexpected newes, sent presently vnto him to let him vnderstand, that whatsoever he had done might be excused by his friends, and that he might retire himselfe with aduantage. Presently the Lieutenant Criminall arriued at Bourdeaux, letting the President vnderstand, that he was come with aduice of the Marquis and his confident friends, by his meanes to retire him from the danger (whereinto some factious spirits and the discontent he had against some inhabitants, had engaged him) and the towne and countrey from the ruine which threatened them, who if he might be protected and those which assisted him, and that in recompence of his charges and the government of the towne and castle (the onely recompence of 50 yeares seruice done by his father and brother lately slain, the one before Montauban, the other before Tonnins) he would deliuer the place vnto whom it pleased the King.

The importance of the result of Mont de Marfan.

The first President considering how much the siege of this place would crosse the Kings designs, and hinder the progresse of his armes, hauing a resolution after the taking of Royan to reduce Saint Foy, Montflanquin, and Clerac, and so to passe into Languedoc, hauing nothing so pretious as time : That the place might well be fortified and defended, hauing many men within it, and that the countrey round about could hardly feed the Kings army eight dayes : that the entertainment of the Gouvernor and Garison cost the King yearly eight thousand Crownes, and that for these 50 yeares it had bene held among the townes of heretie, for that the Gouvernors were of the Religion, and that the malecontentes had no other retreat in Beazne and Gasconie : he returns the Lieutenant Criminall with all speed to the Marquis and his friends, with a promise to procure from his Maiestie the greatest recompence hee could, and an assurance to deliuer twenty thousand Crownes presently, to any one he should make choice of in the Province, and his Maiesties approbation for all which had past in Mont de Marfan, for the which hee engaged his word and faith. Hee entreats him to appoint one to receive the money, and so set downe a day when he would deliuer the place : hee conuerts him to doe it speedily, and in the meane time to make vse of the Gouvernor of Royans misfortune, whom his owne men shut out of the gates, and that hee would haue a care to himselfe and the place.

The

A The first President aduised the King, who he had concluded, that he had had an ample commission, considering the benefit would redound to his seruice, and the danger delay would bring, either by the change of the Marquis and his friends, or by some other, which such as he had drawing into the towne might make upon his place or persons. His Maiestie allowed of this Treaty, and commanded the Earl of Solmsberg to furnish the money presently, and both aduise the Prince of Condé thereof (being present the day before to Bourdeaux) to whom he recommended the execution in the instant time. The first President receiued several messengers from the Marquis with certaine conditions : That hee held it not safe to deliuer the place, before he had disposed of such as did assist him, to retire to their houses, and to that end to let them see the Kings Pardon, verified, and a Passport, fearing that returning to their houses, they might be taken by his Troopes of La Maitie Gondrin and Poyanne. The President acquaints the Prince of Condé herewith, and incrites him to write in such sort to the Marquis, such Letters as may be a new assistance of the Kings approbation and a Pardon and Passport for his friends. The Prince, at hasten, the execution of this Treaty, deliues 10000 Crownes (appointed for the payment of such troopes as he had brought from Royan) and binds himselfe with the first President for that rest againe charge to the Seigneur of Poyanne, to receive the place, and to keepe it till his Maiestie had otherwise disposed thereof.

Vpon the receipt of these Letters the Marquis dismissed his friends, and deliues the place accordingly ; the which a month after, by order from his Maiestie, Poyanne sent into the Mayon and Jurats, who by verue of a Commission from his Maiestie, razed the Castle, and bound all the inhabitants of the reformed religion to depart the Towne, to seeke them from suspicion and popular sedition, during their combustions.

About this time Jehan Paul de L'Ecluse, formerly a Councillor in the Council of Paris, and Deputy in Court for the Churches of Beazne, was taken at Cozes in Xaintonge, with many Commissions for the lauying of souldiers, he was sent to Bourdeaux, where the Court of Parliament made a quick dispatch of him : for vpon the examination of some Witnesses, and the verification of his own hand writing, he was condemned to be drawn through all the streets vpon a Hurdle, with a writing vpon his head, containing Guiltie of High Treason, and President in the assembly at Rochel, and so brought before the Palace there to doe penance in his shirt vpon his knees with a halter about his necke, bareheaded and barefoot, holding in his hand a burning Torch of two pound weights. After which to haue his head cut off, and his body quartered, for that, said the sentence, he had wickedly and maliciously assisted and presided in the said assembly at Rochel ; and in quality of President signed commissions, to leaue souldiers against the Kings seruice, and authority, and had assisted in the Council of justice, established in Rochel, by authority of the Assembly, to iudge souverainly of the life and goods of the Kings subiects : and verily all that he had made a booke, entitled, The Persecution of the Reformed Churches of Beazne, which Booke and Commissions were condemned to be burnt. His posterity was declared base and ignoble, and all his goods confiscate to the King.

In the end of the last yeare, the King had by his Letters Patents declared the Duke of Rohan guilty of High Treason ; but they had not bene sent to the Parliament to be verified, in regard of the conference which was then made for a Peace : which being broken off, and there being no more hope, they were now sent to Paris and verified. By which he was deprived of all honours, Dignities, Offices, Governments, Pensions, Priviledges and Prerogatives, and commandement given to all men to seize vpon his person. Whersupon the Earl of Rochefort, who was made Gouverneur and Lieutenant General in Poitou, the Dukes place.

After the reduction of Royan, the King staid some dayes in his Campe, to resolve vpon three points. First, for the preferation of Poitou, Xaintonge, Aulnis, and against the enterprises of the Rochellers. Secondly, to free the River of Garonne, Bourdeaux, and Medoc, from the Ports of Soules, and the Ile of Argenton, held by Fauas and Boisse, for them of Rochel. Thirdly, Touching his voyages into Languedoc by the River of Dac-dongne, and in passing, to reduce Saint Foy, and Clerac, which had revolted ; the Gouvernors of which places had sent vnto his Maiestie for pardon.

For the first, the King appointed the Earl of Soissons, assisted by the Marshal of Vieux, to command the army which he resolved to leave in Poitou, Xaintonge, and Aulnis, at well to retain each one in his duty, as also to invest and blocke vp Rochel both by Sea and Land.

For the second, it was resolved, to send the Earle of Aurrie Marshall of the Campe, into Medoc, with 1500 men, and two Colucians: whereof having advertised the first President of Bourdeaux, he presently sent the Scigneur of Aspalais vnto his Maiestie to let him vnderstand, that his expedition would cause a great combustion in all Medoc, which since the encounter at Saint Vilian, had not bene troubled by the revolted: That he had hope that if Famard did not shortly yield vp his place by treatie, vnto his Maiesties obedience, he should either surprize or force it. He represented the same vnto the Prince of Conde being at Bourdeaux.

At the same time the President hearing that Famard was gone to Rochel, vpon diuers occasions; and that there were few men left in Sotiac, they caused some of the principal to be taken withal, to take a recompence for the place; and withall caused it to be invested by two Companies, making preparation to force it: whereupon they parleyed, and on the nine and twentieth of May yielded the place into the hands of Aspalais, to haue their hies and goods saved, vpon condition they should not cary away any ornaments of the Church nor graine; and in recompence, the first President gaue one hundred and fifty Pistols, and a Barque, as they had demanded: but being imbarqued with their armes and goods, they saw certaine long boats armed, which attended to take them, finding too late, that they had not demanded a safe conduct in their Capitulation; so as they were presently taken prisoners. As for the Fort in Argenton, held by Buisse, it was not yielded till June.

Touching the Kings voyage into Languedoc, by the Riuer of Dordone, they said hee was bound vnto it, and that he should make vse of the losses his enemies had received, during the siege of Tonneins, there being slain in diuers combats; about two thousand of their best souldiers, and about fifty men of command; most of the which had bene in Montrauban, during the siege: That Monsieur de la Force, who was in Saint Foy, and the Marquis of Lusignan in Clerac, had promised to submit themselves to the Kings obedience, if his Maiestie came with his armie.

Hereupon he sent the Prince of Conde with part of his troopes towards Saint Foy, and gaue commandement to the Duke of Elbeuf (who was yet with his forces about Tonneins) to come thither.

Vpon the way, the Prince assured himselfe of the Townes of Genfac, Monsecuq, and Elmet. Monsi de la Force, seeing Saint Foy invested, desired a conference with Monsieur de Lomenie, Secretarie of State, where making shew of great repentance for his former errors, with a desire to submit himselfe wholly to the Kings clemency, hee presented Articles for his reduction, his childrens, and the Nobilitie, which had followed him: and for the townes of Saint Foy, and Montflanquin, beseeching his Maiestie to giue them a fauourable answer.

These Articles being brought to the King, he made these following Answers; whereby he found that his Maiestie remembered not what was past, but gratified him for his gouernments and charges, whereof he had disposed.

1. Your Maiesties most humble and obedient subjects, making profession of the Religion in Saint Foy, humbly beseech you to beleue that next to their duties to God, they haue nothing in greater esteeme, then to yeeld you the humble seruice, and perfect obedience they owe you, in submitting themselves to your clemency and bounty: and to liue the more happily vnder the benefit of your Edicts. They humbly beseech you to giue them a generall abolition and pardon for all things which haue past since the first of February 1620.

Answ. Granted.

2. His Maiestie is also humbly intreated to allow of their new fortifications, and of all iudgements and condemnations, giuen and executed by the authoritie of the Consuls, and other officers of Iustice to that effect; and generally of all things done and committed since the first of February 1620.

Answ. Granted.

3. That the exercise of their Religion should be free as at this present, according to the Edicts of Pacification; and that all men, of what qualitie soeuer should en-

ioy

A ioy the same priuileages, touching their persons, goods and dignities, which they held by his Maiesties fauour before the troubles.

Answ. Granted.

4. All iudgements and Decrees of death and confiscation of goods, giuen against the inhabitants of Saint Foy, without lawfull defence since the first of Februarie, should be void and of no force; and the parties to be restored to their former estate.

Answ. Granted.

5. And to witnesse vnto his royall Maiestie the great desire the inhabitants had to make knowne their obedience and fidelitie, they submitted themselves, to execute in all points, whatsoever his Maiestie should please to ordaine for the demolishing of their fortifications: yet they humbly besought him, to grant them their walls and old ditches, with their Draw-bridge, Ruelins, and other things profitable for their preseruacion, wishing they might be so happy as that his Maiestie would wholly rely vpon them for the demolishings, yet referring it to his pleasure, and beseeching him to vse the mildest and lightest meanes that might be; and that if any souldiers should be left there to that end, they might be discharged when the worke was finished.

Answ. The King granted them an old wall, and thereto was referred to his coming to Saint Foy, whereof hee would dispose with the least discommoditie which might be for the inhabitants.

6. And in regard of the great Expences, the Consuls and inhabitants haue been forced to vndergoe since the said first day of Februarie; it may please his Maiestie to grant them Letters freely, to impose vpon the towne and iurisdiction thereof, the summe of sixe hundred pound sterling, to be leauied in two yeares.

Answ. Granted.

7. That nothing might be altered in their Artillerie and Munitions, but to be left in their possession as before.

Answ. That his Maiestie would dispose of it as his pleasure.

8. Likewise they beseech his Maiestie most humbly, to free them of the passage of his Armie, considering the extreme necessitie of the Country.

Answ. Granted.

9. All Noblemen, Gentlemen, Captaines and Souldiers, of what qualitie and condition soeuer, shal promise and sweare, well and faithfully to serue the King, vnder the benefit of his Edicts, and to enioy peaceably their goods.

Answ. All such as are in Saint Foy, or elsewhere, whose names Monsi de la Force shall presently present, shall enioy the benefit of this present Article, if so be within fixe dayes they accept thereof, and doe moreover take an oath of fidelitie.

10. His Maiestie is most humbly intreated to restore Monsi de la Force and his children vnto their Charges, Dignities, and Pensions, or to giue them recompence, and to haue consideration of the great losses which he hath suffered; and in like manner that his Maiestie would be pleased to restore the Seigneur of Contenant, to his gouernment of Bergerac.

Answ. His Maiestie grants the place of a Marshall of France vnto Monsieur de la Force, and the summe of 200000 crownes in recompence of his and his childrens places: the one partie to be paid at Paris, vpon sight of the Letter; and the other in the end of the yeare, and all Pensions granted to his children to be continued.

11. That it may be lawfull for all Noblemen, Gentlemen, Captaines, Souldiers, and others, of what qualitie soeuer, which haue assisted Monsieur de la Force, and his children, since the first of Februarie 1620, to retire with all safety whither they please with their armes, horses, and baggage.

Answ. Granted.

12. His Maiestie is humbly intreated to grant them a generall Pardon, for all things done and past, since the first of February 1620.

Answ. Granted.

13. That they may enioy the free exercise of their Religion, in all places, as they had done before these combustions.

Answ. The King will cause his Edicts to be executed.

14. All iudgements and Decrees, giuen against the said men of warre, or others which twice assisted these Noblemen, and haue not bene heard and lawfully defended, shall be void void and of no effect, and the condemned restored to their goods, and estates, as they A were before; and all confiscation, leavies, and condemnations for matters of warre to be of no effect.

Ans<sup>r</sup>. Granted.

15. That the Seigneurs of Boniollé, Theobon, Baignac, Saint Legier, Brequepignat, La Motte, Bicalon, and Beauville may be restored to their Estates, Offices, Dignities, Pen- sions, and Grants; or be recompenced accordingly. And that hereafter they may enjoy them with the arrerages of their Carisons.

Ans<sup>r</sup>. Granted: and so Bicalon the place of a Capitaine entertained.

16. That the Towne of Mont-flanquin might enjoy the like pardon; and that the B Curtaines wherewith they have begun to fortifie their Towne might be continued upon the old foundations.

Ans<sup>r</sup>. They of Montflanquin shall have a Pardon for all things done unto this present day.

17. That all which were fled into Saint Foy might retire themselves with their goods and commodities, and transport them where he pleased.

Ans<sup>r</sup>. Granted; so as they retire into Townes under his Maiesties obedience, or to their houses.

18. That it would please his Maiestie to have consideration of such as had been named to Monseur de Villeaux Clercs, for the gratifications which had been promised.

Ans<sup>r</sup>. Granted.

19. The Earle of Vauguion, and all other Souldiers which are in Saint Foy shall be set at libertie, and in like manner his Maiestie shall cause all such as are prisoners in the Ar- mie, commanded by the Duke of Elbeuf, and taken since the first of February 1620, in base Guienne to be delivered, be they Catholiques, or of the reformed Religion. These Articles being signed, the Printe and Duke D'Elbeuf entred into Saint Foy, on the foure and twentieth of May, to draw out the Garison. The keeper of the Seales having taken the oath of allegiance from the Magistrates, and the regiments of the guards having seized upon the Ports, his Maiestie entred the next day, where he carefully visited the place and fortifications.

The reduction of Clerac.

He left the towne on the eight and twentieth of May, with some troopes therein, vnto D till they had razed the fortifications, and sent part of his armie with the D. of Vendosme, for the reduction of Clerac, which had beene mediated by one Duc a Councillor of Bourdeaux who was a prisoner. Vpon the surprize of the towne, the first President of Bourdeaux had caused two of the Marquis his daughters to be stayed there, with five chests of his greatest wealth, whereof being advertised, hee told the Councillor that hee would not put him to ransom, but desired his liberty, and withall intreated him to be a meane to free his two daughters, and to have restitution of his goods. Hee also sent presently to the first President, letting him vnderstand that no man was better acquainted with his continuall zeale to the Kings service, yea, in these last alterations: that for his re- quitall he had been deprived of his government without recompence; driven for a long time from his house of Lufignan, ransacked and spoiled with a Garison and threatened to haue it demolished; which had caused him to seek some refuge and assurance by an enterprize vpon Clerac. That although by the practice of his enemies hee were thrust out of the Kings fauour, yet he desired nothing more then to returne to his obedience, and that restoring vnto him his daughters, his moueables, & the townesmen of Clerac, whom they detained prisoners, he was content to set at libertie Duc the Councillor, and all the Church-men and seculars which were taken in Clerac.

Fine thousand pound sterling.

The first President in the answer which he made vnto him, exhorted him to haue re- course vnto the Kings clemencie, assured him the fiftie thousand Franks which hee de- manded, and besides that the inhabitants of Clerac should be discharged of 50000 crownes which they had promised: That he would beseech his Maiestie to honour him with the Government of Clerac, and to grant him a most ample abolition for all which was past in the surprize of the towne, which was all that hee or the inhabitants could desire.

Prisoners set at liberty at Clerac.

In the meane time after some passages to & fro, the Marquis his daughters & his goods were sent backe; and the Councillor with the Abbot of Clerac, and some other Prisoners set at libertie. Duc the Councillor comming to the King, he sent him backe to Clerac, to treat

1622

A treat with the Marquis vpon these conditions, that yielding the towne to his Maiesties obedience, hee did grant them a general pardon, for all faults committed against his au- thoritie. That they should haue free exercise of the reformed Religion, in the towne of Clerac, according to the Edict of Nantes; That his Maiestie also did discharge the in- habitants of the painement of fifty thousand crownes due vnto him; That he granted vnto the Marquis of Lufignan, (as a testimonie of the trust hee posited in his fidelity) the govern- ment of the towne of Clerac, and the summe of five thousand pound sterling, in re- compence of the government of Poitiers, which hee was possessed of; as also to see him paid his Pension, and to bestow his fauour and beneficence vnto him, as he should en- deavour to deserve. Whereupon the Marquis and inhabitants submitted themselves, and received the Duke of Vendosme, two leagues without Clerac, late shinner with some part of the Kings Armie, to receive their submission.

The next day, the Counteillor presented the Marquis, the Consuls, and chiefe in- habitants of Clerac, vnto the King at Agen, with these words:

Sir, behold the Consuls and inhabitants of your Towne of Clerac, who come to offer their obedience, by my mouth, with all respect and submission. They had increased need to represent their humbled hearts; and sorrow for their errors; but Sir, I dare not doe it. Methinks I heare you say: I will none of these hearts hardened in their rebellion: these hearts of flint, whom my mildnesse could not tame: the examples of their neighbours infamy; nor my chastisement amend. These refractarie hearts for whom I haue now

C the third time come from the furthest parts of my Realme, endured the injuries of the weather, runne the hazard of my life, to see and necessarie to your subsidies, and yet could not be assured of their conquest. You haue reason, Sir, if you take counsell of your ius- tice, she will reasonably make you reject the offer: as insolent and fruitlesse to your Ma- iestie, but also to punish the presumption. But if you give leave to your Clemencie to giue her aduice, seeing the hath beene hitherto so witty and politike for your enemies, as it seemes she hath had intelligence with them to aduance their designs, and to keepe backe yours; beleeue, she will make this offer very pleasing vnto you. She will tell you, Sir, that the dislike of Kings should be without Armes, and their choller without sting;

D that they must pardon some, being as it were ashamed to be reuenged on others, and draw backe their hands; as if it were from those creatures which pollute them, when they are artful: she will tell you that the lustre of your armes, will be more pleasing enuring in to Clerac, when as they shall see but as ornaments and shew, then when as the last yeare they were instruments of your vengeance: she will let you see their breasts; and I thinke, Sir, that you shall see their repentance, with heauy hammers breaking and bruising their hearts, which haue so often giuen consent to their crimes.

Is it not true you ill aduised spirits, that you would die presently at the Kings feet, to winnesse your sorrow and repentance, if the desire which you haue to amend, did not make you desirous?

E The foulness of your offences makes you so hideous, vnto your felices, as you should not dare to present your selves before his Maiestical presence, if you were not fully resolved by some notable service, to deface those blemishes which make you so foule and vnpleasing. If they ever faile, Sir, to yeeld the obedience which they owe you, if they ever breathe any thing against your service: If their eares be euer open to those whisperers which haue so often enchanted them: If they ever bow their knees against Idol of Rebellion: If they take for a guide that supposed opinion, that your Maiestie would deprive them of the libertie of their consciences: Finally, if they be euer what they haue beene, and become not truly what they should be, let them feele the rigour of your iustice, as you now make them taste of your Clemencie. For my part, as I am an Intercessor in fauour of their repentance, I will become their aduersary in fauour of their obsequie: if they fall into a relapse; and as I haue bene a mediator for their gracious reconciliation, I will be the solicitor to pursue their rigorous puni- ment.

In the beginning of June the King came to Agen, where hee received the submissions of the Duke of Sully, who offered all the places hee held in that countie: namely, Ri- geac, Tardillac, Cardillac, and Carac. From thence he came to Maussiac, where hee divided his troopes. He sent some towards Montauban, vnder the command of the Duke of Ven- dosme to keepe them in: Monseur Zamet had charge to goe with five hundred Menes into

Conde.

Before the King past from Blay to enter into base Guenée, certaine stranger Ships, whereof some were English, but most Hollanders, lying in the riuer before Bourdeaux, to take in their ladinges of Wine, Corne, and other commodities, the Prince of Conde being therein the towne, and seeing the ships staught with Wine and Corne, (thinking perchance that this provision were for the relief of Rochel: but others have written that he meant to make these ships to be as well of warre against the Rochellers.) he commanded them to bring themselves vnder the which they refused to doe: whereupon the Prince commanded the Castle to shote at them; and they feared not their Ordnance against the towne, so as one of the ships was sunke with the towne Cannon, and the Merchants much dammified; whereof they made great complaints in Holland. The King hearing what had past, assured the States Ambassador, that it was not done with any bad designe of the Prince, and that he was ready to make reparation for the losse: disallowing the action which was done contrary to his priuie and commandement.

Montreuil and Tourenis razed
and burnt.

The King passing from Saint Foy to Agen, by Montreuil, a towne which the Duke of Elbeuf had lately forced, considering that he had onely demantled it, and that it was still a retreat for Theues, he commanded all the houses should be set on fire, and consumed to Ashes. And the Prince of Conde leaving Saint Foy, and passing by Tourenis, he caused the three townes to be set on fire, and all the buildings to be consumed; for that it had twice revolted, and did trouble the passage of Garonne, and much annoy the Country, wherefore the King was well pleased with what the Prince had done.

Rebellion of Negrepelisse.

The Armie still advanced towards Montauban: but first of all the King meant to become Master of Negrepelisse, which had bene the yeare before reduced to obedience by the Duke of Angoulême, and the Marshall de Themines, who left three hundred men therein in Garison to assure the place. The inhabitants could not long continue in the protestations which they had made to maintain themselves in the Kings obedience: but being inspired by some bad counsell of their revolted neighbours, they studied by all means once againe to free themselves, and to shake off his Maiesties yoke, and in the end resolved to murder the Kings Garison, which were sufficient at the first to master the people, who were not many in that paltry place, but a third part being consumed with diseases growne by infection of the ayre, especially after the siege of Montauban, and for scarcity of victuals, the inhabitants might the more easily perswade ouer them: so as (having resolved on their designe) in one night they slew their Corps de garde, & massacred the rest of the souldiers which were in their lodgings. They wrote the women shewed great crueltye in this execution.

Negrepelisse forced and all put to the sword.

The King was much offended at this treacherous act, and vowed to make them an example to the world: wherefore hee marched with part of his troopes to Negrepelisse, where the Prince of Conde commanded as Lieutenant general. They were summoned to open their gates for the Armie to enter, but they knowing themselves unworthy of any fauour, refused it, saying, they would die with their swords in their hands, for the defence of their Towne, but the next day they were battered and forced; where the souldiers committed the cruellest butchery which hath bene heard of; for they flew men, woman, and child, but such as were saved through the charity of good men: namely, by Montfau de Vieg, keeper of the Sables, who presently after the taking of the Town, commanded one of his followers to redeem the women and the maidens hee should finde amongst the souldiers, thereby to preserve their honour and liues: he brought fiftene to his Lord, who were conducted into his lodging, as into a place of safety, and to be preferred. Other women fled vnto certaine religious men following the armie, but they could not save them, for they were wrested from them by the rage of the souldiers, who slew one another to enioy them, and in despite murdered the poore women.

This Charity of Montfau de Vieg was imitated by the Cardinal of Retz, and others of the Councell, who had compassion of these poore women and Virgins, which were falling into the souldiers hands, to satisfy their furious lust; many could not avoid them, and which was worse, after they had forced them, they stabbed them barbarously: some were worse entreated, and crucified by the violence of fire: the cruel souldiers pursuing

For the which, his Maiestie and the Commanders in the armie were much offended, They excused this excele, for that these miserable women had a little before murdered the Kings garisons, and had shewed themselves most cruell at the breach. The Castle yielded the day after at discretion, where the men were all hanged, but the women were preserved without any touch to their honour.

Saint Antonin
besieged.

B After the sacke and ruine of this towne, the armie advanced to Saint Antonin, a place which the Duke of Rohan had caused to be fortified; as the hope of Montauban, the terror of the Country, and the most commodious to send succours to them of his party in that Province. He had put into it twelve hundred souldiers with Armes, Cannon, and Munition for their defence. Notwithstanding the King sent to inuest it, and came himselfe in person to the siege, being resolved to force it. The approaches to this place are very difficult, being full of Rocks and bushes, and therefore very troublesome for the horse. It was long before they could bring and mount their Cannon, but in the end they made a reasonable breach, and an assault was giuen, the which was resolutely defended by the besieged, where there were many slain on either side. The Duke of Retz was hurt in the knee, with a Faulcon shot nere vnto the Kings Person; and they wrote there had not bin scene a more bloody siege for so short a continuance in a long time.

In the end, the Garison and Gentry which were within the towne, (desiring rather to fly to the Kings mercy, then to lose themselves with the miserable inhabitants, who would haue perished within their towne) being masters of a Port, yielded the place to his Maiestie on the three and twentieth of June. Hee suffered them to retire vpon condition neuer to carry Armes against his seruice, to take entertainment in his armie, or to goe to their houses. The Inhabitants redeemed the towne from the spoile of the souldier for 100000 crowns which they deliuered vnto the presently. There were 10 or 12 of the most munition hanged. The King left the Regiment of Nauarre for defence of the place, vnder the command of St. de Chappes. Others write that Perodil was made gouernor thereof.

yielded and ransomed.

During the siege of Saint Antonin, the King receiued newes, that the Earle of Ioiny General of the Gallies, who had bene forced to lye all the winter at Lisbon, coming from Marceilles, was arriued at the mouth of the Riuer of Garonne with ten Gallies, and that in passing before the Ile of Argenton, he had caused Boisse (who commanded in the Fort for the Assembly of Rochel) to be summoned to yeeld the place, or else hee would besiege it. Whereupon he had promised to giue him all contentment within two dayes: but the same day the D. of Luxemburg coming to Blay, and sending to Boisse, he deliuered vnto him the place, with the Artillery and Munition for five hundred crownes: after which, they of Rochel had no retreat in the Riuer of Garonne. Boisse leaving this Fort, fell mad and died soone after. The King being gone to Thoulouse, the Marshall of Praslin, and Bassompierre caused the armie to aduance, to take in three little places from the revolted, which greatly annoyed that Citie, namely, Cucy, Carman, and the Mas Saint Puelle, but the enemy perceiving the armie to approach, abandoned them, fearing the chastisement of Negrepelisse, and Saint Antonin. His Maiestie caused them to be demolished, but spared Carman, in consideration of the Earle of Carman, Gouernor of Foix, a Nobleman very much affected to the Kings seruice.

The generall of

And to the end, that during his Maiesties journey into base Languedoc, the revolted might no more nestle themselves in the places which they had formerly held in base Guenée, on either side of the Riuer of Garonne, there were some Councillors in the Parliament, appointed to see the razing of the fortifications of certaine Townes, Forts, and Castles, which had bene held by them of the Religion: which was put in execution.

Many townes and Castles

During the Kings stay at Thoulouse, there was much speech of the obfincie of them of the religion, which made the King and the whole Court to conceiue, that most of their Townes in that Province how small soeuer, would make resistance; the which would cost much of the Nobilities blood. Therefore his Maiestie exhorted the Princes and Noblemen of his Court vnto two things: the first not to carie themselves rashly in combats without armes, and without command: the other was, so cleanse their consciences from the finnes and offences they had committed: whereupon they all disposed themselves to confession, and to receiue the Sacrament.

In the meane time, the Inhabitants of Montpelier seeing themselves in danger to lose the fruits of their fields, and the benefit of Haruest, resolved to prevent the spoile which they

they were ready to make. Whereupon they ſent forth ſo many men, to aſſiſt ſuch as they had employed to cut downe their Hay and Corne ſpeedily. Monſi. de Montmorency being ad-vertiſed hereof, ſent all his horſemen to charge them, followed with good troops of foot, who being aſſiſted by the Earle of Chaffillon, and Monſi. Zamet, charged them with ſuch fury, as there were five hundred of them cut in pieces, many taken Priſoners, and the reſt pulled unto the very gates of Montpellier: after which, they caried away all their Hay, Corne, and Fruit.

The Kings Arme being about Beziers paſt the River of Orb, and had commandement to beſiege Bec de Rix, a towne ſituate amongſt ſteepe and inacceſſible Mountaines, which made the beſieged thinke they ſhould not be able to bring the Cannon neere to batter them, but they were deceived in their expectation: for ſeeing the Cannon brought, the beſieged reſolved to fly by night, but moſt of them were taken by the Regiments which were in guard, whereof ſome were ſlaine, ſome hanged, and ſome ſaved upon promiſe of ranſome. They which remained within the towne, yielded at diſcretion, whereof there were twelve hanged, and the towne redeemed from ſpoile for 1200 crownes. Whereupon three townes which were reſolved ſubmitted themſelves, fearing the like puniſhment.

The Duke of Rohan and his Arme, hearing that the King was reſolved to paſſe into baſe Languedoc, as well to purſue him, as to beſiege Montpellier, his Arme growing amazed, abandoned him, deſiring rather to retire themſelves, then to attend a bad encounter. The Duke put himſelfe into Caſtres, with an hundred horſe only, aſſuring himſelfe that place would be one of the laſt which ſhould be beſieged; and that in the meane time he might worke his reconciliation: for the effecting whereof, the Duke of Sully, and the Seigneur of Chalonge came on the Dukes behalfe unto the King at Caſtelnaudary, but there was nothing yet concluded.

The Earle of Carleu being then extraordinarie Ambaſſador for his Maieſtie with the French King, did often ſolicit him in his name for a Peace for them of the reformed Religion. To whom the French King made answer (as they write) that no man deſired peace more then himſelfe; and that he would willingly give it his ſubiects; but withall he would be obeyed and have the keys of his Townes. In the meane time Monſi. de Soubiſe came into England, to ſolicit his Maieſty for ſome ſuccors for that party. The French had preſumed to dive into ſecrets of State, and to ſet downe his Maieſties answer unto Monſi. de Soubiſe in this manner.

The King of England one of the wiſeſt Princes in the world, being well aſſured of the pure & good intentions of his moſt Chriſtian Maieſty, as alſo of the fraud and perfidiouſnes of his bad ſubiects reuolted, which reſuſed him his townes & their obedience, preuented the ſaid Seig. de Soubiſe, and told him, That if he were come to plead the cauſe of the reuolted in France, and to demand ſuccors for them, hee would not heare him, as a Prince, enemy unto ſuch reuolts and rebellions, which toucheth all Soueraignes to mo-ſtoleſt. But if he came to intreat him to be a Mediator for Peace, and to employ his favour towards the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, to pardon them, returning to their obedience, That he had not only given this in charge unto his Ambaſſadors, but would therein employ himſelfe againe moſt willingly, & that for M. de Soubiſe own part, it would be much better for him to procure his Princes grace & pardon, then to have recourſe unto ſuch means of making warre againſt him. That if he would reſolve to returne unto his duty, hee was ready to write unto the King, and to intreat for him. So he returned againe without any ſuccors granted from hence: but ſome voluntaries out of the Weſt parts of England, and others went to ſerue at Rochel of their owne accord.

The King being in Languedoc, ſent a commandement to the Earle of Briſſac to goe to Freſnay in baſe Britanie, and to ſeize vpon the D. of Rohans wife, whom he brought to Angiers, where the continued ſome time, to ſee if this proceeding would make the D. reſolve to emprove the Kings mercy by his obedience. The King ſtaied long at Beziers during the Canicular dayes. In the meane time all the Clergy of baſe Languedoc repaired vnto his Maieſtie: In whole name the Biſhop of Montpellier made a long ſpeech vnto him, full of complaints, and inuectives againſt them of the Religion, perſwading the King to perſiſt in his deſigne, and to root them out. And hearing that Monſieur de Soubiſe was paſſed into England, to craue ſuccors of men and Armes from his Maieſtie in the name of the aſſembly at Rochel. He made a Declaration by the which

A he was pronounced guilty of Treſon, unworthy of pardon, and incapable of all honours and Offices within his Realme, all his goods confiscated; and his lands granted to the Crowne.

About this time there hapned an accident which pleaſed the King, and gave occaſion of admiration to the world. The Duke of Eſpagne who had made profeſſion of the reformed Religion for the ſpace of three ſcore yeares, was now reſolved to leave it, and to vniſe himſelfe to the Church of Rome. Some write that he had long before ſermed motions to this conuerſion, and that in the yeare 1606, during the warres betwene the King of Spain, and the D. of Savoy, being in Aſſiſt with the Cardinal Leſdigueris, Nuncio

B to Pope Pius the fifth, he was intreated by him to returne unto the Church. To whom he made answer, I promiſe you, Sir, when you ſaye, Pope, I will become a Catholique. Afterwards Cardinal Leſdigueris was created Pope, and called Gregory the fifthteenth, who by his Letters ſummoned the Duke to performe his promiſe, and to become a Catholique. The King deſired this conuerſion ſhould be ſolemnly performed in the Cathedral Church of Grenoble, by the Archbiſhop of Ambian. His Maieſtie ſent the Seigneur of Villeaux Clercs, Secretary of State, Proudſt and Maſter of the Ceremonies, of the Order of the Holy Ghoſt, with a Commiſſion for the Office of Conſtable; which Letters ſhould be preſented unto the Duke by the Maſſhall of Creguy; after hee had made a ſolemne profeſſion to be a Catholique. And there were other Letters directed unto the ſaid Maſſhall, and to the Seigneur D'Alincourt, and Saint Chappuy, to deliuer vnto him the collar of the ſaid Order.

This Ceremonie was performed on the foure and twentieth of Iuly with great ſtate, where there aſſiſted the Court of Parliament, the Chamber of accounts, with many Noblemen and Gentlemen. They write, that being ready to goe vnto the Church to make profeſſion of his faith, ſome Miniſters of the Religion which had viſually aſſiſted him, came vnto him, as it ſeemed, with intent to diuert him from his reſolution: ſeeing them bend their knees, and make offer to ſpeake vnto him, he preuented them, ſaying:

*My maſters, behold a man who by the grace of God hath vowed to ſerue God, and his King, the remainder of his dayes, in another manner of aſſiſtation then that you gave me. If you come to imitate me, and doe the like, I am ready to beate you; but if it be to ſpeake of any other thing I will not: whereupon they retired ſomewhat amazed. After which, the Duke was conducted to the Church; where he made a profeſſion of his faith vnto the Archbiſhop: returning to his lodging after Maſſe, the Maſſhall of Creguy his Sonne-in-law, preſented him with his Letters of Conſtable, and ſaid vnto him; Sir, ſeeing you are become a Catholique, the King gives you the Office of Conſtable, and commanded me to deliuer you the Commiſſion, with a diſpenſation of your oath, the which were preſently read. The next day he received the order of the Holy Ghoſt, with the accuſtomed Ceremonies, and the day after he received the Sacrament, with the other Knights of the order. In the evening, the chiefe of the reformed Church at Grenoble (amongſt which were diuers Gentlemen and Advocates) came to ſee the Conſtable, to whom Vallan a Counceller ſpake in the name of them all, ſaying:*

Sir, we are much amazed at the change wee haue ſcene in your perſon within theſe 3 dayes: the change of honour, the change of quality, and the change of Religion. And that which we moſt apprehend is the change of humour and affection. For that having been brought up from your youth in the Religion which we profeſſe, inſtructed and confirmed ſay many yeares in the ſame: this metamorphoſis was the more ſtrange being not forced. And moreover, it is not without cauſe we apprehend, that the ſame Armes which you haue ſo long carried to defend and protect our religion, and which haue bin ſo fearful to our enemies, will be now employed againſt us. To whom he made answer: My maſters, you haue no great cauſe to be amazed at my change of religio. I haue long ſet a combat in my ſoule, & had longer reſolved this change, if your Miniſters, and your ſelves by artificiall perſwaſions had not diuerted me. I will ſay nothing of your Religion, but that I profeſſe now, and to the which it hath pleaſed God of his ſpeciall Grace to call me, is much better. As for the 4. changes which you ſay are hapned to my perſon, I may reduce them to two. Of Religion & Honour. For the firſt, it is the more pleaſing, for that I hold in more profitable for my ſoules health. As for the other, it hath pleaſed the King to honour mee with the quality of Knight of his Order and Conſtable of France, the which, although there be many within his Realme, which deſerve it better then my ſelfe, yet will I not yeeld to any man living in fidelitie; and will waite vnto his Maiestie, with the hazards of my blood and life; this humble duty which bindes me to his service, desiring to imploy my selfe for your support and protection, so long as you shall be good seruants to the King, and not otherwise.

The Councell
loes reply.

Hereinto the Councellor replied: Sir, I thinke you will doe vs the honour to beleue, that we are good and faithfull seruants to his Maiestie. The seruices which our partie hath done vnto the deceased King Henry the Great, his father, during the last troubles, are such apparant proofes, as we thinke no man will call them in question. But we are much troubled to see the bad impressions which the enemies of our Religion giue daily to his Maiestie, breed an alteration in this Estate, and of the fauours which it hath pleased him to shew heretofore vnto vs, as well for the libertie of our consciences, and obseruation of his Edicts; as for the assurance of our liues, goods, and freedome. But that which is most scandalous, is to see Libells cast dayly abroad, which tend onely to incense the people against vs.

The Duke
answers.

My Masters (said he) concerning that which you say of those Libellers, make your informations apprehend, and doe iustice vpon them; wherein I doe offer you all aide and assistance, and will not spare any thing for your protection, conformable to his Maiesties intention: But touching the Kings seruice whereof you speake, there are three sorts of professors of your Religion. The one are direct Rebels, who seeke if it were possible to shake off the oath of obedience, and fidelitie, which they owe vnto their Prince and Soueraigne Lord. Others haue beene reduced to his Maiesties obedience by force, and tearme themselves the Kings seruants, for that they haue neither Foire, Meanes, nor Armes to resist him. The third kinde are like vnto Sorcerers, who in the cure of their Witchcrafts and distempers, make vie of the Name of God, and the Scripture, to abuse the simple people, and to couer their abominable impieties, with the vaine of deuotion: So are there many of your Religion who endeavour to cloake their bad designs vnder pretext of the Kings seruice, which they haue alwayes in their mouth to deceiue the people (which alwayes are too credulous) being the Kings seruants but in shew: take heed you be not of this number; and speaking these words, he turned his backe and left them.

Mansfield comes vpon the Frontiers of France.

Whilest that the King was busie with his armie in Languedoc, the further part of France, namely, Champagne euen to the gates of Paris, were put into alarme vpon the approach of Count Mansfield, and the Duke of Brunswicke, who had left the Palatinate, past through Alsatia, Lorraine, and were come vpon the Frontiers of France with their Armie: consisting (as they write) of twelue thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, and foureteen pieces of Ordnance. Mouzon, where the Earle of Grandpre was Gouvernour stood in most feare, and was but weakly provided both for men and fortification. He aduertised the Duke of Neuers, Governour of the Prouince, and craved his assistance, and fortified the townes as much as time would giue him leaue.

The Duke comes into Champagne vpon the brute of Mansfield's approach; but seeing he had no forces to hinder him, he sends the Seigneur of Montrecau vnto him to draw him if he could to the Kings seruice: and in the meane time leaues 12000 foot, and 1500 horse by the Kings command, to oppose against Mansfield, and all others. Hee sent succours into Mouzon. The treatie continued ten or twelue dayes betweene the Duke of Neuers, and Mansfield; who seeing no conclusion, resolved to besiege Mouzon. In the meane time two thousand of his horse mutined, and would know whom they should serue, and who should pay them. Mansfield lying about Mouzon, to let them know that he was in treatie with the Duke of Neuers, and to enter into the Kings seruice; he put his Ordnance into the towne, and giue the Duke of Saxon Waymer, as hostage of his true intent. The Queene, knowing they should not bee able to leaue an armie in time, to make head against Mansfield, inuited Don Gonzales de Cordoba, General of the Spanish forces, to follow him and fight with him, who came presently with his Armie neere vnto Mouzon, and sent a Gentleman with Letters vnto the Earle of Grandpre, intring him to informe him of the state of the enemies armie; being ready to doe any thing for the most Christian Kings seruice. The Earle of Grandpre, who was assured from the D. of Neuers, that the King would make vse of Mansfield, and his troops, temporized, and would giue him no resolute answer, but referred him to the Queene and her Councell, thanking him for his good will; & intring him to continue.

Cunt

Count Mansfield seeing the Spanish armie in Luxembourg, and that of France ready to march; that the French had fed him with hopes as he had them with faire words: That they had giuen him no commodities but such as might reduce him to extremity, whereby he had lost many of his Souldiers: That as his men waited, the French army augmented, and approached neere the Frontiers: And that the Duke of Neuers abated still of his demands, he resolved with the Duke of Brunswicke to make a retreat to Breda in Brabant: But the difficulty was to retire the Duke of Szoozy in Waymer with his Artillery out of Mouzon: for the which he vied this policy, giuing the Earle of Grandpre to vnderstand that without any more treaty he was absolutely resolved to serue the King, and to march end would march to Cassine (a Castle three leagues off, belonging to the Duke of Neuers) and carry his artillery thither.

The Earle was easily perswaded to deliuer him his hostages and cannon, and so suffered him to depart with his carriages: but he tooke his course towards Mezieres, and sent to the Duke of Neuers to demand 6000 crownes to dismisse his troops, and for the first pay of such as should be entertained into the Kings seruice according to promise; but they varied so in their resolutions, as there was nothing performed of the treatie, but Mansfield fearing to be engaged betweene two armies, resolved to be gone.

The Kings army hauing mustred at Chasteauportien, the Commanders seeing Count Mansfield and the Duke of Brunswicke gone out of France; resolved first to send speedily to Don Gonzales who lay in Luxembourg on the other side of the Riuer of Meuze, to offer him the assistance of the Kings troops; and withall to follow Count Mansfield lest he should enter into France againe some other way. Don Gonzales being at Ivoy with 2500 horse and 7000 foot, hearing that Mansfield had taken his way towards Haynault, and that his great forces were reduced to five thousand horse, and five thousand foot, hee resolved to cut off their passage: where we will leaue them going towards Breda, after a great battell fought, much honor gotten, and as braue a retreat made, as hath bene in the memory of man.

Mansfield being vpon the frontiers of France, many of the Religion left the places of their abode and retired to Sedan, which breed occasion of much ialousie, so as many were stayed in passing, by the Gouvernors of towne and Prouinces. The Duke of Sully passing by Moulins in the night with foure boats laden with armes, goods, and money, went to lodge at Villeneuve three leagues off: The Earle of Charles Lieutenant to the Prince of Conde, being aduertised thereof, sent a gentleman to demand if hee had any passport from the King to retire himselfe, but he refusing to giue him any answer, the Earle went to horsebacke well accompanied after midnight, to Villeneuve, and summoned the Duke to yeeld himselfe, the which he did after some refusal, and was in the morning brought backe to the Castle of Moulins and put in safe custody, and an inventory taken of all which was found in those foure boats. The Earle aduertised the King of this action, who knowing that the D. desired to retire himselfe to his house at Sully, commanded that he should be set at liberty, and suffered to depart with all his train, armes and baggage, yet he allowed of the Earles action, and commended his fidelity.

At the same time the Earle of Suze was layed at Lions, by Aransfour d'Alincourt, suspected to be going to Sedan, to lead the Duke of Bouillons troops.

Many others were committed in diuers places, so as vpon the aduertisements which came daily, that many of the Religion left their dwellings, some for feare and apprehension, others to fauour the comming in of the strangers, and the Duke of Bouillons designed, the King made a Declaration, whereby he did forbid all his subjects of the Reformed Religion to abandon their houses and abodes where soeuer, to ioyne with them that were in armes, or with the strangers; nor to giue them any retreat, fauour, succour, or assistance: F vpon paine of Treason, and to be declared troublers of the publique peace.

The King caused his troops to aduance neere vnto Montpelier, to cut off their wayes, and all intelligence with Nismes and other reuolted towncs: Monseur Zamor lay next vnto them, and inuented a wily stratagem to draw them forth: He laid fire to five hundred horse in ambush within halfe a league of the Towne, and marched on with two or three hundred foot, with many great carts covered ouer and filled with Hay, sheaves, a croce, and faulcons charged with chaines and nails, and many musket barrels fastned together, all which might be charged in an instant: with these Carts and his foot in the plants places himselfe within halfe a league of the towne, making shew to reape the come, some of his souldiers being attired like countrymen. The Centinell seeing them, gaue the alarm, and the Citizens finding they were not about two or three hundred (never dreaming of any ambush) refused to send out six hundred musketeers to charge these haquest men, who seeing them come, made shew to retire, but being nere vnto them, they gaue fire to those wilde instruments which were in their Carts, whereupon they flue about one hundred vpon the place: their companions beganne to flye, but the horsemen brake out vpon them and charged them in flankes, so as most were cut in pieces, and few returned to the towne: which newes were very pleasing vnto the King, who resolved speedily to blocke vp the towne, hauing three thousand six hundred Reiters and Lanquenets brought vnto him by the Duke of Aluin, sonne to the Earle of Schomberg.

The Garrison of Montpellier deserted.

After the defeat of Monsieur de Soubise, in the Ile of Rue, and before the Kings going to Rayan, the Seneschall of Vioune had beene taken prisoner by Beaulieu younger brother to Dampierre; and caried to Rochel, where he was condemned to pay double ranfome, that is to say, to Beaulieu 1200 crownes, and to the Councell of 48, 600 crownes. Hauing presented the passport he received from the Assembly at Rochel to Monsieur de Vicq, hee shewed it vnto the King and to diuers of the Councell, all which were amazed at the reasones they vsed against the King, and his authoritie in the same. The Keeper of the Seales enforcing himselfe particularly of another prisoner which came from Rochel of the forme of this new common-wealth, he told him that besides the generall Assembly which was like the generall Councell of the League, by these words, We command you, as they did insert in their passports, They had erected three Councells: the first was a Councell of warre, called the Councell of 48, which resembled the Councell of the vniou of fixteene at Paris, which had beene the cause of so many miseries during the league. The second was the Councell of Justice, which did imitate a Court of Parliament. And the third was the Councell of the Admiraltie, which iudged of all prizes they tooke at sea. That the Presidents, Assistants, and Secretaries of the Assembly, were changed every two monthes, and in like manner the said three Councells: That at these changes there was much labouring to be named President, Assistant, or Secretary: They which had beene two monthes of the 48, were put into the Councell of Justice, or of the Admiraltie; And they of the Admiraltie were put into the Councell of 48, or of Justice: In all which three Councells they did put some of the Deputies of the Assembly and of the Towne-houfe: These Councells treated of the ranfome of prisoners, and of spoiles taken by Sea or Land: of confiscations and the reuennues of the Clergy: of imposts, customes, tributes, and the Kings reuennues. He sayd that the Nobility and Gentry which went to Rochel to assist them in this warre, were slightly regarded, and held in ieaiousie and distrust, for whensoever a Gentleman went out of his lodging, he was followed and watched by some inhabitant. Yea, he had scene after the taking of Sables D'Olonne, how Monsieur de Soubise hauing sent Malheray to Rochel, to haue leaue to suffer com to passe into Bourdeaux, whereby he should draw a great imposition to helpe to entertaine his army which increased daily, This demand being granted by the Assembly and them of the Towne-houfe, was hindered by the Councell of warre of 48: and vpon instant demand by Malheray to haue an answer, they peremptorily told him that they would make no other answer to Monsieur de Soubise but with the Cannon. This was the respect the Rochellers bare vnto their Generall.

The Gentry little esteemed at Rochel.

Touching their forces in the Towne, he said there were three companies of English, each consisting of an hundred men, (yet others which had serued there, report they had six hundred English.) There were some companies of French foot and some of horse besides the Burgesse which bare armes. That their chiefe strength was their army at Sea, whereof one Guisen a Burgesse of Rochel was Admirall, and about an hundred ships and places which scoured vp and downe; yet fish and wood was very deare within the Towne.

The state of the sea: of the Souldiers army before Rochel.

The King being at Xaintes as you haue heard, had resolved to leaue a part of his army in Poitou to blocke vp Rochel by land; he made the Earle of Soissons Generall, and the Marshall of Verry Lieutenant. This army which consisted of 6000 foot and 600 horse, was to keepe them by land from all commerce with the neighbour Prouinces and from enioying the fruits of their lands, lying without their wals.

They

A They were to build forts according to the direction of Pompeius Targou a great Engli-nier sent from the Pope, who should passe the Channell betwene Coreille and Chef de Bois with a chaine, to keepe ships from entering into the Towne. This army had their rendezvous on the 28 of Iune within a league of Rochel. They made their approaches and lodged at Laleu and Saint Maurice, where they beganne to build a fort, which the Townsmen did often seeke to interrupt, but it was finished by the 24 of September as you shall heare.

The Kings army preparing for the siege of Montpellier, Aimargues, Vauuert, and other weake townes thereabouts, razed their wals and retired themselves into Montpellier, Viez, Nismes, and other places. They fought to hinder the Lanquenets from ioyning with the Kings army, and to that end had put three hundred men well armed into Saint Giles; and they being led by the Duke of Aluin, and the Comte Rhyngraue, prepared to force it, whereupon they sent to Montpellier for succours, knowing they should not be long able to subsist.

On the 15 of Iuly they sent out seuen hundred choice men to annoy the said Lanquenets, whilst they were busie about forcing of the place; who being aduertised of their coming, went and charged them, and after some resistance defeated them, whereof most were slaine and taken prisoners: The besieged hearing of this defeat, fled away in the night and abandoned the towne.

Saint Giles the Lanquenets taken.

C The Kings armie led by the Prince of Conde, marched towards Berderine and Ginac which made some shew of resistance. Being come to Berderine, they battered it furiously, and it was well defended in the beginning, but there being a sufficient breach made, an assault was giuen with such fury, as the towne was forced, and many of the besieged slain, the rest had likewise perished, and the towne beene burnt to ashes, if the Commanders had not stayed the souldiers fury: His Maiestie was contented to be Master of the place, causing forty of the chiefe authors of this revolt to be apprehended and hanged, and the fortifications of the towne to be razed. His Maiesties meaning was to reduce Ginac, another reuolted Towne, to the end nothing might hinder the sieges of Montpellier, Nismes, Viez, and other townes of importance, if they persisted in their wilfulnesse and disobedience; but being better aduised then the other, and loath to lose it selfe miserably like to Negrepelisse, she preuented her ruine by her speedy returne to obedience, imploring his Maiesties mercy. So they within it yielded to what composition it should please the king to grant them, and deliuered the place, hauing a generall pardon: yet to preuent any future reuolt, and to saue the charges of a garison, he commanded the wals and fortifications should be razed.

Berderine forced.

Ginac yielded and pardoned.

After this, the army marched to besiege Lunel, a towne situated betwene Aiguemortes and Montpellier, hauing a garison of twelue hundred men to defend the place, which they beganne to batter. But in the meane time they had aduertisement that succours were coming to them, and were within two leagues of the place: whereupon they sent out certaine troops to encounter them, but they vnderstood they were past by certaine vn-knowne wayes, and entred by night into Lunel: The Kings Cannon continued the battery, notwithstanding the entry of these supplies; but there fell out a miserable accident; for the wind being very great, hauing giuen fire to a peece, the flame being driuen by a contrary gust, tooke hold of the powder with such fury, as a threescore souldiers were burnt, whereof most of them died.

Lunel besieged and yeeked.

The besieged seeing a great breach made, and an assault ready to be giuen; had recourse vnto the Kings mercy and vnto the Prince of Conde, who received them the eight of August, and granted them their liues, armes, and baggage, the souldiers to depart with their matches out: But at their coming forth the disorder was very great by reason of a cart laden with armes which the souldiers set vpon and rifed; and not so content, assailed the garison, who were glad to depart with the best things they had to escape their furie, by whom notwithstanding some of them were slaine.

This tumult came to the eares of the Prince and of the Marshall of Prassin, who drawing his sword, slew some of these pillagers which he met withall. On the morrow after, as they were bringing some carts of powder into the towne, the fire tooke therein againe which burnt some twenty houfes and some people, but the cause hereof could not bee knowne.

The King
comes to Lunel and the army besiege Sommières.

Two days after, the King entred Lunel, but the army went towards Sommières, which having defended it selfe in the year 1573 for the space of fixe weekes against the Marshall D'Amville, afterwards Constable, being battered with many Cannon, thought now to doe the like yet after the Kings army was once in sight: that the Seigneur de Fereville had yielded his Town and Castle, which is within Harquebuste fort of Sommières: that after their best opposition and couragious defending of their approaches (wherein some persons of note of the army were slain and hurt, as namely, the Duke of Aluin in the legge) they were faine to retire: that their suburbs after their strongest resistance (in which some famous Captaines were lost, and namely, the Seigneur de Lancheres, a Captaine of the Regiment of Piedmont, and an Ayde of the Camp, and one whom the King more lamented then any other in all these warres) were also wonne: their trenches gotten, and the foot of their wall, where they flew Fountaines a Lieutenant of the Regiment of Piedmont: that a fearfull battery was ready which discovered them behind, and now within 24. houres had made a reasonable breach, and that they were without hope of succours, they yielded, their liues and goods saved, without armes. The King in person assisted at their coming forth, that good order might bee exactly obserued within and without, and the garison was with all safety conducted, being in number twelue hundred men.

The death of so many braue Noblemen, Captaines and Souldiers slaine, as well as the sieges of townes as in combats, and so much people lost and ruined in six monthes, since the Kings departure from Paris, made many desire a peace, with this addition, So as it might not be dishonorable: for there was not only a great losse of men of warre, but euen of the chiefe of the Kings Councell which died in this voyage, or were sicke to the extremity, as well through toyle and the change of ayre, as by the intemperatenesse of the season: amongst the which the Cardinal of Retz, President of the Councell, died the 16 of August of a feuer, and was much lamented of many. Monsieur de Vieg, Keeper of the Seales of France, did also yeeld his soule to God on the second of September, a personage growne old in the seruice of the King and State; the offices which hee had worthily discharged, and the Embassies wherein hee had bene employed, had brought him by degrees to this eminent place; the which the King gaue afterwards to President Comartin, one of his ancient Cancellors of State.

The King having left the Duke of Vendosme with eight thousand foot and five hundred horse, to cleanse Guienne, with the Countries of Foix and Albigeois, and to take such places about Montauban as denied him obedience: He resolved to besiege Lombes, a towne which did much import; for the communication it had with Castres, Montauban, Raimont, Saint Paul, Puy Laurens, and other reuolted townes, being situated in the midst of them; the which he inuested on the 26 of Iuly, and the souldiers lodged vpon the Countercarpe, notwithstanding any resistance the Garison made. The Cannon playd vpon them, and the Marquis of Maloze shewed himselfe with two thousand foot, and three hundred horse to fight with him, so as they were glad to retire to Raimont. The besieged seeing themselves pressed by the Cannon, and out of hope of succours, they being retired, resolved to abandon it, and to save themselves by a Port which remained free, in regard they wanted men in the army, the which they did, leaving their families and goods. The Duke advancing his troops at the breake of day to give an assault, found the breach abandoned, and the gates open, which made him doubt that the enemy had some hidden designe: whereupon he lost to discouer, and being assured there were none but women and children in the towne, he caused them to be put in safety, and gaue the spoile to the souldiers, commanding the wals and fortifications to be razed.

The Duke having fortified his army with the Regiment of the Prince of Martigues his second sonne, being twelue or thirteene hundred men, he came to Saint Supplice, where he receiued news that they of Montauban during his absence and the Marshall of Themines, had made roads, and taken Renierz, with foure or five Castles about that towne, and that Monsieur de Montbrun (who commanded the souldiers in Montauban) was aduanced with three hundred horse, and what foot he could draw together, and had taken the Castle of Villebrunier vpon the River of Tar, a league from Villemur. Vpon this aduice the Duke poeas away with his horse, caught his foot to follow, and doubles the draught of

A of the Cannon, to goe the swifter, he surprised Montbrun on the sudden, who beganne to fortifie the Castle, and forced him to reue upon spurre to Renierz; his footmen being thus disordered, disperked and saved themselves, some in the Vines, others retired themselves into the Castle of Villebrunier, the which being inuested, the besieged grew amazed, and slipped downe in the night (being very darke) into the ditches and saved themselves by flight by wayes, only some were taken, whereof nine were hanged, and the truth fauted in regard of this young yeare; after which the Duke recovered Renierz, and all the best places which Montbrun and they of Montauban had taken, and then lodged his army vpon all the approaches to Montauban; where they took three Epies, whom they had sent forth with Letters from Montbrun to the D. of Rohan, whom he qualified General of the Reformed Churches of France, and with many other priuate Letters, containing their friends to find meanes to free them of the great miseries wherein they were, being oppressed with contributions, lodging of souldiers, continual guard, and want of necessities; the common people having no other sustenance but bread and water; and having so done with a Prince which slept not, so as they should be forced to retire the miseries if they had not speedie liberty giuen them by a good peace. Thus were their waies discovered, and their messengers hanged for their paynes.

After the deduction of so many places in Languedoc, Foix, Albigeois, and other Provinces, the Duke of Rohan seeing their affaires to decline daily, that there remained only Montpellier, Nismes, Vica, Castres, and some few other places which held their parties, all threatened with sieges, and deputed of assistance and succours from their neighbours which were already reduced: he resolved to reconcile himselfe by the mediation of the Constable D'Esperguyres, to whom he went (being at Pont Saint Esprit) the which the Constable receiued willingly, & obtained leave from the King to treat with him, in which before that time there were some Weekes spent, but nothing yet concluded.

The common people suspected that the Duke of Rohan treated for his owne particular, and that he would abandon them; whereupon hee obtained a passport from the King to goe into Montpellier to conferre with the Deputies of that Circle, and the Consuls of the Towne; and for that they grew obstinate, seeing the Kings army but small and weak, it made his Maiesty approach vnto Veronne, where the Constable came vnto him, every man thinking a peace had beene concluded; wherewith many of the chiefe were discontented, thinking the Kings hands to be interceded by some secret Articles. Others seeing the souldiers grow cold, and that Montpellier was well fortified, held the Kings presence more necessary at Paris, then to enter into a long siege, in September, the count whereof might prove doubtfull: In the end, they which held for the warre, prevailed; or rather they of Montpellier who desired no peace. They write, that many Tickers were sent vnto them, by which they were giuen to vnderstand, that if they yielded vpon condition the King should enter (which was the chiefe point of the treaty) they were undone: whereupon resolution was giuen, to besiege the towne, and the Constable to be leaue of the King to returne into Dauphine, seeing the Prince, ignorant for the command of the army, having charge from his Maiesty to treat still with Monsieur de Rohan.

The Earle of Solons, being before Rochel, and continuing the making of this Port, there were many sallies and encounters made by them of the towne, in one of which Ensis, he who had intured Monsieur de Roisse Paradillon the year before, in Genoa, was taken. The Earle planned certaine pieces of Ordnance vpon his fort, and shot into the towne to mite their houses, which did much amaze the inhabitants. There grew some division in the towne among the Commanders, some adhering vnto Le Roisse, some to Fandi. In Iuly, Pomphrey Targen the Earles Engineer, had past the Channell at a slow voyer, and measured the breadth of it with a line, and on the fourth of August the chaine of iron which should shut vpon the Channell was brought. In 35 Cartes; and yet was it not all, and they planned two Cannons vpon the Sea side, to hinder the passage of the Rochelers, so as they could not approach so neere the shore as they had done.

The Rochelers being much weakened by the overthrow of their army vnder Monsieur de Roisse in the life of Rie, they deuised all the means they could to get men out of Normandy, and sending some of their faction with Letters vnto diuers of the Religion in that Proruince, as well to leave, as to make some surpris; they write that in May before, there were thike of those men taken in Alepcon, whereof the one returned himselfe was du Secretary de la Rochelle, who being examined upon the contents of these Letters and Instructions, were sent to the Court of Parliament at Rouen. There was another practice discovered, as they write, for the surprizing of Cherbourg, a Sea towne of great importance in bafe Normandy, the which was prevented by the care of Monfieur de Montignon Lieutenant general for the King, who having taken the ploy upon the fort of Cherbourg, and upon the port, the secret intelligences they had with the Governor of the towne, and the inhabitants of the Religion: he dismissed the Governor, and changed the garison, visited the place, and supplied the defects. The Rochellers ships which should have executed this enterprise upon Cherbourg being returned, they had commandement to keepe themselves ready, and to ioyne with the rest, to hinder the Kings Fleet, which they heard would bee within few dayes upon the Coast of Britany, to ioyne with those of that Province and of Normandy, all which would make a body of about 60 sailes, besides the Gallies, meaning to lie in the Road before Rochel, and to blocke it up by sea, as well as it was by land, and to beginne the siege when it should please the King. The Gallies being come into the Riuer of Nantes, the whole Fleet attended the coming of the Duke of Guise, who was appointed Generali and came to Paris in the beginning of August, where making small stay, hee passed into Britany, and arrived at Nantes about the end of the month. The Captaines and Commanders of the Gallies of Marseilles, lying at Couron three leagues off, in stead of coming to salute him and receive his commandements (as they ought to have done) went out of the Riuer and put to Sea, as if they meant to returne to Bourdeaux, making this way they did affect the Generali of the Gallies, betwixt whom and the Duke there had beene some private discontent, for the command of those Gallies: Notwithstanding, the Duke had commission from the King to be Admirall of his Fleet at Sea against the Duke of Rochel. In the end this iocaloufie was reconciled, the Duke acknowledged for Generali, and the Gallies returned into the Riuer of Nantes to receive his commandements: so as hee embarked speedily to goe to Breff, to draw all the Fleet together in Pont Louis or Blauet, from thence to goe in gresse to assault the Ile of Rieneire Rochel, and spare the Rochellers the paines of gathering in their Vintage there.

But as hee returned to Languedoc: the King had resolved to besiege Montpellier, notwithstanding that the world expected the conclusion of a peace, they thought the towne would have beene content their new fortifications should be razed; that the Catholiques should be restored to their former liberty; that the Kings Officers should be restored to their places, honors, and dignities; that those which were absent, should be recalled, and in signe of obedience, they should receive a Catholique Garison under a Governor of the Religion: All these things (as they write) had beene concluded; and the King was to enter with his army, but on the last of August, his Majesties guards comming to seize upon the ports and walls, (as they are accustomed to doe in the reduction of Townes, before the King comes), and the rest of the army being in battell to give passage to the garison which should returne, according to the Articles of the Treaty) they within felt into a mutinie, and shut their gates against the Kings troops, letting them know, that they were resolved to defend themselves and to die like souldiers, willing them to retire: whereupon the Kings army advanced, and forced a Port called Saint Denis. The besieged seeing it taken, sent out a Trumpet to complaine of this enterprise made contrary to the Treaty, which they said they would entertaine, but it was onely to discover the state of the Kings army, and to recover it, who seeing small guard in the Campe, and their quarters scattered, the besieged resolved to make a furious sally; and to recover it: and to take away all knowledge of their resolution from the Kings Centinels, they opened an old Port which had beene for many years together mured up, and filled forth to the number of 1500 foot, and 80 horse; they surprized the guards, slew some, and put the rest to flight, where divers commanders, Captaines, and Gentlemen were slaine. The Alarme came to the Kings quarter. The Duke of Montmorency who was then present, with the Duke of Fronlac, went speedily to horse backe with all the Gentlemen which were about the King; and charged the enemy, hewing great proofes of their valour and resolution, yet the Kings losse was great, the Duke of Fronlac was slaine, Monfieur de Montmorency hurt in the belly and thigh with a pike. There were also slaine the Marquis of Beuron, the Baron of Canillac, the Seigneurs of Estrange, Luçon the elder, Cambolet, and many others: There were few

A souldiers slaine, for they fled; but the Kings army advancing with all speed, they were forced to retire and leave the place.

This did much incense them throughout all France against them of the religion. At Orleans the newes of the Duke of Fronlacs death made them ready to take armes against them, offering unto the Earle of Saint Paul to employ their liues and armes to take reuenge for his sonne: but the Earle answered, that hee was sufficiently grieved for his death, not desiring to see any sedition in a towne which his Maiefty had committed to his care, entreating them to containe themselves in peace. But matters past not so quietly at Lions, where the common people, ioyning with a number of youth, fell upon them of the religion, spoiled their houses, burnt some with all their goods, and flew and hurt diuers: the which the Governor, Magistrate, nor Guards were able to prevent; and if the Queene Mother had not beene in the towne, and come unto the place where this tumult was, it had not beene pacified without great murder and spoile of them of the religion, where they are more hated then in any towne of France.

The King having received this losse at the fort of Saint Denis, sent consolatory Letters unto the Earle of Saint Paul, and the Lady his wife, upon the death of the Duke of Fronlac their son. The siege continued, and many braue sallies and charges were on either side. Upon the seuenth of September they tooke a spy comming out of Montpellier with Letters to the Duke of Rohan, to sollicite him to send them succours speedily, or else they were undone. He told them that they of Montpellier had attired twelue hundred women like souldiers, to make shew to the Kings army that they had many men. In the meane time they fell upon the Duke Montmorency quarter; Monfieur Zamer Marshall of the Campe came presently thither, and seeing the souldiers retire, said unto them, Souldiers, yett live! To whom they answered, Sir, we have no more powder nor shot. What (said he) have you neither sword nor pike? These words touched them to the quicke, and made them returne to their trenches, where he found the Capaines, who said unto him, Sir, you will be a witness that you have found us doing our duties. Having repulsed the enemy, and returning to another place, meeting upon the way with the Seigneur of Coudron, an Ayde of the Campe, they had both their thighs broke with a Cannon shot from the Port of Peyrou, whereof Monfieur Zamer died five dayes after, to the great griefe of the King and the whole army. On the 22 of September the King resolved to attempt an out-work betwixt two bastions at midnight, to the end the darkness might make their bastions and curtains vnfruisceable: whereupon six or seven hundred of the besieged sallied forth, but they were beaten, and the worke taken, where the Kings men entrenched themselves. This conflict continued about two houres, with losse on both sides: On the Kings were slaine Tarroul, Lieutenant to the Duke of Luxembourg, Governor of Blaye, Captaine Lage, the Seigneur of Mironde, and Captaine La Ben, and some souldiers: the besieged (as they write) lost about 200 of their best men.

The Kings army was too weak to invest Montpellier on all sides, victuals waxed very scant, and were passing deare: they found no forage for their horses, sicknesse increased, and the fruits and grapes of Autumne killed more men then the shot and sword of the enemy. The King to strengthen himselfe with more men, sent for the Duke of Vendosme from the siege of Britelle to ioyne with his army, and to the Prince of Conde to haften his regiment of Berry, which was said to be embarked at Lions: unto Monfieur Brisson to come unto the army with his regiment: to the Seigneur of Montspan to bring his: unto the Seigneurs of Tremont and of Ragny, who were leauying of two regiments in Bourgundy, to haften them to come into Languedoc with all speed: and to the Duke of Angoulême to bring six thousand men as well horse as foot, of the army which was leauied to defend the frontiers of Champagne against Mansfield, seeing the apprehension of all danger was past. They brought come downe the riuer of Roine, with artillery and munition for the siege of Montpellier. About the same time the D. of Espernon was made Governor of Guienne, which place had been voyd since the death of the Duke of Mayen. In the end of September the King battered the towne with 16 pieces of Ordnance, and the besieged seeing themselves cooped up, beganne to entrench themselves within the Towne, forcing all in generall, men, women, and children, to labour in the trenches. They made a reasonable breach in the wall, but the King would not give an assault, fearing they had some myne; and withall seeing his army tired, hee desired to bee refreshed with new forces before he would attempt it, yet they still advanced their works, in the which there were diuers encounters, and many slaine: amongst others, Captaine an old Captain of the Regiment of the Guards, and M. de Requelme General of the Venetians, (who had succeeded in the place of Monsieur Zanes) with Captaine Saint John, and many others. The disorder was great in this combat, where the Kings troops flying away, young Gittereau and Guyemant were slaine. In the end the Duke of Espemon seeing this confusion, drew his sword and commanded the Seigneur of Nantes to charge with an hundred Pikes, and as many voluntaries, which made the besieged retire.

The Pope commands them of Auignon to assist the King.

During this siege the Pope had commanded his Vice Legat to supply the King with armes, powder, munition, victuals, and all other necessaries, and if his Maiesty had a desire in his returne from Languedoc or otherwise to visit Auignon, that he should prepare to receiue and entertaine him and his Cour as his owne person. And for that the Kings army was full of infectious diseases, the inhabitants of Marcellles, to witnesse their affection to the Kings seruice, offered that if the King pleased to send the sicke men of his army vnto their towne, they should be carefully lodged and entreated at their owne charges, wherewith the King was verie well pleased. In the meane time, new troops come towards Montpellier for the King. The Duke of Rohan was in Nismes with most of his forces, and the troops that were in Suennens and Vauarets, which he might easily draw together to succour Montpellier: the King hearing of their intent by some spies which were taken, and in which way they would come, tooke such order as they durst not attempt it.

Their factions encreased daily at Rochel for command, the people being ready to ruine one another; they which had not commands according to their desires, turned their coats, left the towne, and went daily to the Earle of Soissons troops, and to Monsieur de Saint Luc at Brouage, and made more cruell warre against the Rochellers then any other.

A Combat at Sea.

Vpon the nineteenth of Septemb: there was a great fight at Sea, betwixt the Marquis of Rouillac who commanded the Fleet in Brouage, and the Rochellers: the Marquis having a Gallion called S. Michael, and tenne smaller ships, wherof six were runne aground and could not follow the rest, going to ioine with the Duke of Guise, Admirall of the Fleet. The Rochellers attended them at the beginning of the flood, being 14 ships, and bent their course towards Brouage, where meeting them, they beganne the fight, which continued fix houres vntill the ebbe, and then retired without any great advantage on either side. Touching the Affaires of Rochel, and the estate of the Kings army, you cannot be better satisfied then by this Letter written from the Judge of the Army vnto the first President of Bourdeaux on the 24. of September.

A Letter to the first President of Bourdeaux from the Judge of the Army.

Sir, the Count Soissons Fort is now in defence, and furnished with foureteene pieces of Ordnance, he hath sent fortwenty more to batter the towne furiously. The Rochellers haue great want of money and wood, and their fleet is ready to leaue them for want of pay. They haue taxed thirty of their best inhabitants at an hundred Crowns apiece, ten or twelue haue paid willingly, some with griefe, and others by force. All men of quality desire to yeeld obedience to the King, and are not kept backe but by the impudency of some factious people, who threaten to thrust 15 or 16 out of the Assemblée, saying, they are the cause of all their miseries. We attend daily the proceedings of the Kings fleet, which vndoubtedly will be master of the Seas, considering the estate wherunto the enemy is reduced. The Flemish ships which lay by vs are goneladen with salt. On Monday last, most of the English came out of the towne to our army, where they were well entertained and feasted. My Lord gaue them money and a guard to conduct them to Nantes, where they desired to imbarke themselves to returne into their Country, exclaiming against the discomforts they had receiued in Rochel, and seeming very glad to be at liberty. The Lieutenant who commanded them with the rest of the English, haue beene committed to prison; we attend hourly what will become of them: but this is not the way to haue Englishmen another time.

We haue a braue Sea-man of Brouage called Sainton of the reformed religion; but a sworne enemy to the Rochellers, who hath past through their fleet, and lodged vnder the fauour of our forts: hee takes all the Barkes which bring meale to Rochel, and euen yesterday hee tooke foure at their Charge. Hee lies within our Cannon shot of the Enemy, but neere our Forts and supported by our Cannon; so as when they

A they shoot at him, we shoot at them: Thus we make warre by Sea and Land, and forget nothing which may bring honor and reputation to the Kings forces.

But returning into Languedoc, you shall vnderstand, that some horse-men passing out of Nismes towards Auignon, tooke the Popes Legat, with the Seigneurs of Portes, Baudouin a Treasurer, and some others prisoners, and brought them to their towne, but they were set at liberty, paying their ranlomes. This Legat a little before had presented Letters vnto his Maiesty from his Holinesse, who did congratulate his victories, and continued him not to thrust himselfe into danger, whereby in his person hee should hazard the hope of Christendome.

The Popes Legat and others taken prisoners.

In the meane time, the Constable by the Kings commandement, had often conference with the Duke of Rohan, whereby they found means to enter into a treaty of peace, prolected euer since February; many times begunne, and as often broken off. Many contradicted this designe, and represented the state whereunto they had reduced them of the religion, whom his Maiesty in six months might wholly ruine or force to obedience: That the King and all France should reape profit thereby, when as the malecontented should haue no place of refuge, and the people should be freed from the apprehension of falling into new troubles: That they of the religion would promise much, but neuer effect the razing of their fortifications but by force: That within six months they should be constrained to renew the warre: finally, they objected many reasons against the peace which was in hand.

Opinions concerning the Peace.

But the King hauing stronger considerations, according to the aduice of the most ancient officers of the Crown, finding great advantage in the propositions and offers which the Duke of Rohan then made, he commanded the Constable to conclude the business, and come to the Campe; but the Marshall of Crequy came before, and (as they write) brought the first newes vnto the King, of the obedience which Monsieur de Rohan was resolved to yeeld vnto his Maiesty, and that he would draw them of Montpellier to submit themselves.

This Treaty was held very secret, vntill that the King causing the Prince of Conde to come priuately vnto him, told him, that he had receiued newes by a Poste, that the Duke of Rohan was resolved to obey him, and so cause the Deputies of the Reformed Churches, with the Inhabitants of Montpellier, to yeeld him all sorts of submission; and withall to haue the Articles put in execution, touching the razing of the new fortifications, in all the townes which were held by them of the religion; wherewith his Maiesty held himselfe well satisfied, resolving to giue peace vnto his subiects.

The King resolves to giue peace to his subiects.

The Prince shewing some discontent, for that it had beene treated without his priuaty, hee humbly besought the King, that seeing hee had now no more need of his person, it would please him to giue him leaue to goe and performe a vow which hee had made to our Lady of Lorette, which his Maiesty presently granted, and he left the Campe with a small traine.

The Prince of Conde goes to our Lady of Lorette.

During these negotiations, the Duke of Neuers hauing freed Champagne from the feare of Mansfelds army, finding a fit opportunity, and hauing good forces in the County of Retheleux, he lodged his troops as neere as possibly he could to Sedan, forbidding all men to transport any come or victuall out of the Realme, and by consequent to Sedan, which is out of France, and withall dispersed his troops round about it, in such sort, as victuall grew exceeding deare; especially bread, by reason of the multitude of families which were retired thither during the troubles. The Duke of Bouillon was troubled with this proceeding, he complained to the King, and wrote to the Councell at Paris, desiring to know what they intended to doe: The Duke of Neuers sent vnto the King at the same time to know his pleasure touching Sedan; for that there was neuer so faire an opportunity offered to besiege it. His Maiesty tired with so many troubles which oppressed the people, sent him word by the Marquis of Vicuville, that he should dismisse his troops, or send them with his army of Champagne, which was marching towards Montpellier, which had committed a thousand thefts, cruelties, and spoiles, more then enemies could haue done.

Sedan besieged by the Duke of Neuers.

In the meane time Mansfeld (leaving the Frontiers of France) had sent word to the Duke of Neuers, that he gaue the King the Ordnance which he left in Sedan, who shewing this Letter to the Duke of Bouillon, made instance in his Maiesties name to haue it delivered, but he made answer, that Manfield had sold them vnto him, and moreover that the Prince A Palatine opposed himselfe, saying, that they were his and not Manfields, for prooffe whereof, if hee would visit the peeces, hee should finde his Aimes.

At Rochel the Kings Fleet had not yet done any great exploit, onely they had taken one ship at the Sea, wherein were diuers Gentlemen of Normandy going to Rochel: the Fleet lay at Blauet, from whence the Duke of Guise sent to summon the English and Hollanders who lay with their ships before Rochel, to declare themselves what party they would follow, and then he resolved to goe with the Fleet against the Islands of Rie and Oleron, and to make himselfe Master thereof, with an intent to ioyne with the ships of Broage, and to fight with the Rochellers if they offered themselves, and the wind and B tyde would giue him leaue.

In the meane time the Duke of Rethelois, eldest sonne to the Duke of Neuers, (being but fifteene or sixteene yeares old) died at Mezieres, a young Prince of very great hope. This death did very much afflict the Duke his father, who had grounded the support of his House vpon the generosity of this Sonne, whose body was caried to Neuers, and interred by his mother, and the Duke himselfe went to the King.

The Constable comes to the army.

But returning to the treaty, the Constable came vnto the King when euery man held the peace assured, yet he went to view the trenches and gaue it out that the peace was broken: But soone after there was a truce concluded for foure or fve dayes, during the which they visited one another, and the Gentlemen of Montpellier came walking to the halfe-moone to view the Campe.

In the meane time newes came, that the Marquis of Maloze would put himselfe into Montpellier to fauour such as would not heare speake of a peace; whereupon the King went to horsebacke, and so continued all night, but the next day these newes were found false.

The Duke of Rohan goes into Montpellier.

The Articles of the peace being concluded on the ninth of October, the Duke of Rohan entred into Montpellier on the eleventh, where there were many seditious persons which refused to murder him, calling him Scamberlat, a name inuented among them for such of the religion as they held to be the Kings seruants.

In the end, after many Assemblies, they of Montpellier promised to obey, and to obferue this treaty of peace concluded for the general of al the reformed Churches of France and Berne. There seemed to be some difficulties in the execution thereof, for the clearing of which, the Constable, the Duke of Rohan, with the Deputies of the Seuennes, Nismes, Vizey, and Montpellier, had diuers conferences vnder the Fort of Saint Denis, where in the end a peace was fully resolved.

The D. of Rohan in performance of that which he had promised, came the eighteenth of October in the evening to the Kings quarter, most of the Court being retired, so as the King was almost alone; he kneeled downe before his Maiestie, and craved pardon for bearing armes against him: the King said, Be you better aduised for the time to come, and I will forget what is past. So hauing made him rise vp, they changed their discourse, and halfe an houre after, the Duke retired to the Constables quarter, where he lay all night. On the morrow he entred againe into Montpellier, and came soone after forth with the Seigneur of Gallogne, Gouvernor thereof, and all the Deputies of the other townes, who came to beseech his Maiesty to giue them peace, and to pardon their faults past: Hee presented them before his Maiestie, where all of them vpon their knees craved pardon and peace, by the mouth of the foresaid Seigneur of Gallogne, who spake for them all, saying:

Sir, We are sent from all the reformed Churches of France, and the Soueraignty of Berne, most humbly to craue (in their names) peace of your Maiesty, and with our hearts humbled more then our bodies, we begge by the same, most humbly beseeching you to beleue that the false reports which were dispersed amongst vs, of the designs your Maiestie had against our religion, haue plunged vs in these miseries: we desire not to palliate the crime, we confesse our selues guilty: wherefore we present our selues vnto your Maiestie to craue pardon, and humbly beseech you to receiue vs into grace, and after the example of God (whose image you are) to haue a regard to our infirmities & to yield some thing to the feare we had to see the liberty of our consciences oppressed. The more culpable your Maiestie shall find vs, the more place shall you haue to imploy your Clem-

The King answered, that he willingly pardoned them, vpon condition they should be wiser hereafter then they had beene, that they should be good subjects to him, and he would be a very good King to them. After which they approached neere vnto the King one after another, to make their submissions: first the Seigneur of Calogne, then the Deputies of Seuennes, after them Vizey, and Nismes, and lastly they of Montpellier, all which B the King receiued according to his accustomed clemency, and then causing them to rise, he commanded the Seigneur Herbaud to reade a Declaration which he had caused to be made for the peace. The same day after dinner, the Constable entred into Montpellier with the Marshalls of Crequi and Bassompierre, and foure thousand Soldiers, who seized vpon the Ports, Magazines, Cannons, and two of the chiefe Bastions. The Grand Prauost battering caused the Kings decree touching peace to be solemnly proclaimed in the Kings quarter and trenches, hee entred into Montpellier and did the like; and the Harbours were marked out their lodgings for the Court, after the accustomed manner.
The next day being the 21 of October, the Soldiers which were within the towne came forth in very good order, being twelve hundred in number, who were receiued by Mon-
C seigneur de la Courte, and part of the Kings horle, and were conducted whither they desired.

After dinner the King entred in armes with his whole Court. His reception was stately; considering the shortnesse of time, and the difficulties of warre; all their rich hangings and precious moueables which they had hidden for feare of a sacke, were now brought forth, and set to view to honour this happy entry. They stroue to expresse their duties, the ioy was general, and nothing was heard, but the acclamations of the inhabitants of both sexes, who cried continually, God saue the King. The Consuls being accompanied with the best inhabitants of the towne, came to meet him, witnessing by the speech they made vnto his Maiesty, that they were much grieued to haue offended him, and be-lought him (in presenting the keys of the Towne, and their selues, and their liues) to extend D his mercy vnto them, and not to punish their crimes, and the transgressions of his lawes with other armes then those of his Clemency and Pity. His Maiesty granted what they demanded, vpon condition that hereafter they should be faithfull, and neuer take armes against his seruice vpon any pretext whatsoever: That they should suffer their new fortifications to be razed, their defences ruined, and their ditches filled vp, till the which were done and accomplished, they should haue three Regiments in Garison, and should obey whatsoever did concerne his Maiesties seruice.

Vizey which hath the title of a Duchy, would no longer persist in her disobedience; but submitted in imitation of Montpellier, and for the better assurance, consented the Castle should be razed and the fortifications demolished. The Towne of Nismes followed their E example. The Duke of Rohan was left Gouvernor of these two townes, and of Millhaud, yet could he not put in say garison. Many other townes desired to be numbered amongst the obedient, and of those which would not contradiet the Kings will. In the meane time Commissioners were sent to all the Courts of Parliament, to carie the declaration of peace, and to haue it verified, the tenure whereof followeth.

Vizey and Nismes submit
themselves.

L E W I S by the grace of God, &c. As euery Christian Prince fearing God should ab-bound not onely to auoid the occasions of ciuill and domestique warres, but to embrace F all honorable and lawfull means to vniue his subjects vnder the lawes of State in good concord and obedience. The same Diuine bounty which hath knowne our hearts since it hath pleased him to call vs to the government of this French Monarchy; is Iudge of our intention; and the world knows that our armes haue beene as iust as forced and necessarie, for the vpholding and defence of our authority; either against those which in the beginning, vnder diuers borrowed pretexts haue stirred vp trouvie of their simplicity, as of the publique division of our Realme; although our intention was neuer other (after the example of Kings our predecessors) than to maintain them in peace and union vnder the benefit of our Edicts, and to conserue them as our good and faithfull subjects; if they containe themselves within the termes of respect and submission due vnto the Soueraigne; having spared no admonition and care, to prevent the mischief which was easie to foresee, before wee came to armes, whereunto wee were forced to our great griefe; to preserve our Royall dignity, and the power which God hath given vs, to see them from the altitudes and loudes which have bene given them with much art and cunning; of our good content, which hath neuer failed any man; and to prevent the accidents and miseries which have followed; and to make them know (with the end of the chiefe authors and favourers of this publique disorder) the true grounds of our sincere intentions, to cherish and maintaine them all in peace, and the free enioying of that which hath bene granted by our Edicts. And for that our subjects of the reformed religion have bene since better inspired, and acknowledged their fault and this truth; having had recourse to our clemency and bounty, by humble petitions from their Deputies, to grant them pardon, and to abolish the memory of what was past; and to respect them hereafter as our other faithfull subjects; inclining away rather to mildnesse and mercy, then to venge-ance and iudice of our armes, although they haue gotten vs great advantages, and might make vs hope for the like issue: Having respect to their submissions and duties, and being desirous to giue peace vnto our Realme; and vnto all our subjects in amity and concord among themselves, and to a generall and soyn obedience towards vs, and for other important reasons and considerations theunto moving vs: By the aduice of the Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of the Crowne, and chiefe of our Councill, wee haue ordained; and by these presents declare vnder our hand, and our pleasure is,

The Articles of the Peace.

I. That the Edict of Nantes, and secret Articles enrolled in our Courts of Parliament, shall be faithfully observed to our subjects of the Reformed Religion, in all points as they have enjoyed them during the reigne of the deceased King our Lord and Father; and since our coming to the Crowne, before those last alterations.

II. That the exercise of the Catholique and Romish Religion; shall be restored in all places of this Realme; and Countreies of our obedience, where it hath bene intermitted, to be freely continued without any trouble.

III. We expressly forbid all persons of what estate and condition soever, upon paine of punishment, as breakers of the peace, and trouble of the publique quiet, to molest or trouble Clergy-men in the celebration of Divine Service, and in the enioying of their Offices, Fruits, and Revenues of their Benefices, and all other rights which belong vnto them.

IV. And in like manner the exercise of the reformed Religion shall be restored againe in those places where it hath bene, according to our Edicts and Grants, and the Statutes, Officers of Receipt, and Officers of the Treasuries; shall be restored to the same estate they were in before those last troubles, except the Chamber of Narce, which shall bee restored where we shall thinke good, having heard the complaints of the Deputies of our Province of Guienne.

V. Our pleasure is, that all new fortifications of Townes, Castles, Forts, and others held by our subjects of the Reformed Religion, and especially those which have bene made in the Islands of Rie and Oleron, shall be razed and demolished, the old wals, towers, ports, ditches, and countermines, remaining in their former estate; forbidding all tomes to fortifie any more: And for the execution of the said demolishments, some of the chiefe inhabitants of the said Townes shall be delivered in hostage to such as we shall please to appoint.

VI. To the end that the Officers of our Crowne, and others deputed, may execute the commands thereof, according to the instructions which shall be given them: our meaning is, that all Townes held by them of the Religion; which within fifteen daies after the publication of these presents, shall submit themselves to our obedience, and open their gates willingly vnto vs; shall enjoy the contents of this present Declaration.

VII. We expressly forbid our subjects of the Reformed Religion; all sorts of Assemblies, Circles,

A Circles, Councels, Abridgement of Synods, and all other of what quality soever, upon paine of Treason, if they haue not expresse leave from vs: But they are onely allowed Assemblies of Consistories, Conferences, and Synods for matters concerning the government and discipline of the said Reformed Religion: forbidding them expressely to treat of any other politike affaire.

VIII. Our said subjects of the reformed Religion, shall be discharged and freed from all acts of hostility and from all Assemblies, and Circles, and from all other things whatsoever contained in the 76 and 77. Articles of our Edict of Nantes, from the first of January 1621, until this present.

IX. And for what hath happened at Prinas, we will that a particular abolition thereof be made vnto the inhabitants of the said place, and vnto the Seigneur of Brisson.

X. And concerning the Accomptables and other officers in matters belonging to their charges, we will that the 78 and 79 Articles of the Edict of Nantes, shall be wholly kept and observed.

XI. Likewise for the indgements, sentences, and condemnations, made against them of the reformed religion, which haue borne armes; We will that they be thereof discharged according to the 58, 59, and 60 Articles of the said Edict.

XII. So also we ratifie and confirme all indgements given by Iudges ordained by the Governors of Provinces, either in ciuill or criminall causes, and the executions which haue followed amongst those of their party, and the said Iudges to be freed from all pursuits in that behalf.

C Imposing perpetual silence to our Preachers Generally, their Substitutes, or any other that may pretend interest.

XIII. Our pleasure is, that all prisoners on both sides, which haue not paid their ransomes, shall be freely set at liberty; and all promises made for ransomes which haue not bene discharged before the day of the date hereof, shall be void and of no effect.

XIV. That all persons of what quality and condition soever, shall be restored to their goods, names, actions, honours, and dignities, whereof they haue bene deprived, by reason of these presents troubles; notwithstanding all gifts and confiscations which haue bene made, except military charges: And such as haue willingly treated, or to whom we meane to giue some recompence.

D XV. We ordaine that this present Declaration shall be entertained and kept by all our subjects according to the forme set downe in the eight Article of our Edict of Nantes: and that Commissioners of both Religions, shall be sent by vs into all the Provinces, to see the contents thereof put in execution. Commanding all our Courts of Parliament, and all other Iustices and Officers to whom it shall appertaine, to cause these presents to be read, registered, and enrolled, and to be inuicably observed and kept, without any contravention, for such is our pleasure. Given in our Campe at Montpellier the nineteenth of October, 1622. and the 13 of our Reigne. Signed Lewis.

E Monseur de Fiat being sent with this Declaration vnto the Court of Parliament at Paris, the Duke of Rohan gaue him this Letter following to the Duke of Montbazon.

My Lord, your * first sonne in law hath endeouored to ruine our * Houleyour * second hath procured vs peace and confirmed it; and for my part I am so satisfied with him, and find my selfe so much bound vnto him, as I shall openly declare my selfe vnthankfull, if I should euer shew my selfe other then his most humble servant: Of a delinquent I am become a fauorite, wherein he hath not a little furthered mee: And I must needs confesse that I am more obliged to the Kings goodnesse then any man else in this kingdom; therefore he may assure himselfe I will neuer faile in my duty towards him. Monseur de Fiat will further enforme you of all matters, vnto whose relation I referre my selfe, and in life and death will remaine your Lordships most humble Cousin and most affectionate seruant, De Rohan.

As for the particular Articles granted vnto the Duke of Rohan, the substance of them was this: 1. That the D. of Rohan should haue the Duchy of Vallois by way of engagement for 6000 pound sterling, to be paid on one entire payment, which Duchy should bee of the value of three thousand pound sterling yearly rent: and withall hee should haue twenty thousand pound sterling in hand, in recompence of his government in Poitou, and other particular governments of Saint Iohn d'Angely, Saint Maxant, Ma-lazais, Mesle, and for the Abbey of Lor in Poitiers: That hee should haue the government of Nîmes, and Vîez, without Garisons: That his Pension and his brothers should be reformed, and that the Seigneur of Calonge should haue six hundred pound sterling yearly pension.

2. That Rochel and Montauban should remain Townes of suretie for three yeares, and haue nothing demolished.

3. That all the new fortification of Montpellier should bee razed: That hereafter the Consuls should be named by the D. of Montmorency, according to the Kings pleasure, that is to say, two of either Religion: That in all other things the Kings will should be obeyed, and there should be no more townes of safetie, Hostage, or Mariage: That all B. Gouvernours should hold their governments of the King onely, and not of the said Churches, and without any Garisons, but such as it should please his Maïestie to appoint.

Institution of a new Regiment of light-horse.

Thus the Peace is concluded at Montpellier, where the King stayed six dayes: during the which many new Regiments came vnto him; but having no further employment, he cashiered some, and entertained others: hee also cast all the light-horse, taking from the Princes their Companies, and instituting a new Regiment of Horse, consisting of fifteene companies which should be commanded by Gentlemen chosen by his Maïesty, to prevent the disorders which hapned daily vpon the first discontent of any Prince, who falling from his obedience, carried his company with him: which done, the King leaving Monseur Valence in Montpellier with forty Companies of foot, to see the fortifications razed, he went to visit his chiefe Townes of Prouence, Dauphine, and Lionois.

The disposition of the Kings Fleet.

The Peace was not yet proclaimed before Rochel, nor any surcease of Armes: The Earle of Soissons kept them from all commerce by land; and shot into the Towne at random, and greatly ruined their Houses. The D. of Guise meant to doe the like by sea, wherein they had their greatest hope. He appointed a Rendezvous for the whole Fleet at Blauet, called Port Lewis. He attended three great Gallions from Marfilles, and one from Malta. But the D. fearing that winter would approach, the time would be vnsafe, and the Roads bad in those parts, he resolved to goe and fight with them, and not stay for the Leuant ships, but contrarie winds kept him in the Harbor. During the which the said Leuant ships came vnto him about the end of September. Hee then gaue order for the fight, and diuided his fleet into three bodies. The first was commanded by Monf. de Saint Luc, Governor of Brouage, being Vice-Admirall, having ten ships, and two Pinaces. The second commanded by Monf. de Guise, being in number sixteene ships, and two Pinaces. The third body contained six ships, and two Pinaces, commanded by Monf. de Mantu. Before these were three squadrons; the first consisting of ten Gallies. The second squadron of two & twenty Pinaces, in which M. de Rochefoucault was with 1200 footmen. In the third Squadron were three Pinaces, commanded by the Marquis of Afferac.

Having thus disposed of the Fleet, about the nineteenth of October, the wind being fauourable, they began to set sayle: but changing suddenly, they were forced to stay in the Roade of Bel-le, and on the five and twentieth, they came in sight of the Ile of Ric, where the calme made them cast Anchor, so as they could not approach the enemy by two leagues. There they concluded of the manner of their fight. On the feuen and twentieth, having little winde, the Gallies approached towards the Rochellers who lay at Anchor about a league from Saint Martin de Ric, being about 70 ships: who seeing the Gallies approach, and the whole Fleet in sight, they set sayle; but the calme was so great, and the Tyde against them, as the Kings Fleet was forced to cast anchor a league from them. In the meane time the Gallies came within Cannon-shot of the Rochellers, having commandement not to engage themselves too farre. The Duke of Guise resolved to goe and discomfite their Armie, commanding the Earle of Joigny to send him a Gallie, and in the meane time he tooke a barge, being accompanied by the Earle of Rochefoucault and foure or five Gentlemen, vntill he met with the Gally, with the which hee approached nere vnto the Rochellers, as well to haue the better opportunitie to fight with them, as to discover the burthen of their ships and their Ordnance. The fight grew so hot, as the Rochellers were forced to cast anchor, in regard of the calme, in three diuised Squadrons: but the winde growing fresh about one of the clocke after noone, they set sayle againe, and giuing way to the aduantage which the Gallies had by their Cannon, retired by little and little.

The

A fight between the two Fleets.

A. The Duke of Guise thinking them to be disordered and in feare, held it fit to packe on all their sailes to fight with them. And so to this end he commanded Bouc, Sergeant-Major of the Armie to bring on the best sailers as they came, without any Order: vîing all diligence, to the end they might fight with them. Monseur de Saint Luc, being gone about some Commission to the Rereward, could not recouer his Ship, but many others were gone before him; to whom hee sent commandement to attend him; which some did, and others continued on their course, so as hee shot two pieces of Ordnance after them, and made their retire. The which hee did, as well to maintaine the first ranke which was due vnto his Charge, as to prevent all aduantages which the Rochellers might

B. get by the Fleets being thus scattered. The Duke of Guise recovered his Gallion, and the Rochellers got the winde, so as they must fight with them vpon disadvantage. Monf. de Saint Luc crept vp the winde all he could, being onely assisted by two ships, the rest fell all to lee-wards, and could onely helpe them with their Cannon a farre off, and by the Gallies, who likewise plyed them with their Ordnance, as long as they might doe it without annoying their owne company. In the meane time, the two Ships which were got into the winde with Monf. de Saint Luc, were boarded by foure or five of the Rochellers, one of which was sunke, and in one of the two ships, the Cheualier de Cuges Captaine thereof was slaine: this combat lasted vntill once a clocke at night, before they were cleared one from another.

C. In the meane time Monf. de Saint Luc continued the fight alone with the Rochellers Admirall, and Vice-Admirall, followed by their whole Fleet, the space of an houre and a halfe: the Admirall attempting twice to board him; and the Vice-Admirall thrice; but hee plyed them so with Cannon, and Musket, that they fell off againe without grappling; and so it hapned with other foure of their tallest Ships, of which some had laid him aboard. But a fift Ship of foure hundred Tunnes, being more eager then the rest to board him, was entertained, as after hee had vngarled himselfe, and was full of water, which would gladly, haue runne aground at Ric, but could not for it sunke by the way.

Monf. de Saint Luc engaged alone amongst the Rochellers Fleet.

Now Monseur de Guise (seeing Monseur de Saint Luc so farre engaged) had fetched such a compasse about with severall boardings, as he had gotten into the winde more then all the rest of the Fleet which followed him, and so much desired to succour him; that hee alone without staying for any other, turned short vpon the Enemy (although the rest of his Fleet were still to lee-ward) and thrust himselfe amongst the thickest of them; which the Admirall of the Rochellers perceiving, hee turned towards him with all their Fleet (except their Vice-Admirall, with ten other vessels, which were in fight with Monseur de Saint Luc) and bringing with them two ships full of fire-works, hee found the meanes whilst they were in fight, to fasten these ships to the poope of his Gallion; so as on a sudden the fire working his effect, burst out all over the said two ships, to the vnderment of all the Kings Fleet how the Duke of Guise could free himselfe from them, which in the end, notwithstanding all the enemies Cannon and Musket shot, by his great diligence and valour he effected, and quenched the fire also which had taken hold of his owne ship. This combat lasted aboue an houre, and was so hotly pursued as many of the Rochellers were slaine, at the push of the pike by them aboard the Admirall. Having thus cleared himselfe, he passed through their whole Fleet.

During this, the Kings Fleet following the said rout vvhich the Duke of Guises ship tooke, caused the Rochellers Vice-Admirall, and the other ten ships vvhich assailed M. de Saint Luc all this vvhile, and were graped vnto him, to leaue the combat. As soone as he was freed, and had gotten to the head of the Fleet. Hee set so furiously againe vpon the Rochellers, even as they were about to reuinite themselves, as the Vice-Admirall, and his Squadron were forced to separate themselves from the rest, and sayle before the wind vnto Rochel, and the Admirall with the rest to pley vp into the vvinde to recouer Ric: so the night fauouring their retreat, protected them from further losse; the combat having dured vntill once a clocke within night; the darknesse did much endamage the Kings Fleet with boarding and shooting one at another. In this conflict were slaine aboard the Duke of Guises Gallion, the Seigneur of Vinceguerre, with some other Gentlemen and Officers.

The Rochellers beaten and retire.

The Duke of Guise vvhith the vvhole Fleet, anchored in the place vvhith this fight was, the which was very furious, and continued from the morning till six a clocke at night.

night, in which they write were spent 20000 great shot: The Rochellers retired to Saint Martins Road, vnder the fauour of their Forts, and covered with many shielues and barres, where no great Ships could enter but with danger to runne aground. They write that in this battell there were not aboute foure hundred men slaine and hurt on the Kings side, but two thousand slaine and hurt of the Rochellers, and diuers of their Ships sunk.

The Duke of Guise being still resolu'd to charge the Enemy, commanded the General of the Gallies (for that the Ships could not aduance by reason of the great calme) to assault them where they lay. They met with the Vice-Admirall, caried by the Tide along the Coast of the Ile of Rie, which they battered so with their Cannon, as she ranne aground hauing lost many men. After this they were ouertaken by a storme, so as the Kings Fleet was forced to stay many dayes at L'Esguillon, and the Gallies went to seeke shelter at Brouage. The storme being past, the Duke went to set vpon them in Saint Martins Road, but could not draw them forth, so as after many Cannon shot, the winde being contrary, he was forced to leaue them.

Three dayes after, the Duke gaue order to passe the Flats which couered them, commanding Monsieur de Saint Luc to take the head of the Fleet, and to ioyne with them if he could: According to this order, hauing past the danger by sound, and spent aboute foure thousand shot on both sides: the Rochellers, as they write, were ready to runne aground to saue themselves, hauing no other meanes to escape: but the winde growing contrary, the Kings Fleet was forced to retire.

The Rochellers submit themselves to the Duke of Guise.

The Rochellers seeing their ruine apparant, and not to be auoided, came the same night to offer their Standard to the Duke of Guise, beseeching him to suffer them to enioy the benefit of the Peace which it had pleased the King out of his bounty to giue them. The next day Guyon their Admirall brought his fagge vnto the Duke, with assurance to disarme, & to satisfie all the other Articles which were enioyned them by his Maiestie, in regard of the said Peace, according to the order vvich he had receiued from the Maior and Towne-houpe of Rochel.

After this submission, they were stayed three dayes before they could make their retreat by reason of a tempest. On the fourth day, they passed vnder the Lee of the Kings Armie, and saluted it with their Cannon, carying neither Flags nor Ensignes, and retired within the Chaîne, and vpon the Owle of Rochel. The Kings Ships went to winter in Britanie, and the Gallies in Brouage and Tonne Charante.

This Discourse of the Nauies, my Author faith, was sent him from a man of qualitie, who was in the Kings Fleet, and one of the first in all fights. I haue done what I could to haue all other aduertisements of these encounters by Sea, from those of the Religion which liue in this towne, but could not be assisted; and therefore I must leaue the censure of the Truth, to the iudicious Reader, hauing discharged my dutie as faithfully as I could.

Persons of Note were slaine at Sea.

According to their Relation, there were many men of name slaine in these conficts. Of the Rochellers side the Seigneurs of Plomb, of Laille, of Coudray, of Merande the elder, all foure of Rochel. Moreover, Launay of Cane; Emanuel a Norman; Captaine La Porte of Loudun; the Seigneur of Queris, and of S. John D'Angely: all these they write were slaine in one Ship; & Tessere a Councillor of Rochel was taken prisoner there. As for the Kings Fleet, they write, there perished not any one Ship, neither did they lose many men of command; onely the Seigneur of Vinceguerre, and the Cheualier de Cuge, Beauveau Persac, Captain of a Gally, and de L'Isle Lieutenant to Monsieur de Valence. The peace hauing preferred the rest of the Rochellers Fleet, they gaue publike testimonies of their ioy both by word and writing, as may appear by this following Letter, which the Mayor and Sherifffes of Rochel wrote to the Earle of Soissons.

The Rochellers Letter to the Earle of Soissons.

My Lord, as our vowes & earnest prayers to God, haue a long time preuented the good newes of the Peace, which it hath pleased the King out of his bounty to giue vs; so wee beseech you to belecue, that not onely the actions of thanks to his Maiestie for this singular benefit, haue presently followed the happy aduertisements which came vnto vs, and that at that instant we haue shewed all signes of ioy and deuotion, and haue made no stay of the publication thereof, which we haue performed with all kinds of publike acclamations. Wee were bound therunto for many considerations; but especially by the naturall obedience

A obedience which we owe vnto our King, which shall alwayes bee preferred before our paine in case especially, which he should be proud to be our Commander, as he promiseth to doe. Wee hope, my Lord, presently to receiue the assurances by your Deputies, which we meane to send vnto his Maiestie to that end, who shall not depart before they haue the honour to kisse your hands, and receive your commendements. In the meane time wee beseech you to take in good part, as it were by way of anticipation, the priuat submissions which shall be made vnto you on our behalfe by the Seigneurs of Laizer, Beaupreau, Pyncau, and Lauchier of the body of our Towne: Berthe, de Lande, Parau, and Olivier, Burgesses, whom we send expressly to your Excellencie to acquaint you with what hath hitherto past vpon signification of this happy newes.

B Wee humbly beseech you, not to suffer this Peace to be interrupted by any alteration which might discompoise mens minds; but contrariwise, to dispose of all things, not onely for the publication of the said peace in your Armie; but also for the sincere execution of the contents thereof, as well by Sea as Land; as wee for our parts will be carefull, to obserue what better depends of vs, and to witnesse that wee are of vs his Maiesties most humble Subiects and seruants, and that we particularly honour with all affections the Princes of his blood, amongst the which my Lo: wee know the ranke you hold, and the interest which all France hath, that so precious a bud of the Flower-de-luce, should be esteemed, and preferred, for the which wee will pray to Almighty God, as your most humble and obedient seruants; the Maior, Sherifff, Peeres, Burgesses, and Inhabitants of Rochel, the sixteenth of Nouember 1622.

The Earle of Soissons acknowledgeth his Arme.

C The Earle of Soissons, according to the order he had receiued from the King, hauing caused the Peace to be published, dismissed his Armie. The Regiment of Champagne, with twenty complete Companies, vnder the command of Arnauld their Camp: Master were left in garison in Port Lewis, which was munitioned with victuals, and all other things necessarie; the which troubled the Rochellers; and made them send often vnto the King to be freed thereof. What succeeded you must heare hereafter.

D This with the conclusion of the Peace (which was so pleasing to all France in general, but especially to the poore afflicted Church of the Religion) I will end the continuation of this History. I know I haue undertaken a task which will be subiect to much controll, hauing treated of a subiect which we haue seene with our eyes, so as some who presume to haue had good intelligences of these actions which haue past, will haply contradict mee, and take me with mistakings. But they must accept of this answer, that I haue added nothing of mine own; but can bring my Authors for my varrant, if they haue erred, either transported with passion, or abated with misreports and false instructions; the fault is not mine: Neither doe I doubt but other mens relations, which shall speake most confidently, will be subiect to the like constructions. I haue done my best endeavour, and haue related euery thing with as much modestie as I could, no way inclining to any party; but only to set downe briefly (being tyed to strict bounds in this Continuation) what hath been written by my authors, whom I haue found to be altogether Royalists. I haue much desired to haue had information from them of the religion, wherein I haue treated some friends to employ their credits, but could receive no assistance.

E Wherefore if in these my painfull employments, I shall giue the Reader any content and satisfaction, I haue the reward I expect, in being throwed from the Detraction of maleuolent tongues,

FINIS.
